

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. FLATAU V. CULLEN.*

Practice—Costs—Taxation.

It being the duty of a Master on taxation to tax each item, the practice of allowing a fixed sum of £1 for the costs of substituted service cannot be justified.

This was an appeal from an order of Mr. Justice Lawrence's, refusing to allow a review of taxation of costs. The writ in the action was issued on July 5, 1899, and was endorsed with a claim for payment of £410 on a guarantee and £3 3s. for the costs of the writ. Some difficulty having arisen with regard to the service of the writ, an order was obtained for substituted service, and such service was effected on July 10. On the same day the defendant paid the plaintiff the principal sum, £3 3s. for the costs of the writ, and £2 10s. for the costs incurred in obtaining the order for substituted service. The defendant objected to the demand for the sum of £2 10s., and only paid it under protest, and on July 17 he took out a summons for taxation of costs. The plaintiff thereupon carried in a bill for £6 4s. 8d., certain additional costs having been incurred in the meantime. The Master allowed the costs at £4 3s.—viz., £3 3s. for the writ and £1 for the substituted service—and he ordered the plaintiff to pay the costs of the taxation, which he fixed at £3 3s. In making this order the Master followed the practice which has been adopted at Chambers of invariably allowing £3 3s. for a specially-endorsed writ, and £1 for substituted service of a writ. The plaintiff took out a summons for a review of taxation, but Mr. Justice Lawrence thought that the recognized practice ought to be followed, and refused to make an order for a review. The plaintiff appealed.

Mr. FOOTE, Q.C., and Mr. EMANUEL, for the plaintiff, contended that the practice adopted by the Masters was unreasonable and contrary to the rules of the Court, and that it ought to be declared by this Court to be bad. The duty of a Taxing Master was to consider the separate items in the bill before him, and not to allow an arbitrarily-fixed sum as applicable in all cases. The result of the practice was that a plaintiff could not now get a writ for a liquidated demand under Order 3, rule 7, unless he stated in the endorsement that the sum he claimed for costs was three guineas. The practice of arbitrarily fixing the cost of substituted service of a writ at £1 could not be supported. The only cases in which the Master was to allow a fixed sum were those provided for by Order 65, rule 27, sub-rule 38, and rule 18 of the Practice Masters' Rules. Where the claim did not exceed £50 the charge for substituted service was fixed at £1, but there was no fixed charge where the claim exceeded £50.

Mr. MONTAGUE LUSH, for the defendant, argued that, in the circumstances of the case, the plaintiff ought not to be allowed to have a review of taxation.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said the writ as issued was endorsed with a claim for a liquidated demand of £410 and three guineas costs. There was then an order for substituted service, and, when the defendant expressed his willingness to pay the debt, the plaintiff claimed that the cost of the substituted service was £2 10s. The defendant paid the principal sum, the three guineas, and the £2 10s., but he protested about the £2 10s., and took out a summons to have the costs taxed. The Master taxed the costs under Order 3, rule 7. He would pass over what the Master did as regards the three guineas, but with regard to the substituted service, although the plaintiff said that the cost of that was £2 10s., the Master said he would only give him £1. The Master did not really tax the item, but, following the practice which had been established, merely allowed a fixed charge of £1. The plaintiff now contended that the Master had no power to tax the cost of substituted service of a writ in this way by rule of thumb. He did not see any answer to that contention. He had expected that Mr. Montague Lush was going to urge something in the way of justifying the practice which had been adopted by the Masters. He, however, had not done so and, in his Lordship's opinion, that practice could not be justified. The case must therefore go back for a review of taxation.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS concurred.

Justices — Jurisdiction — Poor Law — Distress-warrant — Ministerial act — Certiorari refused.

This was an application for a writ of certiorari in the following circumstances. On June 29, 1897, an order had been made against the applicant that he should contribute 4s. weekly towards the maintenance of his father and mother, so long as they remained poor and unable to work. The father subsequently obtained employment, but the Poor Law guardians continued their allowance to him for a considerable period. In 1899 they demanded payment from the applicant of £7 9s. 8d. (ultimately reduced to £4 4s.) which they alleged to be due under the order of June, 1897. The applicant disputed his liability on the ground that the order was only in force so long as both his father and mother were poor and unable to work. Thereupon the guardians, without proper notice to the applicant, applied to the respondent for and obtained a distress warrant for the amount in question. The applicant, having unsuccessfully applied to the justices sitting as a Court of summary jurisdiction for the discharge of the distress warrant, the distress was proceeded with, and the amount realized. On September 23, 1899, the applicant issued a writ claiming damages for trespass and illegal distress.

Mr. WARD COLDRIDGE, for the applicant, contended that the distress warrant was issued without jurisdiction, inasmuch as it was made without service on the applicant by the guardians of the preliminary complaint and notice of the intended application required by the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879. He further contended that a distress warrant could only be issued after a judicial inquiry into the liability of the applicant, which it was not competent for one magistrate sitting alone to make. That even if the respondent had purported to do ministerially an act which could only be done judicially, that fact ought not to prevent the quashing of the order. But that an examination of the distress warrant showed that the order was in reality a judicial act, inasmuch as it declared the liability of the applicant to pay the sum. He cited "In re Gamble" ([1899] 1 Q.B., 305), "Reg. v. Price" (5 Q.B.D., 300), and referred to the Summary Jurisdiction Act of 1879, sections 6, 35 (2), 47. [Mr. JUSTICE DARLING referred to "Ex parte Taunton" (1 D.P.C., 54). In that case the act done was a purely ministerial one.]

Mr. BODILLY, for the respondent, urged that a writ of certiorari was not issued ex debito iudicio, but was in the discretion of the Court. He argued that even if the distress warrant did involve a judicial act, it did not follow that a writ of certiorari should be granted. He submitted, however, that the act here was a ministerial one, and therefore not the subject for such a writ.

The COURT refused the application.

Mr. JUSTICE RIDLEY said that issuing the warrant was a ministerial act and not a judicial one. Moreover, the case was concluded by authority because "Ex parte Taunton" (supra) decided that a writ of certiorari would not issue in the case of a distress warrant.

Mr. JUSTICE DARLING was also of opinion that the act done here was a ministerial one. But whether it was ministerial or judicial the Court had a discretion in the matter, and a writ of certiorari ought not to be granted in this case. The learned Judge referred to and distinguished the case of "Fourth City Mutual Building Society v. Guardians of Ham" ([1892] 1 Q.B., 661), and intimated that he did not decide that under no circumstances could a distress warrant be quashed on an application such as the present.

ROBERTS V. THE GWYRFAL RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL.*

Decision of Kekewich, J. (15 The Times L.R., 165), affirmed.

This was an appeal by the defendants against a decision of Mr. Justice Kekewich's (reported in 15 The Times L.R., p. 165). The case is one of importance to millowners who are dependent upon a running stream for the supply of the motive power for their mills. The action was brought by the owner of a corn-mill in the parish of Llanllyfni, Carnarvonshire, for an injunction to restrain the defendants from interfering with the natural flow of the stream which worked his mill. The stream in question flowed from a lake at the foot of mountains some distance above the mill. The defendants are the owners of land on one side of the lake, and they have constructed a dam across the end of the lake, of which the stream forms the outlet, so as to increase the water storage for the supply of water to their district. The defendants constructed a sluice in the dam to regulate the outflow of the stream, and had offered to allow a sufficient outflow to work the plaintiff's mill, but the plaintiff declined the offer, contending that he ought not to be at the defendants' mercy, but was entitled to the free and uninterrupted flow of the water as it had always existed, subject only to the rights of other riparian owners, and he alleged that the subtraction of water for the supply of the defendants' district was not within their rights as riparian owners. The defendants claimed to be entitled to do what they had done, either as riparian proprietors or under the Public Health Act, 1875. Section 51 of the Act empowers a rural authority to provide their district "with a supply of water proper and sufficient for public and private purposes," and for those purposes (inter alia) to "construct and maintain waterworks, dig wells, and do any other necessary acts"; and by section 332, "Nothing in this Act shall be construed to authorize any local authority to injuriously affect any reservoir, canal, river, or stream, or the feeders thereof, or the supply, quality, or fall of water contained in any reservoir, canal, or stream, or in the feeders thereof, in cases where any body of persons or person would, if this Act had not passed, have been entitled by law to prevent or be relieved against the injuriously affecting such reservoir, canal, river, stream, feeders, or such supply, quality, or fall of water, unless the local authority first obtain the consent in writing of the body of persons or person so entitled as aforesaid." At the trial of the action Mr. Justice Kekewich granted the injunction asked for, but suspended its operation pending the appeal. The defendants appealed.

Mr. Renshaw, Q.C., and Mr. H. Courthope Munroe were for the defendants; Mr. Warrington, Q.C., and Mr. Bryn Roberts, for the plaintiff, were not called upon.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said that the plaintiff's right as a riparian proprietor was to have the water of the stream come down in the accustomed way, subject to the rights of the other riparian proprietors higher up the stream. Subject to those rights there was no right to interfere with the accustomed flow of the stream. As riparian proprietors the defendants had no right to do what they had done apart from any statutory power. They were not exercising the rights of a riparian proprietor at all. They were diverting water from the lake for a totally different purpose—viz., to supply water to a township in their district. They could not justify what they had done under their common law right as riparian proprietors. But they said they could justify it under section 51 of the Public Health Act, subject to section 332. Mr. Renshaw fairly said that he claimed a right on the part of the defendants either as riparian proprietors or under the Act. In his Lordship's opinion the defendants had no such right in either way. Mr. Munroe admitted that the defendants had no right, but said that the plaintiff had no ground of complaint, for he had not suffered any damage, and the Court would not in such a case interfere by injunction. That, however, depended upon whether the plaintiff's legal right had been infringed, and it clearly had been infringed. The defendants did not say that they were prepared to stop taking the water, and they really intended to go on taking it. In the course of 20 years they would acquire a prescriptive right to take it. There was no power of the Court more important than that of keeping public bodies within their powers. If such bodies exceeded those powers their action would be oppressive. The defendants ought to endeavour to obtain Parliamentary powers. It was said that a rural district council had no power to promote a Bill in Parliament. That only meant that they could not do so at the cost of the ratepayers. The appeal must be dismissed with costs. But, if the defendants would within a fortnight undertake to apply to Parliament for power to take the water, the operation of the injunction would be suspended for six months. It would be suspended during the fortnight.

The PRESIDENT of the PROBATE DIVISION and LORD JUSTICE ROMER concurred.

UCKFIELD RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL V. CROWBOROUGH WATER COMPANY.*

Local Government—Buildings—Jurisdiction of District Council—By-laws—Water company—Special Act.

This was an argument on a special case stated by the justices of the petty sessional division of Frant, in the county of Sussex. The district council laid two informations against the water company for breaches of two of the council's by-laws, numbered 93 and 94, mentioned below. The justices before whom proceedings were heard dismissed the informations, subject to a special case for the opinion of the Queen's Bench Division, which in substance stated the following facts:—The rural district council for the district of Uckfield in Sussex, of which Crowborough forms part, were constituted under the Local Government Act, 1894, having all the powers of a rural sanitary authority under the Public Health Act, 1875, including powers to make and enforce by-laws with respect to new streets conferred by section 157 of that Act. The council in pursuance of these powers made by-laws, which were in due course confirmed by the Local Government Board. One of these by-laws (numbered 93) provided that any person intending to erect a new building should give notice to the council of that intention, and should deliver to the clerk or surveyor of the council plans and sections of such building, and a description in writing of the materials of which it is intended to construct the same, and also a description in writing of the mode of drainage and means of water supply. Another by-law (numbered 94) provided that notice should be given of the date on which it is intended to commence such building. Other by-laws imposed penalties for breach of the foregoing, and contained provisions for removal of works executed in contravention thereof. The Crowborough District Water Company were incorporated by an Act of 60 and 61 Vict., c. 117. Section 25 of that Act provided that the company should make in the lines and situations and according to the levels shown on deposited plans and sections certain works mentioned in such section and all proper and necessary works, including a high-service water-tower. Among the Acts incorporated with the respondents' special Act was the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, section 93 of which provides as follows:—“Nothing herein or in the special Act contained shall be deemed to exempt the undertakers from any general Act relating to waterworks, or any Act for improving the sanitary condition of towns and populous districts, which may be passed in the same Session of Parliament in which the special Act is passed, or any future Session of Parliament.” The water company in October, 1898, began to construct this water-tower without giving any of the notices prescribed by, or in any other wise complying with, the provisions of the above by-laws. The district council thereupon laid informations against the water company for breach of these by-laws, which informations were dismissed as above stated.

Mr. R. E. MOORE, for the appellants (the district council), argued that the by-laws being made under the provisions of the Public Health Act, 1875, and being therefore part of the general law of the land, were binding on the water company in so far as they were not inconsistent with the provisions of that company's special Act, and that there was no such inconsistency. He cited “Hill v. Hall” (45 L.J., M.C., 153).

Mr. WHATELEY (Mr. Boxall with him), for the respondents (the water company), was then called on, and argued that the district council had no power, and did not purport to make by-laws in reference to a building of this sort; that the provisions of the Public Health Act and the by-laws made under that Act had no application to the works executed by the water company, because the Public Health Act was not incorporated with the special Act of the water company; and, moreover, the by-laws had been promulgated on January 15, while the special Act was not passed until July 15. The by-laws and the special Act were inconsistent, because the latter obliged the company to construct all proper and necessary works, which meant proper and necessary in the view of the company, while the former made the district council the judges of what was proper and necessary. He cited “London and Blackwall Railway Company v. Limehouse Board of Works” (26 L.J., Ch., 164); “City and South London Railway v. London County Council” ([1891] 2 Q.B., 513). It was admitted that the deposited plans gave no details of the materials or method of construction to be adopted.

MR. JUSTICE RIDLEY, in giving judgment, said that the question raised by this special case was one of some interest; that after hearing considerable argument the Court had come to the conclusion that the decision of the justices was wrong; and that this case ought to be sent back to them with a direction to convict. The question was whether the water company, having been empowered by section 25 of their special Act to construct all proper and necessary works, including the high-service water-tower, were thereby exonerated from submitting plans and giving notices in accordance with the by-laws numbered 93 and 94. The Court were of opinion that the water company were not so exonerated. Counsel for the water company had contended that when once the company were authorized by the Legislature to erect a water-tower they were empowered to construct it as they thought fit. His Lordship could not assent to that view. In his view the effect of the water company's special Act was to enable the company to erect a tower upon land which was not theirs; an Act was necessary to enable them to do that. But when they had been so empowered they were in the same position as a private person intending to build a house upon his own land, and under a similar obligation to comply with by-laws duly made under the provisions of the Public Health Act. It was contended that these by-laws did not apply because the Public Health Act was not expressly incorporated with the special Act; but the presumption was that the Public Health Act, a general Act and part of the general law of the land, did apply, although not expressly incorporated, unless it could be shown that it was the intention of the Legislature that it should not apply. Section 93 of the Waterworks Clauses Act implied the contrary intention by enacting that nothing in that Act or in the special Act should exempt the company from any sanitary Act which might be passed in the same Session of Parliament in which the special Act was passed or any future Session of Parliament. With regard to existing sanitary Acts, nothing was said; the section was silent. That left untouched the-general principle that the general law of the land applied. With regard to the cases cited, they were both distinguishable. In "London and Blackwall Railway Company v. Limehouse Board of Works" the earlier Act was a special Act, and the later a general Act. There was, therefore, no such inconsistency as would lead the Court to infer that the earlier Act was intended to be repealed; and that that was the test. In the "City and South London Railway Company v. London County Council" the Court held there was a distinct inconsistency, and therefore the two Acts could not stand together; but for that inconsistency the decision would have been the other way. In this case there was no inconsistency between the special Act and the by-laws, and accordingly the water company were subject to the provisions of the latter. With regard to the second point, his Lordship was of opinion that the water-tower was clearly a building within the meaning of the by-laws.

MR. JUSTICE DARLING concurring, the case was sent down to the justices with a direction to convict.

LANE V. RENDALL.*

Weights and Measures—"False or unjust weighing machine"—Paper weighed with article sold—Weights and Measures Act, 1875, sec. 25.

This was a case stated by justices of London. An information was laid against the respondent charging him with having in his possession for use for trade a weighing machine which was false or unjust contrary to section 25 of the Weights and Measures Act, 1875. The respondent, who trades as Melrose, carries on business as a tea merchant at 276, Battersea-park-road. The appellant, who is an inspector of weights and measures for the county of London, visited the respondent's premises and found there a weighing machine which was used for trade. There was a piece of paper underneath the scoop on which the article to be weighed was placed, and between the bottom of the scoop and the cup in which it rests. The weight of the paper was 1½ drachms. Without the paper the machine would have shown the correct weight of the article in the scoop. The machine was, when found by the inspector, being used by the respondent's employees for the purpose of weighing tea to be made up into packets. The piece of paper was put under the scoop by the respondent's manager instead of in the scale, in accordance with his usual practice, to facilitate and quicken the process of weighing the tea, and so caused the customer to assist in defraying the cost of the paper bag or wrapper in which the tea is sold. The respondents make up on Fridays as many as 3,000 ½lb. packets of tea, and it would take them much longer to weigh out the tea for the packets if the tea were in each case first placed in the paper bag in which it was to be sold and then put into the scoop, because any adjustment of the tea to the intended quantity would then have to be made by adding to or taking from the tea in the bag. The piece of paper weighed about half as much as the paper bag in which the tea is sold.

MR. DALDY, for the appellant, contended that the effect of placing the piece of paper beneath the scoop was to render the machine false or unjust within the meaning of section 25. It was just as if a piece of lead or other substance had been fixed to the machine. He cited "Great Western Railway Company v. Baillie" (5 Best and Smith, 928).

*Reported by C. G. WILBRAHAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

MR. GEORGE ELLIOTT, for the respondent, argued that it was a long-standing practice in the tea trade, supported by the case of "Harris v. Allwood" (9 The Times L.R., 14), that the tea should be weighed with the paper in which it was contained; and that all that the respondents did was to place a piece of paper beneath the scoop for convenience instead of in each case weighing the tea with the actual paper wrapper which belonged to it. The analogy between the piece of paper and a piece of lead was false, because the piece of paper was in effect part of the thing sold (see "Carr v. Stringer, L.R., 3 Q. B., 433"). If the piece of paper had been in the scoop and not under it, no offence under the section would have been committed. He contended, further, that the proceedings had been taken under the wrong section, and that they ought to have been taken under section 26, which provides for the case of frauds wilfully committed in the use of a weighing machine. He repudiated the idea that there was anything fraudulent in the action of the respondent.

MR. JUSTICE RIDLEY said that the charge not being under section 26 did not involve the respondent in the charge of using the scales fraudulently. It was clear that the respondent did not adopt the practice complained of in order to defraud his customers. It was adopted merely for the purpose of conducting his business, which was a large one, more conveniently. The question here was whether he was guilty of an offence under section 25. It appeared from the case that the scales without the paper showed the true weight of the article in the scoop, but that a piece of paper was put into them of about the same weight as the paper in which it was intended that the tea should be wrapped. When this piece of paper was inserted the scales did not show level and were unjust. In that condition they were used. The important point was to find in what condition the scales were when used. Here as used they were false. His Lordship demurred to Mr. Elliott's contention that there was a custom to weigh the tea with the wrapper. If a man asked for a pound of tea he intended to purchase a pound of tea, not a pound of tea and paper. He could not, therefore, believe that any such custom existed, though it was possible that individual customers might sometimes acquiesce in the practice. Even if the custom did exist, that would not make the scales as used in this case honest scales. The case where the paper was placed on the scoop did not arise, and no decision need, therefore, be given upon it. The case must go back to the justices who ought to have convicted.

MR. JUSTICE DARLING gave judgment to the same effect.

THE QUEEN V. THE JUSTICES OF THE WEST RIDING OF YORKSHIRE—EX PARTE THE CORPORATION OF HUDDERSFIELD.*

Justices—Costs—Appeal from a conviction to quarter sessions—Vagrancy Act, 1824, sec. 9—Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848—Costs, whether payable out of borough or county funds.

In this case cause was shown by the justices of the West Riding against a rule for a certiorari to quash an order of the quarter sessions held at Wakefield on April 3 last. Two persons were convicted by the justices of the borough of Huddersfield of an offence under the Vagrancy Act, 1824 (5 Geo. IV., chap. 83). An appeal from the conviction was taken to the quarter sessions, where the conviction was quashed and the treasurer of the borough of Huddersfield was ordered to pay to the defendants and to the police inspector of the borough (the prosecutor) their costs of the appeal. The rule nisi for a certiorari to quash the order was obtained by the corporation of Huddersfield upon the ground that, inasmuch as the borough of Huddersfield had no separate Court of quarter sessions, the costs were payable, not by the treasurer of the corporation, but by the treasurer of the riding—that is to say, not out of the borough fund, but out of the county fund. Section 9 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824, empowers the justices at quarter sessions in an appeal from a conviction under the Act to order the costs of the prosecutor to be paid by the “treasurer of the county, riding, division, or place in which the offence shall have been committed.”

Mr. ROSKILL, in showing cause on behalf of the justices against the rule, contended that the order as to costs was good because the place within which the offence was committed was the borough of Huddersfield, and the order as to costs was therefore rightly made against the borough fund. There was no authority as to the meaning of the term “place within which the offence shall have been committed” in section 9 of the Vagrancy Act. In the “Mayor of Reigate v. Hart” (9 B. and S., 129) it was held that the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848 (11 and 12 Vict., c. 43), section 31, which directs that penalties or other sums of money are to be paid to the treasurer of the county, riding, division, liberty, city, borough, or place for which such justice or justices (meaning the justices issuing the warrant of distress) shall have acted means a liberty, city, borough, or place which has a Court of quarter sessions. “Reg. v. Dale” (22 L.J., M.C., 44) and “Winn v. Mossman” (L.R., 4 Exch., 292) decided, with reference to a similar provision in the Alehouse Licensing Act, 1828, to the like effect. These decisions did not affect the present question, because here the county or place referred to was the county or place in which the offence was committed, not the county or place for which the convicting justice acted. What was intended was any county or place having a separate commission of the peace.

Mr. T. P. PERKS, who appeared for the defendants, said that if the order was wrong he would ask the Court to amend it in pursuance of section 7 of Bayne’s Act (12 and 13 Vict., c. 45).

Mr. MACMORRAN, Q.C. (Mr. R. G. Glen with him), in support of the rule, contended that it was intended that the costs should be payable out of the same fund to which, in the case of a conviction, the penalty would be payable, that was to say, in the present case, the county fund.

The COURT made the rule absolute quashing the order so far as it related to costs.

Mr. JUSTICE RIDLEY said in the course of his judgment that he did not think that it was intended by the Legislature that one body should receive penalties and that another should pay the costs. There was no magic in the words “for which such justice shall have acted” in section 31 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848. The difference between those words and the words used in section 9 of the Vagrancy Act was not material. The word “place” should be construed as ejusdem generis with the words preceding it, and both on that account and because penalties would be payable to the county fund, he was of opinion that it was intended that the costs should be paid by counties, boroughs, or places with a separate Court of Quarter Sessions. In “Mayor of Reigate v. Hart” no stress was laid on the words “for which such justice shall have acted.” The case was decided on the principle ejusdem generis. The liability to pay costs of the defendant depended not upon the section of the Vagrancy Act, but upon section 27 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, so that the order was clearly wrong as to those costs. There was no power to amend the order except in the case of a mistake.

Mr. JUSTICE DARLING said that he was of the same opinion. The power given to the justices at quarter sessions was to order the costs to be paid by their own treasurer. There were no words to show that they were given power to order the costs to be paid by somebody else’s treasurer who was not under their control. The words “in which the offence shall have been committed” were not words from which such an extraordinary result could be deduced. Any other interpretation of the words than that which they now gave them would work great injustice, for such a borough as this would be saddled with the burden of paying the costs without having the corresponding benefit of receiving the penalties.

DAVENTRY DISTRICT COUNCIL v. PARKER.*

Highway—Repair—Liability ratione tenuræ—Occupier—Local Government Act, 1894, sec. 25, subs. 2.

This was an appeal from a judgment of a Divisional Court, Mr. Justice Wills and Mr. Justice Bruce. The action was brought by the Daventry District Council to recover £136, the costs incurred by the plaintiffs in repairing two roads passing through a farm of which the defendant was the owner, but not the occupier. The proceedings were taken under section 25, subsection 2, of the Local Government Act, 1894, which provides that where a highway repairable ratione tenuræ is not in proper repair the district council may do the necessary repairs and “recover from the person liable to repair the highway the necessary expenses of so doing.” The question was whether “the person liable to repair the highway” was the defendant, who was the owner, or his tenant, who was the occupier. The Divisional Court, following the decision in “Cuckfield Rural District Council v. Goring” ([1898] 1 Q.B., 865, and 14 The Times L.R., 362), held that the defendant was not “the person liable to repair the highway,” and gave judgment for him. The plaintiffs appealed.

Mr. Bray, Q.C., and Mr. Morten appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Macmorran, Q.C., and Mr. H. W. Rowsell (Mr. J. P. Grain with them) for the defendant. The COURT dismissed the appeal.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE said the old practice was, where a road repairable ratione tenuræ was allowed to get out of repair, to proceed by indictment against the occupier, who, however, was entitled to be indemnified by the owner. In his opinion the section under which these proceedings were taken was intended to alter procedure only and not to alter the onus of liability. He therefore thought it was impossible to say that the landlord was liable to repair.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said he was of the same opinion. He thought the case of “Cuckfield Rural District Council v. Goring” was rightly decided.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS concurred.

IN RE LORD EVERSLEY—MILDMAY V. MILDMAY.†

Will—Condition—Forfeiture—Name and arms clause—Use of surname.

This was an application for the opinion of the Court, which raised an interesting question on the construction of a name and arms clause in the will of the late Charles Viscount Eversley, who died in December, 1888. The testator devised the Heckfield Place Estate, in the counties of Southampton, Wilts, and Berks, to the use of his daughter the Hon. Emma Laura Shaw Lefevre and her assigns during her life, and from and after her decease to the use of his daughter the Hon. Helena Lady St. John Mildmay and her assigns during her life, and from and after her decease to the use of his grandson, Gerald Anthony St. John Mildmay, the second son of his said daughter Helena and his assigns during his life, with remainder to the use of first and other sons of the said Gerald Anthony St. John Mildmay as tenants in tail male, with divers remainders over. The testator then declared that any person who should become entitled as tenant for life to the actual possession, or to the receipt of the rents and profits, of the hereditaments and premises thereinbefore devised, and who should not then use and bear the surname and arms of Shaw Lefevre, should, within one year after he should so become entitled, take upon himself and use upon all occasions the surname of "Shaw Lefevre" alone or together with his own family surname and quarter the arms of "Shaw Lefevre" with his own family arms, and should, within the said one year, take such steps as should be requisite to authorize him to take, use, and bear the said surname and arms of "Shaw Lefevre." And that, in case any such person should refuse or neglect within the said one year to take, use, and bear such surname and arms, then the limitations thereinbefore contained to the use of such person should absolutely determine. Helena Lady St. John Mildmay died in September, 1897, and on the death of the Hon. Emma Laura Shaw Lefevre in April, 1899, Mr. Gerald Anthony St. John Mildmay became tenant for life in possession of the settled estate, and he now asked the opinion of the Court whether, according to the true construction of the will of the testator Viscount Eversley, the taking by him within one year from April, 1899, and using the surname of Shaw Lefevre together with and immediately before his own family surname of St. John Mildmay, as "Shaw Lefevre St. John Mildmay," would be a sufficient compliance with the testator's directions to prevent the limitations over from taking effect.

Mr. VAUGHAN HAWKINS, for the applicant, contended that the clause in question gave the tenant for life an option to use the name of Shaw Lefevre either before or after his own family name; that there appeared to be no direct authority upon this point, but that the result of his research was that, according to the practice of conveyancers, if it was intended to provide that a particular name should be used after the incoming tenant for life's own name, express directions should be given to that effect. This had not been done by the present clause.

Mr. Beaumont, for the infant tenant in tail, and Mr. Rowden, Q.C., and Mr. Goddard, for the trustees of the will, raised no objection, being content to leave the matter to the Court.

MR. JUSTICE BYRNE, after a careful examination of the text books and precedents to which he had been referred, said that in his opinion the present clause was an illustration of the option sometimes given by testators as stated by the learned authors to whom he had been referred, and that the applicant by taking the name of Shaw Lefevre before that of St. John Mildmay would be sufficiently complying with the testator's directions. Clauses of this kind, being penal clauses, must be construed strictly, though fairly; but in his Lordship's opinion the present clause did not impose an obligation on the applicant to take and use the name of Shaw Lefevre after his own name. The case of "D'Eyncourt v. Gregory" (1 Ch. Div., 441), where it had been held that the use of the testator's surname before the name of the devisee was not a compliance with the bequest, was distinguishable from the present case on the ground that by the wording of that clause no option was given to the devisee. As a matter of construction his Lordship therefore made a declaration that the taking of the name of Shaw Lefevre before the name of St. John Mildmay was a sufficient compliance with the terms of this devise.

SHAMBOCK STEAMSHIP COMPANY (LIMITED) V. STOREY AND CO.*

Ship—Charter-party—Demurrage—Loading Time—"on terms of usual colliery guarantee"—Port of Grimsby.

Decision of Bigham J. (4 Com. Cas. 80) affirmed.

This was an appeal from the judgment of Mr. Justice Bigham at the trial of the action without a jury, reported in 4 Commercial Cases, 80. The action was brought by shipowners against charterers for demurrage. The charter-party, which was dated July 13, 1898, provided that the ship should proceed to Grimsby and there load, "in the usual manner according to the custom of the place," a cargo of coals for Caen, "the loading time to be 36 running hours, on terms of usual colliery guarantee." The charter-party contained the following exceptions among others:—"Comotions by keelmen, pitmen, or any hands striking work, breakage of machinery, or frost, snow, or floods, or other accidents or causes beyond the freighters' control which may prevent or delay the loading of the steamer." The ship was in dock at Grimsby, and ready to load, on July 19, and notice thereof was given to the charterers on the same day. By reason of a coal strike in South Wales there was at that time an accumulation of shipping at Grimsby, and the ship was thereby prevented from getting a berth under a coal tip until July 29, at 5 p.m., after which date the loading proceeded without further delay, and was completed at 8 p.m. on July 30. The plaintiffs' case was that, according to the usual custom of the port of Grimsby, the loading time began at 6 a.m. upon the day after notice, and they claimed demurrage from 6 p.m. on July 21 till 8 p.m. on July 30. The learned Judge at the trial held that the charterers were not protected from liability for demurrage by the exceptions in the charter-party, but that, by the provisions of "the usual colliery guarantee" in use at Grimsby, the time for loading did not begin to run until the ship was under the tip, and that the charterers were therefore not liable for demurrage. The plaintiffs appealed.

Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. Montague Lush appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Carver, Q.C., and Mr. Leslie Scott for the defendants.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE said that this was an action for demurrage, and the question was from what point of time the hours allowed for loading were to run. The charter-party was made at Newcastle, and it provided that the ship should proceed to Grimsby and load a cargo of coals in the usual manner, according to the custom of the place, from such colliery or collieries as the charterers should direct. It contained a number of exceptions, and then came this clause:—"The loading time to be 36 running hours on terms of usual colliery guarantee." That clause recognized that there was, in fact, a usual colliery guarantee. What was meant by that? It must mean a usual colliery guarantee in use at the place where the contract was to be performed—i.e., at the port of Grimsby. A thing was not the less usual because there might be exceptions to its use, nor because some persons might object to its use. It was usual, if it was in general use. The evidence showed that there were three forms of colliery guarantee used by various large firms of merchants and shippers at Grimsby, and they all agreed in this respect, that they all provided that the time for loading was not to begin to run until the vessel was under the tip or spout. Whichever, therefore, of the three forms was in most frequent use, it seemed to him that it could be rightly said that there was a usual colliery guarantee in use at Grimsby, and that it fixed the time for the commencement of loading at the time when the vessel came under the tip. Here the vessel came into the loading dock on July 19, but she did not come under the tip till July 29. The latter date, therefore, was the date from which the time for loading was to be calculated. If the charter-party was so construed, it was clear that the charterers were under no liability, and on that ground, in his opinion, the appeal should be dismissed.

The LORDS JUSTICES concurred.

THOMAS V. SUTTERS.*

Local Government—By-law—Validity—Prevention of street betting—Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, sec. 23.

By-law held valid.

This appeal against a decision of Mr. Justice Kekewich's raised the question whether one of the by-laws of the London County Council is invalid. The by-law in question came into force on October 1, 1898, and it provides that "no person shall frequent and use any street or other public place, on behalf either of himself or of any other person, for the purpose of bookmaking or betting, or wagering, or agreeing to bet or wager, with any person, or paying, or receiving, or settling bets." The validity of this by-law has been upheld by a divisional Court in "White v. Morley" ([1899] 2 Q.B., 34; The Times L.R., Vol. XV. p. 360), and the present appeal was really from that decision, which Mr. Justice Kekewich simply followed. The point was raised in the present case in a peculiar way. The plaintiff claimed the dissolution of a partnership between himself and the defendant, and the taking of the usual accounts. The defence was that the principal business of the partnership, and for the carrying on of which it was formed, consisted of betting transactions in streets and public places within the County of London, and that in the course of that business both the plaintiff and the defendant necessarily frequented and used the said streets and public places for the purpose of betting and of paying and receiving of payments of bets. In these circumstances the defendant submitted that by reason of the by-law the partnership was illegal, and that the plaintiff was not entitled to maintain the action. In answer to this the plaintiff contended that the by-law was invalid. The learned Judge, following "White v. Morley," held that the by-law was valid. The plaintiff appealed. Section 23 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, which, by section 16 of the Local Government Act, 1888, is made applicable to county councils, provides that "the council (of a borough) may from time to time make such by-laws as to them seem meet for the good rule and government of the borough." The by-law in question purports to be made under these sections.

Mr. G. H. STUTFIELD (with whom was Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C.), for the plaintiff, argued that the by-law was invalid. It was too wide in its terms, and might extend to such a case as that of a man going several times in a day to a particular street to make a bet with a bookmaker. The by-law was not limited to cases of obstruction or nuisance. The enforcement of morality did not come within the power given to a local authority to make by-laws for "good rule and government." Moreover, in section 23 of the Metropolitan Streets Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict., c. 124), the Legislature had dealt with obstruction to a street by persons assembling for betting purposes, and had provided that any three or more persons assembled together in any part of a street within the metropolis for the purpose of betting should be deemed to be obstructing the street, and liable to a penalty not exceeding £5. The by-law was repugnant to the Act.

Mr. A. T. Lawrence, Q.C., and Mr. H. S. Cantley, for the defendant, were not called upon.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said that the case did not present any difficulty. He agreed that in considering the validity of any by-law regard must be had to the power given to make it. The power in this case depended upon the construction of section 23 of the Act of 1882, which enabled the Council to make by-laws "for the good rule and government" of the county. His Lordship could not see any reason why the Court should limit that language and not give it full effect. The important words in the by-law were "for the purpose of" book-making or betting, &c. It would not prevent walking up and down a street and paying a bet. The "frequenting" must be "for the purpose of" betting. Cases before "White v. Morley," as well as that case, were in favour of the by-law. Why should the Court overrule them? It was said that the Act of 1867 regulated betting in a street, and that, therefore, no further by-law could be made about it, and reliance was placed on some words used by his Lordship (the Master of the Rolls) in "Strickland v. Hayes" ([1896], 1 Q.B., 290). There was a good deal in that argument, and, though the by-law in that case was hopelessly bad, he had to consider whether it could not be amended by striking out some words, and he thought that it could not, because it was not limited to causing annoyance. In the Act of 1867 the Legislature were dealing with the regulation of street traffic; that was the sole object of the Act. His Lordship declined to stretch what was said in "Strickland v. Hayes" and to hold that, because a provision was made by the Act to prevent obstruction of the streets, there was no power to regulate betting for another purpose. His Lordship was unable to see why this by-law could not be reasonably construed as made for the "good rule and government" of the locality. The appeal must be dismissed.

The PRESIDENT of the PROBATE DIVISION agreed. Objections to the validity of the by-law, such as had been raised in other cases, had been ably and forcibly put forward. It was said that the by-law was bad because it dealt rather with morals than with the "good rule and government" of the locality. His Lordship could not take such a limited view of the powers of a municipal body. It was not like the case of a private corporation. He should hesitate very long before saying that a municipality had no power to deal with the respectability and good order of their streets. It was said that Parliament had already dealt with the matter. He agreed that a by-law could not set itself up against Parliament. But here the Act of 1867 only dealt with the obstruction of streets; and he could see no objection to a by-law going rather further than an Act and making somewhat more stringent provisions in the same spirit. Mr. Stutfield argued that the by-law was too wide, because it was not limited to the case of nuisance or annoyance. That was the argument in "Kruse v. Johnson" ([1898], 2 Q.B., 91). His Lordship desired to repeat what he then said. In the present case he thought it was sufficient to say that, when persons assembled in a street for the purpose of betting, it was almost certain that nuisance and annoyance would follow, and on that ground the public authority would be justified in prohibiting it. In his Lordship's opinion the previous decisions were right, and Mr. Justice Kekewich was right in following them.

LORD JUSTICE ROMER concurred. In his opinion under section 23 a public authority had power to make a by-law prohibiting the use of their streets, not for an ordinary purpose of passing along them, but for an object which, though not in itself illegal, tended against the morality of the locality and the welfare of its inhabitants. For this reason he thought that the London County Council had power to make such a by-law with regard to betting, and that it was not too wide in its terms nor repugnant to the Act of 1867.

Company—Winding up—Examination of promoters—Time within which application must be made to discharge order for examination.

This case raised some points on section 8 of the Companies (Winding-Up) Act, 1890, which deals with the subject of public examination of promoters and others. On May 8, 1899, an order was made, on the ex parte application and report of the Official Receiver, for the public examination of Mr. F. G. Willett, Mr. J. W. Taylor, and others. Notice of the order was given to Mr. Willett on May 17, and some of the persons named in the order were examined on June 13. Mr. Willett's counsel attended and cross-examined. On July 26 Mr. Willett took out a summons to discharge the order for the public examination of himself. The application was adjourned to the Judge, when the preliminary objections were taken—(a) that the application ought to have been made within 14 days from the date, at any rate, of notice of the order in accordance with the practice of the Chancery Division as to moving to discharge the order of a Judge at Chambers; (b) that by taking part in the examination Mr. Willett had precluded himself from the right to have the order discharged.

Mr. INGLE JOYCE, for the Official Receiver, stated the preliminary objections above named.

Mr. M. MUIR MACKENZIE, for Mr. Willett, argued that there was no time fixed, and that the Judge had in each case a discretion as to whether the application should be entered. The learned counsel also referred to evidence filed to show that the report of the Official Receiver was incorrect in stating that Mr. Willett was one of the persons engaged in the promotion or formation of the company.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT said that the application was too late. The applicant did not take out his summons till two months after the service of the order on him. He was, moreover, represented at the examination by learned counsel, and it was impossible to say that his attention was not pointedly drawn to the subject-matter of the examination. His Lordship would not lay down within what time such an application must be made, although there was a consensus of authority in the textbooks that the time for moving to discharge was formerly 21 and now 14 days. At any rate, the applicant ought to come within a reasonable time. On the face of the Official Receiver's report there was sufficient to justify the order. It was sought to show on affidavit that the applicant did not take part in the promotion of the company, and that such evidence ought to be admitted; but such an objection was not necessarily an objection to the jurisdiction, and the admission of the evidence would be contrary to what was laid down in "In re New Travellers' Chambers" (L.R., [1895], 1 Ch., 395). Whether the applicant did take part in the promotion was one of the questions which it was the object of the examination to answer. That seemed to be in accordance with the view taken in "Buckley on Companies" (7th ed., p. 684)—viz., that "to give the Court jurisdiction . . . it is essential . . . (d) that that individual is, in the words of subsection (3) one who 'has taken part in the promotion or formation of the company'—i.e., who according to the findings of the report is 'reported to have taken' such part." The application must be dismissed with costs.

COBURG HOTEL V. LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL.*

Metropolis—Building—Line of buildings—Consent of County Council—Canopy or portico in front of hotel—London Building Act, 1894, sec. 22.

This was an appeal by case stated from the order of a metropolitan police magistrate ordering the demolition of a canopy or portico erected by the appellants in front of the Coburg Hotel in Carlos-place, Grosvenor-square, the portico not having been erected by them with the sanction of the London County Council in accordance with section 22 of Part III. of the London Building Act of 1894. It appeared that the appellants obtained permission from the County Council to erect a porch in front of the hotel in July, 1895. In June, 1898, permission was asked to erect a portico or shelter in front of the porch. The plans showed that the portico was to be of glass and iron. The total projection from the porch was to be 6ft., and the height 13ft. 3in. from the pavement. The permission was refused upon the ground that there were no similar structures at the adjacent premises, and on the ground that it was deemed inexpedient to permit the present frontage in Carlos-place to be disturbed, and that it was considered undesirable to agree to the covering over of a portion of the public way. Notwithstanding this the portico in question was erected. It was constructed of iron and glass, 11ft. long and 4ft. 3in. wide, and projected from the porch 4ft. 3in. over the footway. It was supported entirely by the porch at a height of about 13ft. above the footway. The portico projected beyond the general line of buildings in Carlos-place as certified by the superintending architect of metropolitan buildings. The magistrate found as a fact that the portico was dovetailed to and had become a part of the porch, and held that it was a structure within the meaning of section 22 of the London Building Act. Section 22 provides that "no building or structure shall, without the consent in writing of the Council, be erected beyond the general line of building in any street," &c., to which the section applied, "in which the same is situated."

Mr. ERNEST POLLOCK, for the appellants, contended that the portico was not a building or structure within the meaning of section 22, and that the proceedings, if any, ought to have been taken under section 73, which deals with various kinds of projections.

Mr. AVOBY, for the County Council, contended that the portico, being fixed to and part of the porch, was a building. It was also a structure. He cited "Ellis v. Plumstead Board of Works" (68 L.T. 291), and "Venner v. M'Donell" (61 J.P., 181).

Mr. JUSTICE RIDLEY, in dismissing the appeal, said that he was of opinion that the portico was both a building within the section and a structure. It was a building because it was part of the Coburg Hotel. It was true, as pointed out by Mr. Pollock, that projections were separately dealt with in section 73, and with regard to these the vestry were to be consulted, but he was of opinion that in the case of such a projection as this both sections would have to be complied with.

Mr. JUSTICE DARLING said that the magistrate was right in holding that the portico was a building, because he found as a fact that it was dovetailed to the porch. The portico projected beyond the general building line. Therefore the building of which it was a part projected. It was unnecessary to decide whether the portico was a structure. He thought that the County Council had exercised their power unreasonably, as the reason they themselves gave for refusing permission to erect the portico showed. It would be interesting to know whether they had given permission to erect porticos to all the other hotels which he had noticed were provided with such additions. He could not see how it could be more undesirable to have such a shelter or portico in Carlos-place than in, say, Pall-mall.

THOMAS V. THE CORPORATION OF DEVONPORT.*

Municipal Corporation—Accounts—Auditor—Duties—Remuneration—Accounts of urban sanitary authority.

This was an appeal from the judgment of Mr. Justice Phillimore at the trial of the action without a jury. The action was brought by the plaintiff, who was the elective auditor of the Corporation of Devonport, to recover £405 as remuneration for services rendered by him in auditing the accounts of the corporation, and also in auditing the accounts of the urban sanitary authority, the corporation being, under the Public Health Act of 1876, the urban sanitary authority for the borough. The corporation paid into Court the sum of £34 as being sufficient to satisfy the plaintiff's claim. Mr. Justice Phillimore held that the plaintiff was not entitled to any remuneration for his services as elective auditor under the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882. With regard to services rendered by the plaintiff in auditing the accounts of the urban sanitary authority under the Public Health Act, the learned Judge was of opinion that he was entitled to a fee of not less than two guineas for every day during which he was properly employed, and he thought that a reasonable time for the work was about eight days a year. He accordingly held that the sum paid into Court was sufficient, and he gave judgment for the defendants. The plaintiff appealed.

Mr. Macaskie appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Duke, Q.C., and Mr. J. A. Hawke for the defendants.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE said that, with regard to the plaintiff's claim for auditing the accounts of the municipal corporation as such, there was no ground whatever for suggesting that he was entitled to any remuneration. Parliament had provided for the constitution of a borough fund, and had laid down what appropriations might be made out of it, but no provision was made for any remuneration to be paid to an elective auditor. With regard to the claim for auditing the accounts of the urban sanitary authority, he agreed with Mr. Justice Phillimore in thinking that the plaintiff was entitled to remuneration at a rate of not less than two guineas a day for the time properly occupied over the work. He did not agree with the view which the learned Judge seemed to have taken as to the duty of an auditor of the accounts of an urban sanitary authority. He could not assent to the proposition that the sole duty of an auditor was to take the accounts and see that there were vouchers in respect of each payment. That seemed to him to be an imperfect and incomplete view of an auditor's duty. He thought an auditor was justified in going further than that, and in considering whether the payments were authorized payments, or whether they were illegal or improper, and, if he discovered any illegality, it was his duty to report it to the burgesses. But, even taking that wider view of the duty of an auditor, he saw no reason for thinking that eight days a year was not sufficient time for performing the work. The appeal would therefore be dismissed.

ROWELL V. ROWELL.*

Married Woman—Deed of separation—Question whether deed put an end to by subsequent cohabitation.

This was an appeal from the judgment of Mr. Justice Grantham at the trial of the action without a jury, reported in The Times of January 12. The action was brought by Mrs. Rowell, who was the keeper of a boarding-house in Montague-place, to recover from the defendant, her husband, arrears of money which she alleged to be due to her under a separation deed. Owing to domestic differences the parties separated in March, 1896, and the deed of separation which was then executed contained an undertaking by the defendant to pay the plaintiff a weekly sum of £1 10s. so long as they should live separate, and also a sum of 10s. a week for the support of their child, a boy of the age of eight, while he was under 21 and while he was under the tutelage of his mother. The allowance having fallen into arrear, the plaintiff brought this action. The defence was that the deed of separation had been put an end to by the subsequent cohabitation of the parties. It appeared that the parties did not reside under the same roof, the wife continuing to keep her boarding-house, and the husband living in lodgings of his own. But on several occasions in 1897 they had intercourse together. They also often went to theatres and places of amusement together, and the husband frequently had tea at the wife's house, when they spent the evening together. Mr. Justice Grantham held that the evidence did not show that the parties lived together as husband and wife, and he was therefore of opinion that the deed had not been put an end to, and he gave judgment for the plaintiff. The defendant appealed.

Mr. McCall, Q.C., and Mr. Priestley appeared for the defendant; Mr. Witt, Q.C., and Mr. Sinclair for the plaintiff.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE said the case was not free from difficulty. After going carefully through the provisions of the deed of separation, he pointed out that it was clear that the payment of 30s. a week was to come to an end if the parties ceased to live separate and apart, and that the payment of 10s. a week was to come to an end if the child ceased to live under the tutelage of his mother. The evidence showed that after the deed of separation the parties on four occasions had intercourse together; and in addition to that they met frequently in a more or less friendly way. But, having regard to the circumstances under which the intercourse took place, he thought that they continued to live apart in the real sense of the word, and it was important to notice that the husband continued to make payments after the acts of intercourse. In his judgment, if the Court arrived at the conclusion that a real reconciliation and coming together had taken place, the result would be that the whole deed would have come to an end. But the facts did not seem to warrant that conclusion. If the Court gave judgment for the defendant, the defendant would not be under any liability at all with regard to the support of the boy, except the common law liability of a father to support his child; for, if the parties had really come together again, the boy would be no longer under the tutelage of his mother. There was no authority which said that casual intermittent acts of intercourse were enough to put an end to a deed of separation, though such acts, if unexplained, were strong evidence of a reconciliation. On the whole of the circumstances, though not without doubt, he thought that the defendant had not discharged the onus which lay upon him of showing that the parties had ceased to live separate.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL V. THE HANWELL URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL.*

Local Government—Urban District Council—Land acquired for special purpose—Sale of surplus land.

When land has been acquired by an urban authority for a particular purpose under the powers conferred by the Public Health Act, 1875, any land not used for that purpose must be sold, and the Local Government Board have no jurisdiction to authorize its use for another purpose.

This was an action by the Attorney-General at the relation of the Earl of Jersey for an injunction to restrain the defendants, the Hanwell Urban District Council, from erecting an isolation hospital for the reception of patients suffering from infectious diseases on certain lands in the parish of Hanwell, Middlesex, which had been acquired by the rural sanitary authority of the Brentford Union, the defendants' predecessors in title, from the plaintiff, the Earl of Jersey, in 1883 for the purpose of disposing of the sewage of the parish; and from using the lands, or any part thereof, as the site of any such hospital. The plaintiffs claimed a further injunction to restrain the defendants from using the lands as a site for any such hospital so as to be a nuisance to the earl or his tenants, or a nuisance or injury to his adjoining property. The earl is the owner of the Osterley estate in Hanwell, consisting of arable and pasture land, and also of building land. In 1883 the Brentford Union, as the then sanitary authority of the district, purchased from the earl a piece of land of about 12 acres forming part of the Park farm included in the Osterley estate for the express purpose of the disposal of the sewage of the parish of Hanwell. The purchase for that purpose was sanctioned by the Local Government Board on the petition of the sanitary authority, and after an inquiry as to its propriety. The greater part of the land so acquired was accordingly used exclusively for the sewage purposes contemplated; but in 1896 the defendants, as the successors of the Brentford sanitary authority, proposed utilizing about two acres of the land they had purchased, not required for sewage purposes, for the erection of a hospital for infectious diseases other than smallpox. A public inquiry was then held, on December 17, 1896, by a Local Government Board inspector, and the result was that by an order under the seal of the Board, and dated April 3, 1897, the Board directed that the two acres should be retained by the defendants as a site for the erection of a hospital for infectious diseases other than smallpox. The plaintiffs thereupon brought the present action, contending that the defendants had no power, either statutory or otherwise, to use the land for any other purpose than that for which it had been originally acquired. They also stated that the two acres would be required for a proposed extension of the existing sewage works; also that the erection of the intended hospital would inevitably be a great nuisance to the neighbourhood and, in particular, to the earl himself as owner of the adjoining property, and would completely destroy the value of that property for building purposes. The defendants relied on the order they had obtained from the Local Government Board, and contended that they were entitled to use the two acres for an isolation hospital, although that was not the purpose for which they and the rest of the 12 acres were originally required. They also denied the plaintiffs' allegations of nuisance or injury.

*Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

*Reported by G. I. FOSTER COOKS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The action now came on for trial. Mr. Renshaw, Q.C., and Mr. Howard Wright appeared for the plaintiffs; and Mr. Warrington, Q.C., and Mr. Stallard for the defendants.

MR. JUSTICE KEENE said the principle from which one approached a case of this kind was that no public body whatever, whether a local authority or a railway company, could, after having properly acquired land for a particular purpose, apply that land for any other purpose. Public bodies were authorized to buy land for particular purposes. So far as the land was not required for the particular purpose, it was land which they were not to hold. Whether they held it under the Public Health Act, 1875, with a direction to sell, was immaterial. The land was not absolutely theirs; they had not got the fee-simple free from all charges, encumbrances, and limitations; they only held it for certain purposes. The question, therefore, in the present case resolved itself into this, Could this public body, having acquired this land for sewage purposes, be said to hold it for the purpose now contemplated? If they had not the power, if it was not within their ownership, then they were using their property for purposes which were unauthorized, and they would be restrained. The question put by the defendants really depended on section 175 of the Public Health Act, 1875. They had acquired the land with perfect propriety; they had acquired it for sewage purposes. The section said:—"Any local authority may for the purposes and subject to the provisions of this Act purchase or take on lease, sell or exchange any lands, whether within or without their district. . . . Any lands acquired by a local authority in pursuance of any powers in this Act contained and not required for the purpose for which they were acquired shall (unless the Local Government Board otherwise direct) be sold. . . ." To make that section apply it must be ascertained that the land was not required for the purpose for which it had been acquired. Unless that was done the local authority did not bring themselves within the section at all. His Lordship was not now concerned with any question as to whether this land ought to be sold or not; but he was told that there was a fetter on the sale, a limit introduced, no doubt, by the Legislature to avoid questions under the Lands Clauses Act. If the Local Government Board directed that the land not required for the purposes for which it had been acquired should not be sold, it would not be sold. But then it was argued that the meaning of the section was that the Local Government Board might not merely direct a sale, but might direct the local authority to apply the land to other purposes. That would be using words which were certainly not within the statute. All that the Act said was that the Local Government Board might direct that the land should not be sold, leaving other questions open. He saw no reason for concluding that, because the Board had discretion to say the land should not be sold, therefore it was empowered to say that the land should be applied to purposes other than those for which it had been acquired. On that construction of the Act he certainly agreed with the counsel for the plaintiffs. It was strange that though the order of the Local Government Board, dated April 3, 1897, purported to be made under section 175, the draftsman of the order did not follow the words of the section. In his Lordship's construction of the Act there was no jurisdiction whatever in the Local Government Board to make such an order as this. It would be giving the local authority an entirely new power, a power entirely alien to the purposes for which the land had been acquired and totally unauthorized. Then it was said the case was concluded by section 295, which enacted that "all orders made by the Local Government Board in pursuance of this Act shall be binding and conclusive in respect of the matters to which they refer." That would not prevent the Court from considering a question of jurisdiction. If it could be properly made, then, no doubt, an order made under section 175 would be conclusive. The authorities, his Lordship did not think, required to be examined in detail. The only one he thought it necessary to refer to was "Attorney-General v. Teddington Urban Council" ([1898] 1 Ch., 66). There Mr. Justice Romer held that the local authority must not use land for purposes inconsistent with the purposes for which it had been acquired. That case also showed that the Court would be liberal in considering the purposes for which the land had been acquired. But the learned Judge was quite clear that the local authority was not entitled to use land for purposes which, though not entirely alien to the purposes for which it had been acquired, would yet permanently interfere with those purposes. The result was that the defendants, the local authority, were without any order on which they could properly rest, and were using this land for purposes for which it was not originally acquired—this they had no authority to do. The plaintiffs were therefore entitled to an injunction to restrain the defendants from using this land as a site for a hospital for infectious diseases other than smallpox. The claim for an injunction on the ground of nuisance went too far, but that did not disentitle the plaintiffs to the whole costs of the action. It was sufficient to grant an injunction to restrain the defendants from what his Lordship considered to be an excess of their statutory powers.

SHARMAN V. MASON.*

Bankruptcy—Order and disposition—Goods lent for use in business.

This was an appeal from the Mayor's Court. The action was brought to recover possession of 32 stands used in the business of a mantle dealer to show off the dresses to advantage, or damages for their conversion. These stands were the property of the plaintiff, who had lent them to his brother to enable him to set up in business as a mantle maker at 57, Newington-causeway. The brother afterwards, in or about January, 1896, sold his business to a Mrs. Wright, a mantle-dealer, who traded under the name of Roberts and Co., he himself becoming manager of the business so sold. In January, 1898, Mrs. Wright was adjudicated a bankrupt, and the defendant, the trustee in bankruptcy, took away the stands and removed them to 113, Newington-causeway. The plaintiff then demanded the goods, and a correspondence ensued between the solicitors to the parties, the defendant offering to return certain stands which the plaintiff denied were the stands removed. This action was then brought to recover the stands removed or damages for their wrongful detention. The plaintiff, in his evidence before the Recorder in the Mayor's Court, said that he knew Mrs. Wright was using these stands in her business as Roberts and Co. The defendant pleaded section 44 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and that the stands were in the order and disposition of the bankrupt, so that she was the reputed owner of them, and that, therefore, the defendant, as trustee, was justified in taking them. The learned Recorder left the question to the jury whether these stands were "in the possession, order, and disposition of the bankrupt in her trade or business by the consent and permission of the true owner under such circumstances that she was the reputed owner thereof." The jury answered in the affirmative, and the learned Judge accordingly gave judgment for the defendant. The plaintiff appealed.

Mr. Jelf, Q.C., and Mr. Crampton appeared for the appellant; Mr. Danckwerts for the respondent.

MR. JUSTICE RIDLEY, in the course of reading his written judgment, said that the question for decision was whether these stands used for the exhibition of goods for sale, but not being a part of the goods for sale, were goods in the order and disposition of the bankrupt within the meaning of section 44, subsection 3 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. The words of that section had more than once been the subject of judicial construction. See "In re Jenkinson" (15 Q.B.D., 441; 54 L.J., Q.B., 601); "Colonial Bank v. Whinney" (30 Ch.D., 261; 55 L.J., Ch., 585; 11 Ap. Cas., 426; 56 L.J., Ch., 43). In the latter case the decision was that, as the custom of the firm was to buy shares out of the partnership money, and use them for the partnership business, and as those shares were intended to be so used, they were within the order and disposition of the bankrupt within the meaning of the statute. The stands, though in a different way, were quite as much connected with the trade or business as were the shares in the "Colonial Bank" case. There was evidence upon which the jury might properly find as they did, and the appeal must be dismissed.

MR. JUSTICE DARLING concurred. Having regard to the language of Judges of late years, he could not think that such phrases as "The goods must be such as the party suffers the trader to sell as his own" could now be accepted, although they were quoted with apparent approval by Parke, B., in "Whitfield v. Brand" (16 M. and W., 286). It was there pointed out by Parke, B., that the words now stand as "possession, order, or disposition," instead of "possession, order, and disposition." He (Mr. Justice Darling) thought, therefore, that it was enough if these goods were in the possession of the bankrupt in his trade or business, although they were not in his disposition therein in the sense that they were such things as he sold in his trade. The words "order or disposition" seemed to him necessary to enlarge the word "possession" so as to include something beyond visible occupation by a reputed owner. There was extreme force in the following passage from the judgment of Cotton, L. J., in "Colonial Bank v. Whinney":—"What meaning are we to give to these words? Of course where the goods are in the nature of stock in trade there is no difficulty, goods apparently forming part of the stock in trade of the firm must be in the order or disposition of the bankrupt in his trade or business. But, in my opinion, the words go further than that. I think the true construction is that the goods must be in his order or disposition for the purposes of or purposes connected with his trade or business." It was plain that the words used by the Lord Justice would cover goods much less directly connected with the bankrupt's trade than were those in question. Further on in the same case, Lindley, L. J., construed these words as meaning "not merely visibly employed in his trade or business, but acquired for the purposes of the business and used for those purposes." The decision of the Court of Appeal in which these expressions were used was reversed by the House of Lords, but the reasoning of the Lords Justices upon those points remained unaffected by that decision.

Appeal dismissed.

CORNFORD V. THE CARLTON BANK (LIMITED).*

Malicious Prosecution—Corporation—Malice—Evidence.

Decision of Darling, J. (15 The Times L.R., 156), affirmed, but the damages reduced.

This was an appeal by the defendants from the judgment of Mr. Justice Darling in an action for malicious prosecution, reported in 15 The Times L.R., 156; [1899] 1 Q.B., 392. In this case Mr. Justice Darling held that an action for malicious prosecution would lie against a corporation, and, as will be seen, counsel for the appellants declined to argue this point in the Court of Appeal. The facts were shortly these. The plaintiff, a married woman, was the owner of a grocer's shop at Hastings with an off licence attached to it, and her name appeared in small letters over the door of the shop as the licensed person, while simply "Cornford" in large letters appeared over the shop. The defendants were a limited company incorporated under the Companies Acts, who lent money and whose head office was in London. One Gower applied to the defendants through their agent at Hastings for a loan and they advanced £5 upon a promissory note signed by Gower and by the plaintiff's husband as surety. Before the plaintiff's husband became surety he, at an interview with the defendants' agent, filled up a form of declaration to the effect that he was a householder, that the business belonged to him, and that the goods at the shop were his. At this interview the plaintiff and Gower were present, the plaintiff going in and out of the room during the interview. Default having been made in repayment of the loan, judgment was obtained against the plaintiff's husband, and execution was levied on the goods in the shop. The plaintiff claimed the goods, and upon an interpleader issue in the Hastings County Court, Judge Martineau gave judgment for her. The Judge, in his judgment, said that he saw no reason to suppose that the plaintiff knew the contents of the declaration signed by her husband, and he was of opinion that neither the plaintiff nor her husband intended to deceive. Subsequently, an information was sworn by the defendants' agent against Gower, the plaintiff, and her husband, charging them with conspiracy to defraud, and a summons was issued. The case was heard before the borough magistrates, when the charge against the plaintiff and Gower was dismissed and the husband was committed for trial, but the grand jury threw out the bill. The plaintiff thereupon brought this action. The learned Judge, who tried the action without a jury, held that the prosecution was instituted without reasonable and probable cause, and that the defendants acted with malice. He also held that an action for malicious prosecution would lie against a corporation. He accordingly gave judgment for the plaintiff, and assessed the damages at £100. The defendants appealed.

Mr. MCCALL, Q.C., and Mr. P. ROSE-INNES, for the defendants, contended that the plaintiff had not proved absence of reasonable and probable cause, and that there was no evidence of actual malice. The learned counsel stated that he did not propose to argue the point that an action for malicious prosecution would not lie against a corporation. Upon the question of malice, he contended that there was no evidence of malice in the directors of the company, nor in any servant or agent of the company, and, even if the Court came to the conclusion that there was evidence of malice in a servant or agent of the company, that was not evidence of malice in the directors, and the company were not liable.

Mr. MARSHALL HALL, Q.C., and Mr. R. E. MOORE appeared for the plaintiff, and said that they would leave the question as to the amount of damages in the hands of the Court.

The COURT dismissed the appeal, reducing the damages, however, to £50.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE said that to entitle the plaintiff to recover she must prove two things; first, that there was no reasonable and probable cause for the prosecution, and, secondly, that the defendants in instituting the prosecution were actuated by malice. His Lordship then went carefully through the evidence, and stated that he wished to deal with a proposition advanced by the defendants' counsel that the Court had only to consider the state of mind of the directors of the company. A limited company as a legal entity was itself as incapable of malice as it was of love or affection. Malice must be deduced from the acts of servants and officials of the company, and in determining whether there was malice or not regard must be had not only to the acts and conduct of the directors, but also to the acts and conduct of other servants or agents of the company who were acting within the scope of their authority and charged with the institution of the prosecution. His Lordship came to the conclusion upon the whole of the facts that the learned Judge was justified in holding that there was no reasonable and probable cause for the prosecution, and in his (the Lord Chief Justice's) opinion there was evidence of actual malice, and the learned Judge who heard the witnesses came to the conclusion that there was malice, and he (the Lord Chief Justice) saw no reason to interfere. In his opinion, however, the damages were excessive, and justice would be met by assessing them at £50.

The LORDS JUSTICES delivered judgment to the same effect.

COMPANY (LIMITED) V. MUSGRAVE.*

Contract—Illegality—Bail in criminal case—Indemnity to surety—Deposit of shares.

An indemnity given to his bail, whether by the prisoner or by some third person, is illegal.

This was an action connected indirectly with the Brinsmead frauds. It may be recollected that three of the persons connected with the Brinsmead transactions were called Jordan, Bernard, and Ainsworth. Bernard and Ainsworth were prosecuted criminally and convicted, and are now undergoing sentence. The defendant in this action became bail for Jordan in £1,500. Jordan absconded and the bail was estreated. An arrangement had been made between Ainsworth and Musgrave that 1,500 shares in the London Woollen Company, which were transferred by the plaintiff company into the name of Musgrave, should be held by him as security to recoup Musgrave every loss suffered by him on account of his becoming bail for Ainsworth and Jordan. The object of this action was to compel Musgrave to retransfer the shares to the plaintiff company, who are now in liquidation. The question of legal interest in the case was whether, it being admitted by the defendant's counsel that an indemnity given by a prisoner to his bail was illegal, such indemnity given by a third person is also illegal. It is somewhat odd that no actual case could be found in the books covering the facts. The circumstances were complicated to a degree that can best be expressed by the popular epithet—mixed; and evidence as to what happened was scanty. Bernard and Ainsworth were company promoters connected with a large number of companies that may be said to have been identical with one company—the Consolidated Contract Corporation, whose name appears in these transactions. Among the companies they then controlled was the plaintiff company, which was a company that had a number of bona-fide shareholders. The documents in evidence were the transfer of shares by the plaintiff company to Musgrave for a nominal consideration in common form; a minute of a resolution of directors in the plaintiff company, dated December 23, 1897, in the following terms:—"The matter of guaranteeing costs re Brinsmead was considered, and the Consolidated Contract Corporation having agreed to pay by way of premium £100 and guaranteeing to indemnify this company against loss, it was resolved that 1,500 shares (London Woollen Preference) be lodged with Mr. C. G. Musgrave, on receipt of cheque from the Consolidated Contract Corporation, and a further 1,000 London Woollen Preference shares with Mr. J. Pronk"; and a letter dated December 23, 1897, from Musgrave to Harrison as follows:—"In consideration of your transferring into my name 1,500 shares in the London Woollen Company (Limited) I agree to become surety for you and Mr. Francis Richard Jordan in the sum of £1,500 each to appear at the High Court of Justice on the trial of 'Regina v. Brinsmead and others,' and also to enter into the required recognisances with regard thereto and as to payment of costs. And I further agree in the event of my not being called upon under the terms of my recognizance to make any payment to retransfer the said shares to you, or, in the event of my being called upon to provide any sum of money, to dispose only of sufficient shares to recoup for me the amount so paid by me, it being clearly understood, on the other hand, that should I be called upon to pay such an amount as the shares in question are not sufficient to realize, that you will pay me any such amount over and above the amount realized by the sale of the shares." That letter was written when proceedings of certiorari were pending to remove criminal proceedings against Jordan, Ainsworth, and others to the High Court. Those proceedings fell through, and Musgrave gave fresh bail to the magistrates to produce the prisoners for trial at the Central Criminal Court. The bail for Jordan was extracted, and Musgrave retained the shares. In the investigation of the plaintiff company's affairs by the liquidator, the proceedings came to light, and this action resulted.

Mr. Halsane, Q.C., and Mr. Kenyon Parker were for the plaintiffs; the Hon. E. C. Macnaghten, Q.C., and Mr. Cassel for Musgrave; and Mr. Stewart Smith for the London Woollen Company, a formal party.

Mr. Justice North held that, apart from the question of illegality, Musgrave was entitled to enter into an arrangement as to the shares with Harrison. He had no notice of the resolution of the plaintiff company, or knowledge that the shares belonged to them, the inference to be drawn from the fact that the shares had stood in the name of the plaintiff company, and were transferred by them for a nominal consideration that he should himself draw was that the shares did not belong to the company. As to the illegality of the transaction, it had been argued that there was a difference between the case where indemnity was given by a prisoner himself and the case where it was given by a stranger to the bail. No reported case had been before the Courts where an indemnity had been given by a stranger; but the principle on which the cases were decided and the reasons given were equally applicable to a case where the indemnity was given by the prisoner himself, and to the case where the indemnity was found by a stranger; the public had not the same protection in the interest of the bail to enforce the powers he had to see that the prisoner did not abscond. His lordship read from the judgment in the case of "Cripps v. Hartnoll" (4 Best and Smith, 414), a passage from "Petersdorp on Bail," stating that it was essential to the security of the bail that the principal should be compelled to appear, and setting out what powers the bail had to enforce the appearance. These powers a person who was not himself bail did not possess. His lordship referred to the statements of the law relied on by defendants' counsel in "Pollock on Contracts" and "Leake on Contracts," saying that the effect of the cases was correctly epitomized and the statements did not bear out the defendants' contention. He must hold that the transaction was illegal and void. Then it was said that the plaintiff could not get back the property. He could understand that if Ainsworth was proceeding against Musgrave he could see a difficulty in his way. It was proved to him that the plaintiffs were the real owners and he must make a decree for a retransfer.

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL V. READ.*

Bread—Weighing bread—Selling bread otherwise than by weight—Selling twopenny loaf—3 (Geo. IV., c. cvi., sec. 4.

This case raised the question whether a baker or grocer is entitled to sell household bread under the description of a "twopenny loaf" without any regard to its weight. In form it was an argument on a special case stated by justices of the peace for the County of London sitting as a Court of Summary Jurisdiction in the Town-hall, Kensington. A summons had been issued on the complaint of H. C. Strugnell, an inspector in the employment of the County Council, charging William Read with having on March 15, 1899, sold bread otherwise than by weight contrary to statute 3 Geo. IV., c. cvi., s. 4. That Act, in effect, provides that from and after the passing of the Act all bread sold by bakers or sellers of bread shall be sold by weight, and in case it is sold otherwise the baker or seller shall incur a penalty; provided that nothing in the Act is to prevent the sale otherwise than by weight of French bread, fancy bread, or rolls. The ingredients of which bread dealt with by the statute is to be made are specified in section 2 thereof. The justices dismissed the summons subject to the special case, which set out the material facts in substance as follows:—The respondent, William Read, was a grocer and general dealer carrying on business in North End-road, Fulham. On March 15 the inspector, H. C. Strugnell, sent one Alfred Bond to purchase a loaf of bread at Read's shop. Alfred Bond entered the shop, and asked for a twopenny loaf and was served by Read with a loaf similar in shape and appearance to the ordinary cottage loaf usually sold as a twopenny loaf, for which he paid twopence. Bond said that this loaf was not weighed by any one in his presence, and that nothing was said to him as to its weight. There was no evidence before the justices that the loaf had ever been weighed. It was subsequently weighed by the inspector himself and found to weigh some 2oz. less than 2lb. At the hearing of the summons it was contended on behalf of Read that he was not asked for bread by weight, but was asked for a twopenny loaf, and accordingly supplied one of that value; that he was not a baker but only a seller of bread; that he had bought this particular bread knowing that the weight of each loaf was less than 2lb., it having been made of the weight of about 1½lb. each loaf on purpose for sale at 2d. per loaf; that he could not afford to sell 2lb. in weight at 2d., and that his price for a 2lb. loaf was 2½d.; that the purchaser had asked not for a 2lb. loaf but for a twopenny loaf. The justices held that the vendor was not bound to sell 2lb. or any particular weight of bread and dismissed the summons, and the inspector being dissatisfied with this decision applied for and obtained the special case as above stated.

Mr. HORACE AVORY, for the London County Council, contended that the object and policy of the Act, 3 Geo. IV., c. cvi., was that household bread should be sold by weight and in no other way whatever, and that a seller of bread was not excused from selling bread by weight merely because the purchaser had asked for bread by denomination and without specifying the weight he required. Before this statute bread could only be sold in loaves weighing 4lb. This statute enabled bakers and sellers of bread to sell bread by any weight, provided it was sold by weight and not otherwise. Counsel cited the case of "Hill v. Browning" (L.R., 5 Q.B., 458).

The justices were not represented.

The COURT, after expressing regret that no argument was forthcoming in support of the decision of the justices, held that that decision was wrong in law and remitted the case to the justices with a direction to convict.

THE MORGENGRY AND THE BLACKCOCK.*

The ship A collided with the B, which was in tow of the C. In an action against the owners of the B and C judgment went against the former by default, and the B, which had been sunk by the collision, was raised and sold for £855, which was paid into Court. As regards the C, both the A and the C were held to blame.

Held, that the C was liable to pay half the A's damage without getting credit for the £855 paid into Court, so long as the owners of the A did not get more than the total amount of their loss.

This was an appeal from an order made by Mr. Justice Bucknill sitting in Admiralty, reported in 15 The Times L.R., 547. The action was brought by the Newry and Kilkeel Steamship Company, as the owners of the steamship Mourne, against the owners of the barque Morgengry and the owners of the steam-tug Blackcock, for damage by collision. At the time of the collision the Morgengry was in tow of the Blackcock, and the actual collision was between the Mourne and the Morgengry. The owners of the Morgengry, who were foreigners, made default in delivering a defence, and a decree was made for judgment by default, and the Morgengry, which had been sunk by the collision, was raised and sold for £855, which sum was paid into Court. The action, as against the Blackcock, came on for trial before Mr. Justice Bucknill, and both vessels, the Mourne and the Blackcock, were held to blame. The question of damages was referred to the Registrar, and when the matter came before the learned Judge to determine what amount the Blackcock should pay it appeared that the damage sustained by the Mourne had been assessed at £4,230. The plaintiffs contended that, according to the Admiralty rule applicable where both vessels are held to blame, the owners of the Blackcock were liable to pay half that sum—viz., £2,115. The owners of the Blackcock, on the other hand, contended that they were entitled to have credit given to them for the sum of £855, which had been paid into Court. Mr. Justice Bucknill held that the plaintiffs were entitled to take the £855 out of Court and to receive from the owners of the Blackcock the sum of £2,115, so long as they did not recover more than the total amount of their loss. The owners of the Blackcock appealed.

Mr. Carver, Q.C., and Mr. D. Stephens appeared for the defendants, the owners of the Blackcock; Mr. Batten appeared for the plaintiffs.

The COURT, having taken time to consider, delivered judgment, dismissing the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH read the following judgment:—On December 17, 1898, a collision took place in the Bristol Channel between three ships, the steamship Mourne, the barque Morgengry, and the tug Blackcock, which then had the barque in tow, and it is not in dispute that by reason of the collision the steamship Mourne sustained damage to the amount of £4,146. Under a decree of the Court of Admiralty in a suit instituted by the owners of the steamship against the barque, the latter was sold and the net proceeds of the sale, which only realized the sum of £855, were paid into Court. The question is whether the owners of the tug under the circumstances which exist in this case have any claim to be credited in any way and what way with this £855. My brother Bucknill has held that they are not, and has ordered the £855 to be paid out to the plaintiffs in part satisfaction of their damage of £4,146, and against this order it is that the owners of the tug appeal. To understand this case it is necessary to bear in mind what judgments have been given and are still standing; for these in my opinion play an important part in the determination of this case. And when these and the other facts are understood, much of the complexity which has arisen during the arguments of the learned counsel for the appellants, the tug-owners, vanishes. The material facts are these. The collision having taken place as above mentioned, the owners of the steamship brought an action in the Admiralty Division against the owners of the barque for the damage occasioned to them by the collision brought about, as they alleged, by the negligent navigation of those on board the barque, which damage we know amounted to £4,146. Subsequently the plaintiffs added the owners of the tug as defendants. The owners of the barque upon being served with process, though they at first appeared, did not further contest their liability to the plaintiffs, they filed no preliminary act, they put in no defence, they set up no cross-claim, and their appearance was struck out for default of filing a preliminary act; and they thereby, as it appears to me, clearly admitted as regards themselves that they were solely to blame for the collision complained of by the plaintiffs. In these circumstances, upon February 27, 1899, the learned President pronounced in favour of the plaintiffs for damages against the owners of the barque, subject to a reference to the Registrar and merchants to report thereon, and he condemned the barque in the said damages and costs, and decreed the barque to be appraised and sold. This decree stands unreversed and unappealed against. The sale took place, and the sum of £855, which was all the barque realized after payment of expenses, was in due course paid into Court in the plaintiffs' action. If the barque had realized the sum of £4,146, in my opinion the plaintiffs, under their judgment against the owners of the barque, would have been entitled to the whole of that sum, and, if they had been responsible persons, the plaintiffs under their judgment might have recovered that amount from them. As, however, the net value of the barque by no means covered the damage sustained by the plaintiffs by reason of the collision—viz., the £4,146—the plaintiffs proceeded with their action against the owners of the tug, the owners of the barque being entirely left out and taking no part in the matter. The owners of the tug in the action against them set up by way of defence that the collision was solely caused by the negligent navigation of the steamship Mourne. When the action came on for trial the owners of the tug defended it, and Mr. Justice Bucknill, after hearing the evidence, assisted by the Elder Brethren, on March 24, 1899, pronounced that those on board the steamship Mourne and those on board the tug had been guilty of negligence as regards the collision, and he condemned the owners of the tug and their bail in a moiety of the damages proceeded for by the owners of the steamship Mourne, and referred the same to the Registrar and merchants to report the amount. The amount which has been thus reported was the moiety of the £4,146—viz., £2,073. The learned Judge, as appears from the shorthand notes of his judgment, found that there had been a bad look-out on board the tug, and that there was also a wilful obstinacy on the part of those on board the tug in not taking sufficient or proper steps to try and avoid a collision, and that they held on keeping with their engines full speed ahead and hard starboarding their helm. The learned Judge then proceeds to point out what the tug ought to have done, if she was in circumstances of difficulty in consequence of the negligent navigation of the Mourne, and that the tug did none of these things. No finding was asked for at the trial on the part of the owners of the tug, as is now in argument suggested for them, that the collision had been brought about solely by the joint negligence of the tow and tug, and, in the face of the finding of the learned Judge that there had been a bad look-out on board the tug and also wilful obstinacy on the part of those on board the tug, if such a finding had been asked for, it does not seem to me that it would necessarily have been obtained, as contended for on behalf of the tug-owners. But, at any rate, it was not asked for or obtained. No controversy arises as to the rule of the Court of Admiralty respecting damages when a collision has occurred by reason of the default of each of the colliding ships. The difference between the Admiralty rule and the common law rule is pointed out in many cases, in none more tersely than by Lord Blackburn in the House of Lords in the case of "Cayser v. Carron Company" (9 App. Cas., at p. 881). I need not refer further to it, for no dispute arises thereon, and the rule is well known. But the point which is now taken by the owners of the tug, when the plaintiffs ask for the payment out of Court of the £855 paid in under their judgment of February 27, 1899, against the owners of the barque, is that this £855 should be credited to them, and that the damages recoverable by the owners of the steamship under their judgment against the tug-owners is £2,073—being half of the £4,146—less £855, or that if the plaintiffs receive out of Court the £855 this £855 must be given credit for by them against the £2,073 payable by the tug-owners, so that the sum payable by them to the plaintiffs is £1,218, and not £2,073; or, if this be not correct, the £855 should be credited against the actual damage suffered by the owners of the steamship—viz., £4,146—which leaves a balance due from the tug-owners to the plaintiffs of £1,045—i.e., £4,146 minus £855, which comes to £3,291, half of which is £1,645, so that this sum, and not £2,073, must be paid by the tug-owners to the plaintiffs subject to a limitation decree to the amount of £1,802 the tug-owners have obtained, which does not affect this point. Now, in the circumstances of this case, in the face of the two separate and independent judgments in favour of the plaintiffs, one of February 27 against the owners of the barque, and the other of March 24 against the tug-owners, how can the tug-owners maintain they are entitled to credit for this £855 when called upon to pay under the judgment of March 24 the £2,073 adjudged against them? That the plaintiffs are entitled to the £855 for their own use under their judgment of February 27 is clear, and a great deal more if the barque had sold for more or its owners had been responsible people and able to pay, though it is now said by the tug-owners that the plaintiffs must credit this £855 to them in one or other of the ways above set out. How so? Under the plaintiffs' judgment of March 24 against the tug-owners it is decreed that the tug-owners shall pay to the plaintiffs a moiety of the damages proceeded for. What are they? Why, a moiety of the £4,146, the damages which they had in fact sustained, for it was the £4,146 which they proceeded for against the tug-owners, and not £4,146 minus £855. This is not the case where the plaintiffs have recovered their whole damages, £4,146, from the owners of the barque, and are then proceeding against the owners of the tug. These two separate judgments, the one against the owners of the barque and the other against the tug-owners, in my opinion conclude this case; they are clear upon their face, and are unappealed against. But, if it were otherwise, I do not agree with the argument of the tug-owners' counsel, that in the Admiralty Court in the case of a collision by a tow and its tug with a third vessel the acts of the tug are always held to be the acts of the tow, so that separate damages cannot be awarded against each, and that as a matter of law the collision must always be held to be brought about by the joint negligence of both tow and tug, if by negligence at all. It may be and is so in many cases, but as a matter of law certainly not in all cases. In the case which it was suggested at the bar covered the present, viz., the "Englishman and the Australia" ([1894] P., 239), it will be seen that the learned President, when holding the tow liable for the acts of the tug, expressly found that the tow could and should have restrained, but did not restrain, the speed of the tug, and held, therefore, both tow and tug jointly to blame for the collision. In the present case there is no such finding, and indeed, in my opinion, the finding as far as it goes is to the contrary; and moreover, in the case of the "Englishman and the Australia" there were no two separate and distinct judgments standing, as in the present case, against the tow and the tug. It is clear, too, from the judgment of Sir James Hannen in the "Niobe" (13 P.D., 55), that a tow is not always responsible for the acts of its tug, though in many cases it is. If it were open to me in this case now to hold that the negligent acts of the barque and the tug were joint acts of negligence upon the materials before me I could not do so, for what facts I have lead me to the conclusion that they were not; but in my opinion this is beside the real point I have to consider. For the reasons above, in my opinion, the plaintiffs are entitled to the £855 under their judgment of February 27 against the owners of the barque, and also to a moiety of the damages proceeded for under their judgment of March 24 against the owners of the tug—i.e., £2,073, though the tug-owners have been able, as before stated, to limit their liability as to this amount to the sum of £1,802. This appeal must be dismissed with costs.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS read the following judgment:—I think that the judgment of Mr. Justice Bucknill was quite right. The action, which is an action in the Admiralty Division for damage sustained by the Mournie from collision at sea, was originally against the owners of the Morgengry alone, but the writ was amended by the addition of the owners of the tug Blackcock as defendants. At the time of the collision the Morgengry was being towed by the Blackcock. The owners of the Morgengry appeared in the action, but, as they did not file their preliminary act within the time limited, their appearance was struck out, and the plaintiffs took judgment by default against the Morgengry for damage subject to a reference, and the Morgengry, which in the collision had been sunk in the mud and damaged, was by the judgment decreed to be appraised and sold. This judgment was given after hearing counsel for the owners of the tug Blackcock. The sale of the Morgengry yielded a net sum of £855 5s. 11d., which was lodged in Court to the credit of the Morgengry. This is the history of the action so far as it relates to the Morgengry. The other defendants, the owners of the tug Blackcock, defended the action and charged that the collision was due to the negligence of the plaintiffs, and at the trial it was adjudged that both the Mournie, the plaintiffs' vessel, and the Blackcock, the defendants' tug, were to blame; and, as the tug was not damaged, it was decreed that the owners of the Blackcock should be condemned in the moiety of the damage, that is, of the damage sustained by the Mournie, subject to a reference to assess the damage. The report on the damage has been made in pursuance, as I understand, of the orders in the respective judgments against the Morgengry and the Blackcock; and it appears by the report that the whole damage in which the Morgengry is condemned amounts to £4,231 0s. 3d., and that the moiety in respect of which the Blackcock is condemned amounts to £2,115 10s. 1d. These figures have been somewhat altered by matters which do not affect the question I am discussing. Subsequently to the making of this report the plaintiffs, the owners of the Mournie, moved for an order that the £855 5s. 10d., the net sum resulting from the sale of the Morgengry, should be paid out to the plaintiffs in part satisfaction of the amount of damage, interest, and costs pronounced for in this action; and the learned Judge, Mr. Justice Bucknill, after hearing counsel in Court both for the plaintiffs and for the owners of the Blackcock, made the order. This is the order appealed against by the owners of the Blackcock, who contend that in some shape or other they are entitled to credit for the £855 against the moiety of the damage in respect of which they have been condemned, either by writing it off the total damage before making the division to arrive at the moiety, or by writing it off the moiety itself. I think the owners of the Blackcock are entitled to nothing of the sort. The judgments obtained were no doubt interlocutory, because such judgments were subject to a reference, but the declaration of liability was final, and the liability was different as against the several defendants. I have no doubt that since the amendment adding the owners of the Blackcock as defendants the action might be treated as joint or several, and that, having regard to what has happened, the action must now be treated as resulting in several final judgments against the Morgengry and the Blackcock respectively. The judgments are different, the former has been condemned in the whole damage, the latter in the moiety. There is no reason why the owners of the Blackcock should have any credits in respect of moneys paid by the Morgengry, at all events till such payments exceed that moiety of the damage for which the Morgengry alone is responsible. In actions for tort at common law in which interlocutory judgments have been signed against some defendants for default such defendants do not get the benefit, as a rule, of the defences of defendants who go to trial and succeed; and, notwithstanding that such defendants who have gone to trial may have succeeded wholly or partially, damages may be assessed against the defaulters. It may be that, if there are two separate judgments for the same tort, and the measure of assessment is the same, a plaintiff cannot proceed to execution against a defendant without giving credit for any amounts he has received from other defendants. But in such a case each defendant is liable for the whole of the damages, and it seems to me that cannot apply where the respective defendants are not liable for the same damages, the one being liable for the whole and the other for half. It is also to be observed that there is no judgment or finding that the Mourne was to blame as against the Morgengry. If the Blackcock wished for such a finding, I think they should have asked for it by their defence.

THE QUEEN V. W. H. NASH, ESQ., REVISING BARRISTER —EX PARTE GORDON.*

Election Law—Registration—Local Government —Parochial electors—Revising barrister—Local Government Act, 1894.

It is the duty of a revising barrister to revise the ownership and occupation lists of parochial electors and the ownership claims for registration as parochial electors.

In this case cause was shown by the revising barrister appointed to revise the lists of voters in the Tewkesbury and Stroud Divisions of the county of Gloucester against a rule for a mandamus obtained by the clerk of the Gloucestershire County Council calling upon him to revise the parochial electors' lists in the said divisions, and to hear and determine the claims of persons to have their names entered in the said lists in respect of ownership and occupation of property in the said divisions. It appeared from an affidavit made by the relator that the revising barrister had declined to revise the ownership and occupation portions of the parochial electors' lists of voters and the ownership claims to be placed upon such lists on the ground that he had no jurisdiction to do so.

Mr. H. SUTTON (Mr. M. Powell with him) showed cause on behalf of the revising barrister. He said that the Local Government Act of 1894, by which the parish councils were created, did not provide for the separate revision by the revising barrister of lists of parochial electors. The only lists he was authorized to revise were (1) the lists of persons entitled or claiming to be entitled to a Parliamentary or local government vote in respect of an ownership qualification, and (2) those entitled or claiming to be entitled to a like vote in respect of an occupation qualification. The Act of 1894 did not authorize the preparation of any list over and above these two lists. All that that Act did was to provide for the marking of names appearing on the two lists for its own purposes, so that afterwards an official might pick out the names of voters in any given parish so as to form the register of parochial electors. It was said that an inconvenience would arise if this view were adopted, because a married woman not being entitled to be on the register of Parliamentary ownership voters would have to make a claim year by year in order to ensure that her name should appear upon the register of parochial elections. But the only guide to be followed was the Act of Parliament itself. Confirmation of the revising barrister's view would be found in it. Section 2 (1) provided as follows:—"The parish meeting for a rural parish shall consist of the following persons, in this Act referred to as parochial electors, and no others—namely, the persons registered in such portion either of the local government register of electors or of the Parliamentary register of electors as relates to the parish"; section 43 provided:—"For the purposes of this Act a woman shall not be disqualified by marriage for being on any local government register of electors, or for being an elector of any local authority . . ."; and section 44 (9) provided:—"Any person may claim for the purpose of having his name entered in the parochial electors' list, and the law relating to claims to be entered in lists of voters shall apply." It was intended that a person not already on the register of Parliamentary or local government voters and who desired to be on the register of parochial electors should make a claim to be put on the Parliamentary register of voters, and then, under section 44 (6), if the claimant was not entitled to be registered as a Parliamentary voter, but only as a parochial elector, the name would be marked by the revising barrister in such a way as to indicate that he was only entitled to be registered as a parochial elector. The revising barrister's position in the present case was twofold. In the first place he declined to look at the claims to be on the parochial register unless made for the Parliamentary or county electors' register, thence to be transferred, if necessary, to the parochial list; and, secondly, that having revised the two lists—the ownership and the occupation lists—he had done all that was required of him.

Mr. Macmorran, Q.C., and Mr. Roskill appeared for the Gloucestershire County Council in support of the rule.

Mr. MACMORRAN, Q.C., said this rule was not obtained because it was thought that the revising barrister had not properly discharged his duty, but in order to raise a pure point of law. In the ownership list if the name of a person appeared as qualified in respect of two parishes a mark would be placed against the name as regards one of the parishes and the name would go into the parochial electors' list.

*Reported by C. G. WILBRAHAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

If the revising barrister did not in succeeding years revise the last-mentioned list the name would remain on the list perpetually, notwithstanding the person might have ceased to be qualified in that parish. It was clearly, therefore, the duty of the revising barrister to revise not only the ownership and occupation lists and the list of claims, but also the list of parochial electors. Section 44 (6) provided that, in any case where a name had to be marked or erased because it appeared more than once in the list, the revising barrister shall, where it appeared that the person was entitled to vote only as a parochial elector, place a mark against the name, signifying that the person was entitled to be registered as a parochial elector, and that the name so marked should not be printed in the Parliamentary register of electors, but in a separate list of parochial electors. Subsection 8 of the same section provided that "such separate lists shall form part of the register of parochial electors of the parish . . . and the law relating to the register of electors shall, with the necessary modifications, apply accordingly, and the lists shall, for the purposes of this Act, be deemed to be part of such register." Therefore, if the revising barrister did not revise the list of parochial electors and claims to be parochial electors, he only revised a portion, and not the whole, of the lists. The Registration Order, 1895, provided a separate form for the list of claimants to be entered in the parochial electors' list. The revising barrister was wrong in refusing to revise that part of the list which consisted of parochial electors only, and in not revising the list of ownership claims to be registered as parochial electors only.

MR. JUSTICE RIDLEY said that the rule must be made absolute. The revising barrister was bound to take into consideration the ownership and occupation lists of parochial electors and the ownership claims to be registered as parochial electors. Section 2 of the Act of 1894 gave ground for the opposite contention, but its provisions were subject to other provisions of the Act. Section 43 showed that there were certain persons who, though not entitled to a Parliamentary vote, could yet be registered as parochial electors, and section 44, subsection 6, provided for the creation of a separate list of parochial electors. Subsection 8 showed that that list was to be looked upon as part of the register of electors, and when that list came before the revising barrister it was in effect a part of the register. If there had been no machinery for the revision of this list it would remain just as it was and unrevised. Surely that could not have been intended. With regard to the list of claimants both as to ownership and occupation qualifications the case was clear, because it was expressly provided by subsection 9 of section 44 that a person may claim for the purpose of having his name entered in the list of parochial electors, and a separate form was provided for the lists of such claimants.

MR. JUSTICE DARLING gave judgment to the same effect.

The rule was accordingly made absolute.

BOSTOCK V. RAMSEY URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL.*

Malicious Prosecution—Obstruction of highway—Liability for act of employe—Reasonable and probable cause—Acting on counsel's opinion.

This was an action for damages for malicious prosecution. The defendants, in their defence, said that they had reasonable and probable cause for taking the proceedings they did against the plaintiff, and that they acted without malice and in the bona fide belief that they were discharging a public duty.

Dr. Blake Odgers, Q.C., and Mr. P. Rose-Innes appeared for the plaintiff; and Mr. Lawson Walton, Q.C., and Dr. Cooper were for the defendants.

Dr. BLAKE ODGERS, in opening the case, said that this action had arisen in the following circumstances. The plaintiff, Mr. Edward Henry Bostock, was the past proprietor of Wombwell and Bostock's Menagerie, but he resided at Glasgow and managed a menagerie which was permanently stationed there. His brother-in-law, Mr. Frank Bostock, managed a travelling menagerie, and on the occasion out of which the present dispute arose was taking the show from York to London. On December 15, 1897, it arrived at Ramsey, a town situated near Huntingdon. It appeared that at Ramsey there was a broad open space, with houses on either side, called the "Great Whyte," and a market was held there every Wednesday. Lord de Ramsey was lord of the manor and had the right of levying tolls on all carts, stalls, &c., standing on the "Great Whyte" on market days. This right he had let to a lady named Miss Groomes. On previous occasions the plaintiff's menagerie had visited Ramsey and the show had been held on the "Great Whyte." Everything went on smoothly until, after the passing of the Local Government Act, the urban district council came into office. The menagerie arrived at Ramsey on December 15, 1897, and the foreman saw Miss Groomes and obtained a contract from her for the use of the ground after payment of the fee of two guineas, and the show was set up on the "Great Whyte." An official of the district council then came and said that the show must not remain there; but he was told that a fee had been paid for the ground and was shown the space the vans would take up, after which he went away. The show was held and the next morning the menagerie proceeded to London. Nearly a year after this, on November 25, 1898, the plaintiff, Mr. E. H. Bostock, who had had no intimation that there had been any difficulty about the menagerie at Ramsey, received a letter from the district council informing him that they had preferred an indictment against him at the previous Huntingdon sessions for wilfully obstructing the highway at Ramsey, and that the grand jury had found a true bill. They further informed him that the next step would be for an application to be made for a warrant for his apprehension, and they therefore suggested that he should consent to appear before a justice and be bound over to attend the next assizes. The plaintiff expressed much surprise, and said he could hardly arrange to come from Glasgow to Huntingdon to answer an offence he knew nothing about. A good deal of correspondence then passed between the clerk of the council and the plaintiff, and the latter was told that unless he was willing to come to Ramsey to be bound over to attend the assizes a warrant must issue in the ordinary way. The plaintiff wrote apologizing for the obstruction and the answer was a demand for 30 guineas for costs which had been incurred. He declined to pay this, but came down from Glasgow to Ramsey and was bound over to appear at the Huntingdon Assizes on January 16. The case was tried before Mr. Justice Wilks, who in the course of the case expressed his opinion that Mr. Bostock was not responsible, and the jury found him not guilty. The plaintiff then brought this action against the defendants for malicious prosecution.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE intimated that this was a case in which counsel ought to come to some agreement.

*Reported by E. HARRISON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. LAWSON WALTON said that specific notice had been given to the plaintiff's manager not to cause the obstruction complained of.

The plaintiff was called and said that he had not been to Ramsey for 13 years, and the last time he was there the menagerie was pitched on the "Great Whyte" and no objection was made.

Cross-examined, the plaintiff said that his was the only name which appeared on the vans.

Mr. Henry Hines, the plaintiff's foreman, said that he was in charge of the show on the day in question. He had been to Ramsey once before a good many years ago. He went to see Miss Groomes when he arrived at Ramsey and she showed him where the ground was, and, after drawing up the vans, a gentleman came up and objected. Witness said he had a contract with the lady for the ground, and, after showing him where the vans would stand, he went away. Witness paid Miss Groomes two guineas. The show remained at Ramsey one night and started off early next morning.

Cross-examined, witness said he was asked to take the show to a field but he objected, because the lady had already let the ground to him.

Mr. Frank Bostock said that he had gone on to London, but returned to Ramsey the same evening. About 9 p.m. he received a document notifying that the district council had resolved that the "Great Whyte" was not to be obstructed by the menagerie.

Miss Groomes said that the Wednesday market was held originally in the High-street, but for more than 20 years she had taken tolls for stalls, carts, &c., standing in the "Great Whyte." She paid Lord de Ramsey rent for that right. The menagerie had always set up their vans on the "Great Whyte" as long as she could remember, and she had received tolls for them. The foreman on the occasion in question came to see her and asked if the show could stand on the "Great Whyte." She demurred, as she knew that the council objected, but gave leave as the day was market day, and she considered she had the right to.

Cross-examined, witness said that for some years there had been very few market stalls on Wednesdays. The council had objected to stalls standing on the "Great Whyte." She therefore suggested that the show should be held in the field.

Re-examined.—The menagerie used to come once in four or five years and the townspeople liked it.

For the defendants, Mr. Serjeant, clerk to the council, was called and he said that he remembered a time when a river ran down the "Great Whyte," which was subsequently covered over. A resolution in 1874 was passed by the local board, of which Lord de Ramsey was chairman, expressing the opinion that the property in the "Great Whyte" was vested in the local board. The menagerie was a considerable obstruction, and after discussion a resolution was passed that the clerk should take such proceedings as might be advisable against Messrs. Wombwell and Bostock. Counsel's opinion was taken, and it was resolved to prefer an indictment for obstruction against them. Witness could not find out where Mr. Bostock was, and it was not till November, 1898, that he discovered that he was living in Glasgow. The apology said to have been made by him was never received by the defendants. The defendants were in no way actuated by malice, but simply followed counsel's advice.

At the close of the evidence, Dr. BLAKE ODGERS contended that there was no reasonable and probable cause for preferring an indictment against the present plaintiff. The man who ought to have been indicted was the man who actually did obstruct. He also argued that the course of conduct pursued by the defendants towards the plaintiff was evidence of malice.

There being no questions of fact to go to the jury,

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE gave judgment, and said that the plaintiff had failed to make out his claim. There was no dispute about the facts. The plaintiff was not at Ramsey on the occasion in question, and knew nothing of what was done there, but he was the employer of the persons who did the things complained of, and his was the only name which appeared on the menagerie vans. There was distinct authority that if an act of obstruction was effected by an employé, even contrary to the instruction of the employer, yet he would be held liable ("Reg. v. Stephen," 7 Best and Smith, 710). Therefore if there was an obstruction in fact, which was not disputed, it was an indictable offence, for which the employer might be indicted, though he was not present and did not know the act was done. It was idle to suggest that in the proceedings taken the defendants were actuated by malice, or that there was an absence of reasonable and probable cause, if counsel's advice was taken and acted upon. A usual course had been adopted, and there must be judgment for the defendants, but without costs. This was not the case of a person coming and insisting on a right to do a particular act with the intention of persisting in it, but it was the case of a casual visitor, who had no notion of contesting the right of doing the thing complained of. In his Lordship's opinion the proper remedy for the defendants to have taken would have been to have ordered the vans to be promptly removed.

Judgment was entered for the defendants without costs.

BOOKER AND CO. V. THE POCKLINGTON STEAMSHIP COMPANY (LIMITED).*

Ship—Charter-party—Construction—"All salvage shall be for owners' and charterers' equal benefit"—Deductions before division—Net pecuniary result.

This action was tried upon an agreed statement of facts, which was as follows:—1. The defendants are the owners of the steamship Pocklington. The plaintiffs at the time material to the questions in this action were the charterers of the steamship. 2. By a charter-party dated August 9, 1898, and made between the plaintiffs and the defendants, the plaintiffs chartered the Pocklington for three round voyages between the United Kingdom, the West Indies, and (or) Bermuda at the rate of £525 per calendar month. The charter-party provided by Clause 2 that the owners should maintain the vessel in a thoroughly efficient state in hull and machinery for and during the service; by Clause 6, that if any damage prevented the working of the vessel for more than 24 hours the hire should cease until she was again in an efficient state to resume her service. Clause 20, "All derelicts and salvage shall be for owners' and charterers' equal benefit. Penalty for non-performance of this contract estimated amount of damages." 3. The plaintiffs' claim is to a moiety of some salvage earned by the Pocklington during the charter-party and to a return of hire. 4. On January 3, 1899, during the second voyage under the charter-party, the Pocklington fell in with the disabled steamer Dart, and rendered salvage services to her by towing her into Queenstown Harbour. 5. On January 9, 1899, the owners of the Pocklington, the defendants in this action, commenced an action in the Admiralty Court to recover salvage from the owners of the Dart, her cargo, and freight. 6. At the conclusion of her voyage in January, 1899, the Pocklington was docked, and repairs were being executed upon her from January 11 until January 24. 7. By their statement of claim in the salvage action the owners of the Pocklington alleged that "the Pocklington towed the Dart 313 miles and stood by at request for a very long time, and lost four days. Her hull, engines, and towing gear were strained and damaged and part of her cargo lost, and losses and expenses have been incurred." Particulars of the claim of such losses and expenses were delivered in the action, and consisted of (1) repairing damage done to the vessel; (2) renewing fractured tail-end shaft; (3) ropes and gear used in towage; (4) extra oil and coal; (5) port bill at Queenstown; and (6) detention during repairs. 8. The action for salvage came on for hearing before Mr. Justice Phillimore, who by his judgment awarded to the owners of the Pocklington the sum of £2,750, as well as the costs of the action. 9. The defendants contend that before dividing the award there should be deducted therefrom (1) the amount of the repairs attributable to the salvage services, (2) the cost of renewing the fractured tail and shaft, (3) the cost of ropes and gear used in towage, (4) the cost of extra oil and coal consumed, (5) the port bill at Queenstown, (6) the hire for the period during which the Pocklington was under repair, and (7) the balance of costs incurred in the salvage action over and above the taxed costs recovered from defendants, and that the balance is devisible between the present plaintiffs and defendants. 10. The plaintiffs contend that the amount to be divided should be the amount of the award, namely £2,750, less the extra costs in the salvage action as above, and that half of the balance is due from the defendants. The plaintiffs further contend that if the defendants are entitled to deduct the amounts set out in paragraph 9 hereof the plaintiffs are also entitled to have deducted from the award and paid to them in full the loss of time during the services and the cost of extra coal consumed. This contention the defendants admit. 11. The plaintiffs further contend that the defendants are not entitled to deduct the hire during the time the Pocklington was under repair inasmuch as the same does not represent hire earned under the terms of the charter-party. The opinion of the Court is desired upon the above contentions.

Mr. Carver, Q.C., and Mr. A. D. Bateson appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Butler Aspinall, Q.C., and Dr. Lennard for the defendants.

MR. JUSTICE BIGHAM read the following judgment:—If Clause 20 of the charter-party stood alone there could, I take it, be no doubt as to its meaning. "Equal benefit" cannot be accorded to shipowner and charterer without taking into account what each has contributed towards securing the benefit. Salvage in this clause does not mean the amount recovered in the suit in the Admiralty Court. It means the net pecuniary result of the salvage operations. Therefore, it follows that from the sum awarded by the Admiralty Court all the losses mentioned in paragraph 9 of the case must be deducted by the shipowner, and the balance only divided. Such a division will satisfy the requirements of Clause 20. But it is said that Clause 20 must be read by the light of the other clauses of the charter-party, and particularly of Clauses 2 and 6. I agree that the document is to be read as a whole, and that if it appears that some clauses are intended to qualify the interpretation of others effect must be given to such intention. I do not, however, think that any clause in the charter-party is intended to affect or alter what I conceive to be the clear meaning of Clause 20. Clause 2 provides that the shipowner is to maintain the vessel in a thoroughly efficient state for and during the service, and Clause 6 provides that if any damage prevents the working of the vessel for more than 24 hours the hire shall cease. The charterers say that the interpretation which I put on Clause 20 relieves the shipowners of the burdens which these two clauses impose upon them, and does it at the charterers' expense, inasmuch as it has the effect of reducing the amount of salvage to be divided. I do not however agree with this contention. It is the salvage operations which have caused the damage and the loss of hire, and the Admiralty Court, though not awarding to the ship a specific sum in respect thereof, has taken both heads of loss into consideration in fixing the amount payable by the salvaged vessel. In other words, if there had been no loss of hire and no damage to the vessel the award would have been proportionately less, and the charterers would have got what they get now, neither more nor less.

ROGERS V. ROSEGOOD.

Vendor and Purchaser—Contract—Covenants—Restrictive covenant—Covenant running with the land—Rights of assignees.

This action was brought by the trustees of the will of the late Sir John Millais, as owners of property in Palace-gate, and by W. R. Rogers, the owner of adjoining property, for the purpose of enforcing restrictive covenants against the defendant, who is the owner of the property known as Thorney-house at the corner of Palace-gate and Kensington-gore, and proposes to build a large block of residential flats upon it. On May 31, 1869, the then Duke of Bedford purchased a plot of land, which was part of the property to which the action related, from Messrs. Cubitt and Co., and covenanted to erect thereon not more than one messuage, or dwelling-house, which was to be used for a private residence only, and no trade or business was to be carried on there. Subsequently, on July 31 in the same year, he purchased an adjoining plot upon similar conditions, except that there was no restriction as to the number of houses to be built upon it. These covenants were expressed to be intended "to enure for the benefit of" Messrs. Cubitt and Co., "their heirs and assigns, or others claiming under them for any of their lands adjoining or near to" the property purchased by the Duke. The Duke subsequently purchased another adjoining plot, with respect to which no covenants were entered into. Sir John Millais bought his property in Palace-gate from Messrs. Cubitt in 1873 and built a house upon it. The conveyance to him contained no express assignment of the benefit of the covenant entered into by the Duke of Bedford. In 1872 the Duke of Bedford died, and his successor no longer wished to live at Thorney-house. In order to enable him to dispose of the property more freely, Messrs. Cubitt in 1876 executed a deed releasing him, so far as they could, from the covenant relating to the number of houses to be built on the property. The plaintiff Rogers, who was one of the firm of Cubitt and Co., and consequently one of the original covenantees, purchased property in Palace-gate from the firm after the date of this release. The defendant had purchased from the Duke's devisees.

MR. HALDANE, Q.C., and Mr. CHRISTOPHER JAMES, for the plaintiffs, argued that the cases relating to the enforcement of restrictive covenants by the assignees of the original covenantee fell into three classes—(1) those where there is a building scheme; (2) those where there has been an express assignment to the assignee of the benefit of the covenants; and (3) those where there has been a distinct expression of intention that the covenants shall be for the benefit of the assignees. The present case fell under the last head. The covenants were intended to enure for the benefit of the assignee, even if he was unaware of their existence. The benefit of the covenant was distributed and, as it were, annexed to every part of the covenantees' adjoining land; in this respect the case was like that of a building scheme. The benefit of the covenants ran with the land at law, and not only in equity. Even if Sir John Millais and his executors did not become entitled to the benefit of the covenants, yet the plaintiff Rogers was entitled to enforce them. The projected block of flats would involve a breach of the covenants. Either it was more than one house, and consequently a breach of the portion forbidding the erection of more than one, or else, if it was only one house, it involved carrying on a trade or business, and was not used as "a private residence," an expression which could not be interpreted to mean several private residences.

The defendant called Mr. Williams, the architect of the proposed building, who put in and explained the plans. He explained that it was not intended that there should be any portions of the building common to the use of the tenants, except the hall, courtyard, and staircases, and that none of the flats were intended to open directly into the street. The flats were intended to open on to staircases leading down to an open court-yard surrounded by cloisters intended to enable the tenants to get to the front entrance dryshod.

Mr. HUGHES, Q.C., and Mr. A. J. ALLEN, for the defendant, said that there had been some confusion as to the meaning of covenants entered into for the benefit of the covenantee and of other persons. Covenants were primarily entered into with the covenantee, and he was sometimes given the power of assigning the benefit of them to his assignees, but he was (except in the case where there was a building scheme) under no obligation to use his right for the benefit of his assignees. No one could have any right except through the covenantee. There were thus two questions which should be kept distinct:—(1) Did the vendor acquire the right to transfer the benefit of the covenant to other persons? (2) Had he in fact assigned the benefit to the particular purchaser? In this case there could be no question that Messrs. Cubitt and Co. had the power to transfer the benefit of the covenants to a purchaser from them, but they had not assigned them to Sir John Millais. The covenant was a purely personal obligation, and not annexed to the land. There was strong evidence that it was not intended to give Sir John Millais the benefit of the covenants, because the conveyance to him contained a partial recital of the conveyance to the Duke, but the recital stopped before it reached the restrictive covenants. The covenants were not reciprocal—for instance, Sir John Millais's covenant as to the restraint of carrying on a trade or business was of a much more limited character than that in the conveyance to the Duke of Bedford. It would be unreasonable to give Sir John more extensive rights against the Duke than the Duke had against him. There could be no doubt that the plaintiff Rogers had no right to stop the erection of any number of houses. But the proposed block would not be more than one house. If a house was inhabited by several families that would not make it more than one house, nor would the existence of more than one entrance door.

MR. JUSTICE FARWELL delivered the following considered judgment. After stating the facts he continued as follows:—In this state of facts three questions arise for determination:—(1) Whether the building proposed to be erected by the defendant is a breach of the covenant in the indenture of May 31, 1869; (2) of that in the indenture of July 31, 1869; and, if so, (3) whether the plaintiffs or any of them are entitled to sue in respect of such covenant. In considering the first two questions I have to determine three points:—(1) Whether the building proposed to be erected is one message or dwelling-house; (2) if it is one only, is it adapted and used as and for a private residence only; (3) will a trade or business be carried on upon the premises by the mode in which the defendant proposes to use the same. In my opinion, a block of flats such as is proposed is not one message, but several. I cannot see any substantial difference for the purposes of a covenant of this nature between a terrace of adjoining residences, separated from one another vertically, and a pile of residences separated from one another horizontally. If the building of the defendant was carried no higher than the ground floor it would, in my opinion, be impossible to contend that each of the residences opening on to the inner area was not a separate house, and I cannot see that the superposition of seven other rows of residences can make any difference. This is a mere question of construction, on which a rating case such as that cited ("Attorney-General v. Mutual Tontine Westminster Chambers Association, Limited"; 1 Ex. D., 469) can have little bearing; but I would point out that in that case the Court held that the whole block was a house, but pointed out that each set of chambers might be a house also. The case of the domus mansionalis cited at page 477 has some bearing on the point. The covenant in the deed of July, 1869, differs from that in the earlier deed in that it contains no express covenant that there shall be one message only; but on the true construction of the covenant I have come to the conclusion that the result is the same. In my opinion a large building which is to be used as 30 or 40 separate residential flats does not answer the description of a message to be used as and for a private residence. But even if the whole structure could be regarded as a private residence only, it is difficult to see how 30 or 40 different families and establishments can find place therein, unless the owner of such entire message is carrying on the trade of letting apartments. The third question is that which was most elaborately argued—viz., whether the benefit of the covenants in the two indentures of 1869 passed to Sir John Millais and through him to his trustees so as to enable them to maintain this action. It is not contended that the burden of these covenants has not passed to the defendant; he is obviously bound by reason of notice, whether the covenant as regards him runs with the land or not. ("Tulk v. Moxhay"; 2 Ph., 774.) It has been argued that this is a covenant the benefit of which runs with the land at law, or if not at law, at any rate in equity, and further that even if this is not so the benefit of the covenants passes by the express general words "rights, easements, or appurtenances belonging or reported to belong thereto." In my opinion the benefit of the covenants runs with the land now vested in the Millais trustees at law. I do not think it necessary to call in aid the analogy of easements, as suggested by Mr. Haldane, on the authority of "L. and S.-W. Railway v. Gomm" (20 Ch.D., 562). The accurate expression appears to me to be that the covenants are annexed to the land and pass with it in much the same way as title deeds, which have been quaintly called the sinews of land (Co. Litt., 6 a.). Thus the right to sue on such covenants passes to the heir and not to the executor; the assignee of such covenants could sue under the old law in his own name in the days when the assignee of no other chose in action could do so ; and before the practice as to venue was abolished, actions on such covenants, when brought by lessees, were local and not transitory (see "Thursby v. Plant," 1 Wms. Saund., 299 n. 10). The law, in fact, acted on the sound principle of giving damage to the party aggrieved. Covenants which run with the land must have the following characteristics :— (1) They must be made with a covenantee who has an interest in the land to which they refer. (2) They must concern or touch the land. It is not contended that the covenants in question in this case have not the first characteristic, but it is said that they fail in the second. I am of opinion that they possess both. Adopting the definition of Mr. Justice Bayley in "Mayor of Congleton v. Pattison" (10 East, 135), the covenant must either affect the land as regards mode of occupation or it must be such as per se, and not merely from collateral circumstances, affects the value of the land. It is to my mind obvious that the value of Sir J. Millais's land is directly increased by the covenants in question. If authority is needed I would refer to "Mann v. Stephens" (15 Sim., 377), a case very similar to the present, "Vyvyan v. Arthur" (1 B. and C., 415), "the Priors case" (1 "Smith's L.C.," 56), "Fleetwood v. Hull" (23 Q.B.D., 35), "White v. Southend Hotel Co." [1897] 1 Ch. D., 767. I see no difficulty in holding that the benefit of a covenant runs with the land of the covenantee, while the burden of the same covenant does not run with the land of the covenantor. This must always be the case with regard to grants in fee if it be the better opinion—as Lord Justice Cotton in "Austerberry v. Corporation of Oldham" (29 Ch. D., 775) and the editors of "Smith's L. C." think—that the burden of such covenants never runs with the land. At common law the lessee's covenants ran with the land, but the lessor's did not run with the reversion ; the Statute 32 Hen. VIII., c. 34, was passed to give the reversioner the same benefit the lessee had ; and the definition of a covenant which runs with the land, stated by the learned editors of "Smith's Leading Cases" (p. 58), is "when either the liability to perform it or with right to take advantage of it passes to the assignee of that land." But a covenant may have the two characteristics above mentioned and yet not run with the land ; it is in each case a question of intention to be determined by the Court on the construction of the particular document, and with due regard to the nature of the covenant and the surrounding circumstances. No covenant can run with the land which has not the two characteristics above mentioned, but every covenant which has those two characteristics does not necessarily run with the land. That it is a question of intention in each case to be determined on construction is apparent from the judgment of Vice-Chancellor Hall, in "Renals v. Cowlishaw" (9 Ch. D., 125), a judgment of the highest authority, not only from the weight attaching to the opinion of the learned Vice-Chancellor, but also from the approval that it has received in the Court of Appeal and the House of Lords. See "Martin v. Spicer" (14 Ap. Ca., 12), and "Nottingham Brick and Tile Co. v. Butler" (15 Q.B.D., 269). The Courts have drawn the inference that the parties intended, or in other words the Courts have held on the true construction of the documents that they have contracted, that the covenants shall or shall not run with the land from various circumstances. Thus in "Renals v. Cowlishaw" there was nothing to show what assigns were intended by the words of the covenant ; there was no necessary implication that each assign of each parcel of the vendor's land, whether acquired before or after the date of the deed, was to have the benefit of the covenant ; the impression, indeed, was to the contrary, and the Courts accordingly held that the covenant did not run, but must be expressly assigned in order to pass. Contrast this with the case of ordinary covenants for title ; these undoubtedly run with the land and each purchaser of each portion of the land gets the benefit of the covenants so far as they relate to the land purchased by him. In both these cases the covenants are entered into with the heirs and assigns, but in the first case the word "assign," on its true construction of the deed, means "assign of the covenant," in the latter "assign of the land, to which is annexed the benefit of the covenant by virtue of the evidence of intention so to contract which is found in the deed and the surrounding circumstances." Again, take the cases of building schemes. There is no express assignment of the benefit of the covenants, but it is held that the true intent of the parties, and consequently the true construction of the covenant, is to be found by applying the words of the deed to the surrounding circumstances. A similar conclusion has been arrived at in cases where there is no general scheme, but various persons enter into similar covenants with reference to lands that lie adjacent to one another. It is sufficient for me to refer to "Nottingham Brick and Tile Co. v. Butler" (15 Q.B.D., at p. 248, affirmed 16 Q.B.D., 778), "Western v. MacDermott" (L.R., 1 Eq., 499 ; 2 Ch., 72), "Whitman v. Gibson" (9 Sim., 196), "Coles v. Sims" (Kay, 56). Treating it then as a question of construction, I find an express contract. The draftsman would appear to have had Vice-Chancellor Hall's words before him when he framed this covenant and I think it would be difficult to express the intention in clearer words. Inasmuch as the covenantees at the date of the covenant owned the land now belonging to the Millais trustees, and such land is in fact "near to" the defendant's land, I see no uncertainty as to the land to be benefited. I should add that in my opinion there can be no difference between law and equity in construing such covenants with a view to seeing whether they do or do not run with the land. The same words in the same document must necessarily bear the same meaning in all the Courts. It is true that in many of the cases decided by the Court of Chancery expressions are found to the effect that the defendants are bound in equity whether the covenants in strictness run with the land or not. But I think that such expressions are due to the reluctance that the Vice-Chancellors felt to expressing any opinion on points of common law, and for the reason that I have already stated I cannot see how such covenant could run in equity if it does not run at law. One other point was made by Mr. Hughes—viz., that Sir J. Millais knew nothing of the existence of these covenants at the time that he bought, and I assume this to be the fact, as no evidence to the contrary was tendered, but in my opinion it is immaterial ; such knowledge has never been held a necessary condition to success in an action on a covenant which runs with the land at law. The plaintiff's right in such an action does not depend upon what he believes himself to have bought but upon what he has in fact bought, and he has bought the land with the covenants annexed. The defendant is not injured, for he bought the land with knowledge of the covenant and he can claim no more than the land with that burden upon it. If authority is needed for this, "Child v. Douglas" (Kay, 560) is expressly in point and is not affected in this respect by anything said on the appeal or at the trial or by any subsequent authority. It is not necessary for me to determine whether the benefit of the covenants would pass under the general words to which I have referred above, if such covenants did not run with the land. If they are not in fact annexed to the land it may well be that the right to sue thereon cannot be said to belong or be reputed to belong thereto, but I express no final opinion on this point. In the view that I take of the rights of the Millais trustees I must make a distinction and grant an injunction as asked, but it is at their suit alone that I do so. The plaintiff Rogers joined in a deed of October 30, 1876, whereby Cubitts released the devise of the late Duke of Bedford from the covenant as to the erection of one dwelling-house only. I have already held that the defendants threatened and intended to erect a number of dwelling-houses, and this, as against Rogers, they are entitled to do. I cannot hold that these facts constitute a business, although if I had thought that they constituted one dwelling-house only, I might have come to a different conclusion. I think that the proper course is to dismiss the action so far as it sets up any claim by Rogers; it would not be right that the judgment should appear to be made at his suit or that he should be in a position to enforce an injunction which is obtained on the strength of another's title. The defendant was restrained from building as above described and ordered to pay half the general costs of the action.

WRIE V. DYER.*

Landlord and Tenant—Yearly tenancy—Notice to quit—Sufficiency of.

This was an argument on a special case stated by justices sitting in the petty sessional division for the district of Weston-super-Mare. The respondent, William Dyer, made an application to the justices to recover certain premises known as 4, Holland-street, Ashcombe, under the Small Tenements Recovery Act, 1838 (1 and 2 Vict., c. 74). The respondent was the owner of the house in question, and the appellant was the tenant upon a yearly tenancy from Lady Day to Lady Day at a rent not exceeding £20 a year. On March 24, 1898, the respondent served on the appellant a notice to quit in these terms:—"I hereby give you notice to quit and deliver up to me all that cottage, garden, and premises situate and known as No. 4, Holland-street, Ashcombe, Weston-super-Mare, on the 24th day of June, 1898, or at the end of your current year's tenancy. Dated this 24th day of March, 1898." The notices prescribed by the Act having been duly served, the justices issued a warrant of possession, holding that the notice to quit above set out was a valid legal notice to quit on March 25, 1899. The appellant, being dissatisfied with this decision in point of law, applied for and obtained a special case which substantially set out the facts above stated.

Mr. BROOKE LITTLE, for the appellant, argued that, as the tenancy was a yearly tenancy, six months' notice to quit was requisite to determine it. The notice in question was bad because it prescribed either June 24, 1898, which was only three months distant in point of time, or the end of the current tenancy, which was the following day. He cited "Doe and Mayor of Richmond v. Morphet" (7 Q.B., 577), in which "Doe and Lord Huntingtower v. Culliford" (4 D. and R., 248) was dissented from. The latter case practically covered the present. It was further considered as overruled in Cole on Ejectment, vide p. 58. [MR. JUSTICE DARLING referred to "Doe and Williams v. Smith," 5 A. and E., 350.]

Mr. Layman, for the respondent, was not called upon to argue.

*Reported by W. HUMBY GRIFFITH, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

MR. JUSTICE RIDLEY, in giving judgment, said that the notice to quit was, in his opinion, a good notice to quit on March 25, 1899. In considering the cases dealing with notices to quit the particular terms of the notice in each case must be considered. In no two cases were the terms of the notice identical, and all one could do was to extract the principle from the cases previously decided. In "Doe v. Morphet" (7 Q.B., 577) the earlier case, "Doe v. Culliford" (4 D. and R., 248), had been treated as bad law, and particularly an opinion expressed by Mr. Justice Bayley had been observed upon. But with great respect his Lordship said it seemed to him that the opinion of Mr. Justice Bayley in the earlier case was correct, and there was in his view nothing in the decision of "Doe v. Morphet" which militated against that opinion. The principle was that these notices should be construed so that a sensible meaning might be given to them. The construction contended for by the appellant in this case—namely, that the notice was given to quit in a few hours—was not a sensible meaning to put upon the words.

MR. JUSTICE DARLING concurred, and thought he could not do better than apply to the notice to quit in this case words used by Lord Denman in "Doe and Williams v. Smith" (5 A. and E., at p. 350) with reference to the notice given in that case. That notice was certainly described by Mr. Justice Littledale as a lame and inaccurate notice, but "I think," said Lord Denman, "this notice was well enough."

CLARKE V. HASTIE.*

Married Woman—Liability—Separate estate—Contract during coverture—Jointure accruing on husband's death.

In this case, the trial of which was begun on November 2, Mr. Rawlinson, Q.C., and Mr. C. E. Jones appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Bray, Q.C., and Mr. H. D. Bonsey for the defendant, Mrs. Hastie (late Angerstein), now wife of Colonel James Hastie.

The plaintiff's claim was against the defendant as maker of a joint and several promissory note (with her late husband, William J. Angerstein) for £1,000 and interest at 5 per cent. from its date, January 7, 1876, payable one month after the death of William Angerstein, father of William J. Angerstein, who died in August, 1897. It was alleged that the defendant had separate estate at the date of the making of the note, which she intended to make liable, and still has separate estate. The defendant denied that she made the note. She further pleaded that at the date of the note she had no separate estate free from restraint on anticipation or in respect of which she could contract, and that, if she had such estate, none of it was now existing nor had she now any separate estate liable for payment of the note. She denied that she made the note (if at all) in respect of or with intent to bind her separate estate, and pleaded that she made it (if at all) at the request of and under the compulsion of her late husband, and that it was payable only in the event of his surviving his father and succeeding to his property, which he did not do. She denied that there was any consideration for the note and pleaded the Statute of Limitations in bar of any claim for interest beyond the last six years. She further denied that plaintiff was holder of the note at the commencement of the action, and alleged that he had proved against the estate of the late W. J.

prospectors. He thought the meaning of that was that the syndicates agreed to pay that sum for every block of ten claims when a company was formed to take over and work the block, so that the syndicates need not put their hands into their own pockets to pay the prospectors. The Mashonaland mining regulations showed that certain conditions precedent had to be performed by persons who desired to be holders of claims, and in those regulations occurred the phrase "flotations of blocks." In his opinion the plaintiffs failed to show that there had been a flotation of blocks within the meaning of the mining regulations. Further, and he preferred to base his judgment on this ground, he thought there had been no sale at all to a third company. The parties to the amalgamation scheme never intended that there should be a sale. In a circular addressed by Sir John Willoughby to the shareholders of the companies attention was directed to the alternative courses of flotation and increase of capital. It seemed to be clear that the scheme was not a scheme for flotation, but was one by which the companies were to increase their capital and keep the property to themselves. He thought that the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice was right.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS was of the same opinion. The onus was on the plaintiffs to show that the conditions precedent to their right of action had been fulfilled. The agreements between the prospectors and the syndicates were made on the basis of the existing mining regulations, and the meaning of the word "flotation" in the agreements was to be understood by reference to the rules which defined what was meant thereby. A prospector who obtained a licence was by the regulations entitled to peg out a block of ten claims, and he was thereupon required to sink a shaft within four months and do certain other work. This was a condition precedent to another step, viz., an application for an inspection certificate. Provision was made for the transfer of the blocks to the syndicate, and then came the further step, viz., of flotation of blocks to joint-stock companies. In his opinion, the flotation so provided for in the rules was the flotation referred to in the agreements. The secretary of the Development Company had been examined in Court to-day, but his evidence did not show that the conditions precedent had been fulfilled. He thought, therefore, that there had been no flotation, and he was the more satisfied because it seemed to him that this interpretation carried out the intention of the parties to the amalgamation scheme; for the syndicates clearly intended to keep to themselves the power of making a flotation hereafter.

SALTON V. THE NEW BEESTON CYCLE COMPANY.*

Principal and Agent—Solicitor—Warrant of authority to defend action—Action against a company—Revocation of authority by dissolution of company before judgment—Liability of solicitor for costs.

This was a motion on behalf of the plaintiff that the proceedings in the action might be set aside as from November 12, 1898, and that the solicitor for the defendant company might be ordered to pay the costs. The writ in the action was issued on February 25, 1898, and on March 4, 1898, an appearance was entered on behalf of the defendant company.

On March 17, 1898, the statement of claim was delivered; on April 13, 1898, the defence was put in; on April 18, 1898, the reply was delivered, and on April 20, 1898, the action was set down for trial. On November 18, 1898, the statement of claim was amended, and on December 9, 1898, and February 1, 1899, the statement of defence was amended and re-amended, while on February 14, 1899, an order for particulars was made. The action was tried on March 16, 1899, and on March 23, 1899, judgment was given for the plaintiff against the defendant company for £566 13s. 4d. and costs. (See L.R. [1899] 1 Ch., 775.) When the plaintiff came to enforce his judgment it was discovered that the company had been dissolved on November 12, 1898, whereupon notice of the present motion was served. It appeared that at extraordinary general meetings of the company held on October 14 and November 2, 1897, resolutions were passed for the voluntary winding up of the company, and a liquidator was appointed and directed to carry into effect two contracts for the sale of the assets of the defendant company to two new companies proposed to be formed. One of these new companies was the Beeston Cycle Company, which took over certain assets and liabilities of the defendant company (including the liability to the plaintiff which was the subject of the present action), and by the agreement that company was authorized to defend in the name of the defendant company all actions brought against it with reference to the liabilities so taken over. On February 26, 1898, the writ in this action was left by the liquidator of the defendant company, or by his direction, with the solicitor of the Beeston Cycle Company with instructions to attend to it. The solicitor thereupon brought the matter before the directors of the Beeston Cycle Company, and, by their instructions, appeared to the writ and defended the action. It was not disputed that the solicitor had authority to appear and defend the action down to November 12, 1898, but it was contended that his authority terminated on that day. It now appeared that on July 25, 1898, the liquidator held a final meeting of the company pursuant to section 142 of the Companies Act, 1862, and made a return of that meeting to the Registrar on August 4, and that such return was registered on August 12. Consequently, by virtue of section 143 of the Act, the defendant company was on November 12, 1898, dissolved. In opposition to this motion the solicitor deposed that he did not know of the final meeting having been called until March 16, 1899, the day of the trial, when he was for the first time informed of it by the secretary of the Beeston Cycle Company. It was stated by the junior counsel for the solicitor upon this motion that the secretary gave this information at a conference held with him immediately before the trial, that he then inquired whether the defendant company had been actually dissolved, but was informed by the secretary that he did not know; and that he (counsel) advised that no advantage should be taken of the dissolution by way of defence, but that the action should be defended on the merits. That course was adopted and the action was tried without the learned Judge (Mr. Justice Cozens-Hardy) being informed of the position of the defendant company.

Mr. Jenkins, Q.C., and Mr. T. L. Wilkinson appeared for the plaintiff on the motion; and Mr. Upjohn, Q.C., and Mr. Younger for the defendant.

MR. JUSTICE STIRLING, after stating the facts as above set out, said that he did not quarrel with the advice given as to the defence of the action, but there was one point to which in his opinion sufficient attention had not been paid—viz., whether either solicitor or counsel had authority to represent the defendant company at the trial. It would have been easy to send some one to examine the documents at the office of the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies, and an inspection of those documents would have shown that the company was dissolved. His Lordship thought that the fact of the dissolution ought to have been mentioned to the Judge and his opinion taken whether the trial ought to proceed. It was contended, however, that the judgment was perfectly valid, mainly on the authority of "Whiteley Exerciser (Limited) v. Gamage" (L.R. [1898] 2 Ch., 405). In that case on August 5, 1897, the plaintiff's action was dismissed with costs. The defendant proceeded to tax his costs, and the taxing master made his certificate. On February 4, 1898, the defendant took out a summons to vary the certificate, but owing to the state of business it did not come on until July 15 following. In the meantime on April 14 the company was dissolved in the same way as in the present case. It was held by North, J., that the summons could proceed, and he made an order on it adverse to the company. This decision, as his Lordship understood it, rested on the ground that the delay was entirely due to the state of business in the Court, and consequently that the maxim actus curie nemini facit injuriam applied. See "Cumber v. Wane" (1 Sm. L.C., 9th Ed., 384). In his Lordship's opinion, however, that reasoning did not apply to the present case, for the simple reason that the delay was not shown to have been entirely due to the state of business of the Court. The action was no doubt set down for trial on April 20, and would have been ripe for trial so far as the Court was concerned early in May; but long after that it was found necessary to amend the pleadings. The delay, therefore, was partly attributable to the parties themselves. It was further contended that the solicitor was not liable, because he had originally authority to defend the action and had no knowledge that the authority had been revoked by the dissolution of the defendant company. The law upon that point was laid down in "Smout v. Ilbery" (10 M. and W., 1). In that case, where a man who had been in the habit of dealing with the plaintiff for meat supplied to his house, went abroad, leaving his wife and family resident in this country, and died abroad, it was held that the wife was not liable for goods supplied to her after his death, but before information of his death had been received; and that decision was given notwithstanding the fact that there was no remedy against the estate of the deceased. Alderson, B., in the course of his judgment, said:—

"Here the agent had in fact full authority originally to contract, and did contract in the name of the principal. There is no ground for saying that in representing her authority as continuing she did any wrong whatever. There was no mala fides on her part, no want of due diligence in acquiring knowledge of the revocation, no omission to state any fact within her knowledge relating to it, and the revocation itself was by the act of God. The continuance of the life of the principal was, under these circumstances, a fact equally within the knowledge of both contracting parties. If, then, the true principle derivable from the cases is that there must be some wrong or omission of right on the part of the agent in order to make him personally liable on a contract made in the name of his principal, it will follow that the agent is not responsible in such a case as the present. And to this conclusion we have come."

That decision was referred to in "Story on Agency," 265a, in the following passage:—

"But let us suppose another case, where an agent contracts in the name of his principal, having an original authority so to do; and it turns out that, unknown to both parties, the authority has been revoked by the death of the principal, so that in contemplation of law there exists no principal; the question will then arise whether, inasmuch as neither the principal nor his legal representative is bound by the contract, the agent, who has acted bona fide, will, under such circumstances, be responsible to the other contracting party for any loss or damage sustained thereby. It has been recently held upon very full consideration, and upon reasoning entirely satisfactory, that the agent will not, under such circumstances, be responsible, upon the ground that the continuance of the life of the principal must be deemed to be a fact equally within the contemplation of both parties as the basis of the contract." It seemed to his Lordship that the principle there laid down applied to a solicitor appearing for a party in an action, inasmuch as he was an agent for a special kind and known to the opposite party to be such. The principle also applied just as much to the dissolution of a legal entity or corporation as to the death of an individual. In his Lordship's opinion the solicitor ought not to be held liable for any costs down to March 16, 1899. He thought, however, that on that day he did not use due diligence to ascertain whether the defendant company was dissolved or not, and that any costs incurred by the plaintiff after that date ought to be borne by him. There would be no costs of the present application.

Married Woman—Separation order—Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, sec. 7—Variation of order upon "fresh" evidence.

Fresh evidence means evidence which had not come to the party's knowledge at the time of the trial, or evidence which he could not then have called.

This was an appeal by Mary Anne Johnson from an order of the Henley-on-Thames justices made on August 17, 1899. The case raised a novel point as to the meaning of "fresh evidence" in section 7 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895.

Mr. Lynch was for the appellant; Mr. Clarke Hall for the respondent.

It appeared that on June 15 last the wife obtained a separation order against her husband on the ground of his desertion and wilful neglect. Just before the hearing the husband was taken very seriously ill, and had to leave the Court, so that he was unable either to indicate the lines of the defence or to give the names of his witnesses. His solicitor, however, acting on the brother's instructions, declined to have an adjournment. On August 3 the husband, having neglected to comply with the order of June 15, was again summoned by the wife, and on August 10 the husband applied to have the order of June 15 discharged. On August 17 both summonses were heard with the result that the order of June 15 was discharged.

Mr. LYNCH now submitted that the evidence which was called by the husband on August 17 was not "fresh evidence" within the meaning of the Act, but "further evidence" which he either knew of, or might have known and called on June 15. The justices were wrong in admitting such evidence and in acting upon it. "Fresh evidence," within the meaning of section 7, meant evidence of some fact which had come into existence after the date of the trial.

Mr. CLARKE HALL contended that the facts deposed to by the three witnesses called on behalf of the respondent were not known at the trial, and he admitted that the legal adviser of the respondent had not acted wisely in refusing an adjournment.

MR. JUSTICE GORELL BARNES pointed out that the respondent when before the justices had claimed on the second hearing to call witnesses as of right; a claim which was wholly untenable, for that would enable parties to withhold witnesses in order to produce them at a later period.

The PRESIDENT, in delivering judgment, said that the case was quite free from all doubt, and was one of some interest. Section 7 of 58 and 59 Vict., c. 39, enacted that the "Court of summary jurisdiction . . . may on the application of a married woman or her husband, and upon cause being shown upon fresh evidence to the satisfaction of the Court at any time, alter, vary, or discharge such order. &c." And in his opinion "fresh evidence" meant evidence which had not come to the party's knowledge wishing to call it at the time of the trial, or evidence which he could not then have called. It certainly did not mean evidence which could have been called and was not. Applying these principles to the facts in this case, he thought that the justices had made a mistake, because all the facts were not before them. They certainly ought to have seen the affidavit of the medical man relating to the respondent's health, and from these causes a miscarriage of justice had very nearly ensued. The case would, therefore, go back to the justices for rehearing, and the respondent would have to pay the costs.

MR. JUSTICE GORELL BARNES, in concurring, said that merely because certain evidence was not given at the first trial it did not follow that it was "fresh evidence." It should be clearly understood that "fresh evidence" only referred to such evidence as a party had not at the time of the trial, or which he could not with reasonable diligence have obtained.

WALTER V. LANE.*

Copyright—Newspaper—Reports of public speeches.

Decision of North, J. (15 The Times L.R., 538), reversed.

Judgment was delivered upon this appeal against a decision of Mr. Justice North's (reported in The Times of August 11 last, and in 15 The Times L.R., 538) upon the important question whether there is under the Copyright Act of 1842 a copyright in a newspaper report of a speech delivered in public, the speaker not having taken any steps to secure a copyright to himself. The action was brought by the proprietors of The Times, claiming an injunction to restrain the defendant from publishing a book called "Appreciations and Addresses delivered by Lord Rosebery," on the ground that five of the addresses which are contained in it are in substance verbatim copies of reports of speeches of Lord Rosebery which had been previously published in The Times. The reporter had assigned his copyright (if any) to the plaintiffs. Mr. Justice North held that the plaintiffs were entitled to copyright in their reports, and he granted the injunction. The defendant appealed.

*Reported by W. L. CABELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. Birrell, Q.C., and Mr. Scrutton were for the defendant; Mr. H. Terrell, Q.C., and Mr. McSwiney were for the plaintiffs.

It was agreed that the appeal should be treated as an appeal from a judgment at the trial of the action. The appeal was argued on Monday and Tuesday in last week, and the judgment of the Court was then reserved.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS delivered the judgment of the Court, in which, after stating the order appealed from, he continued:—The articles copied were reports of speeches made by Lord Rosebery on various occasions, the reporter being a Mr. Brain. He tells us that he was one of the staff of The Times, that he was employed to make the reports of the speeches, and then he says:—"In the course of our duty the reporters of The Times have to exercise their judgment and skill so as to represent in a form fit for publication the features of the meetings and the material parts of and the sense of the speeches made at them. This involves considerable skill and labour. Notes of the proceedings and speeches are taken in shorthand which are afterwards carefully corrected and revised, and written out and punctuated fit for publication." This was the course of procedure in the case of the reports which the defendant has copied. Now the case turns on the true construction of the Copyright Act of 1842, the 5th and 6th Victoria, chapter 45. That Act defines "copyright" and "book" (by section 2) and confers copyright on every "author" of a book and his assigns (by section 3). Periodical publications are dealt with in section 18. The Act contains no definition of "author," but it confers copyright on the authors of books first published in this country. There can be no copyright in what is not published in a book; but it does not follow that the first person who publishes a book acquires a copyright in it. The meaning of the word "author" as used in the Act must be gathered from its own language and the decisions upon it. The word occurs constantly throughout the Act, but nowhere is it used in the sense of a mere reporter or publisher of another man's verbal utterances. It is plain that a person who is not the author of a work may nevertheless be the proprietor of the copyright in it; for example, in the ordinary case of an assignment of copyright, the author is one person, the proprietor of the copyright is another. The expression of "proprietor of copyright" constantly occurs in the Act. Sometimes the expression clearly includes author; sometimes it as clearly does not, but means his assigns. The latter part of section 3, which relates to the publication of books after the death of their authors, shows that authors and first publishers are by no means synonymous expressions. Again section 16, which relates to actions for infringement and objections to the title of the plaintiff, shows that authors and first publishers may stand on different footings. The wording of these sections justifies the view that the owner of an unpublished manuscript, although not the author of it, acquires copyright in it by first publishing it. That has been decided in Scotland, and the cases are referred to in Mr. Phillips's book on Copyright, pages 55 and 56. The author of an unpublished manuscript has no copyright in it, but he has a right to acquire copyright in it; and this right he may impliedly transfer to any one to whom he sells or gives the manuscript. Further, the author who sells or gives away an unpublished manuscript composition of his own may be fairly inferred to transfer his own right to publish it, unless he expressly or impliedly prohibits the publication of the manuscript which he sells or gives. This is intelligible, but it does not carry the plaintiffs far enough. A thief or other unlawful possessor of an unpublished manuscript would not acquire copyright in it by first publishing it. He would not be the author or proprietor of the manuscript. Again, Lord Rosebery had no copyright in his speech, and although he could have acquired copyright in it by putting it into writing, or printing and publishing it, he did not do so; and there is no evidence whatever to justify the inference that he transferred to the plaintiffs his right to acquire the copyright in his own compositions, whether written or verbal. The plaintiffs do not derive their title to their publication from Lord Rosebery. Section 18 of the Act refers to copyright in what is printed in newspapers and periodical publications. Unless otherwise agreed, the copyright in such matter belongs to the author. But the publisher or proprietor of the newspaper can himself obtain the copyright in any article published in the newspaper, &c., if he employs some one to "compose" what is published on the terms that the copyright shall belong to the publisher or proprietor. The word "compose" here cannot mean copy or write from dictation; it obviously means compose in the sense of being the author of the matter published. This is made perfectly clear by the language of the provisos, which prevent the publisher or proprietor of the newspaper, &c., from publishing the article in a separate form without the consent of the "author"; and which entitle the author to publish it himself in a separate form. The "author" here is the person employed to "compose" the article. The more closely the Act is studied the more clearly it appears that, in order that the first publisher of any composition may acquire the copyright in it, he must be the "author" of what he publishes, or he must derive his right to publish from the author by being the owner of the manuscript or in some other way. It was contended, and Mr. Justice North took the view, that, although the reporter had no copyright in the speech, he was entitled to copyright in his report of it. But we cannot follow this. The report and the speech reported are, no doubt, different things, but the printer or publisher of the report is not the "author" of the speech reported, which is the only thing which gives any value or interest to the report. The printer or reporter of a speech is not the "author" of the reported speech in any intelligible sense of the word "author." To hold that every reporter of a speech has a copyright in his own report would be to stretch the Copyright Act to an extent which its language will not bear, and which the Legislature obviously never contemplated. The Act was passed to protect authors, not reporters. Moreover, although it may be that reporters and their employers ought to be protected from the unauthorized appropriation of their labours by others, it by no means follows that Parliament would place reporters and their employers on the same footing as authors. It is only by treating reporters as authors of what they report, which they clearly are not, that they can be brought within the existing Copyright Act. Although we have no sympathy with the defendant, we are quite unable to decide in favour of the plaintiffs. Plausible as are the arguments addressed to the Court on their behalf, those arguments are all based on the untenable doctrine that, for the purpose of copyright, reporters are authors. The analogy of directories, road books, maps, &c., is, in our opinion, wholly misleading. There, each man who himself makes a directory, &c., and publishes it is the author of what he publishes. The reporter of a speech is not. The distinction is all-important, but it is only by wholly ignoring it that the decisions on directories, &c., can be invoked by the plaintiffs. If the reporter of a speech gives the substance of it in his own language; if, although the ideas are not his, his expression of them is his own and not the speaker's, with immaterial differences, the reported speech would be an original composition, of which the reporter would be the author, and he would be entitled to copyright in his own production. This is the ground on which copyright in law reports is based. They are by no means mere transcripts of judgments delivered in Court. But we have not to deal with speeches recast by the reporter. He has reproduced to the best of his ability not only the ideas expressed by the speaker, but the language in which the speaker expressed those ideas. In other words, we are dealing with the most accurate report of the speaker's words which the reporter could make. No doubt it requires considerable education and ability to make a good report of any speech. But an accurate report is not an original composition, nor is the reporter of a speech the author of what he reports. The appeal must be allowed and the action dismissed with costs here and below.

Mr. H. TERRELL, Q.C., said that the plaintiffs proposed to take the opinion of the House of Lords.

It was then arranged that the usual undertaking as to costs should be given.

IN RE THE TRADE MARK (NO. 76,176) OF CLEMENT ET COMPAGNIE.*

Trade Mark—Registration—Capacity for—Fancy word—"St. Raphael."

Decision of Kekewich, J. (15 The Times L.R., 231), affirmed.

This was an appeal against a decision of Mr. Justice Kekewich's (reported in The Times of February 25 last, and in 15 The Times L.R., 231). The appellants were the Société Anonyme du St. Raphael Quinquina. They are dealers in a tonic wine called St. Raphael Quinquina, and they applied to the Court by motion asking that the register of trade marks might be rectified by removing therefrom the mark No. 76,176 of Messrs. Clement et Cie., in class 3, or, in the alternative, by adding to the entry thereon of the mark a disclaimer of any right on the part of Clement et Cie., or other the registered proprietor of the mark, to the exclusive use of the words St. Raphael or Saint Raphael. The applicants had recently applied for registration in the United Kingdom of a label bearing the name of St. Raphael Quinquina, but the Comptroller had refused the application, because on August 11, 1888, Clement et Cie., trading as the "Compagnie du Vin de St. Raphael," at Valence, Drôme, France, and also in London, had already registered trade mark No. 76,176, in class 3, for "Saint Raphael Tannin Wine." Mr. Justice Kekewich held that the words "St. Raphael" formed part of the registered label and were not an "addition" to it within the meaning of section 74 of the Act. Consequently no disclaimer was necessary.

Mr. Neville, Q.C., Mr. Warrington, Q.C., and Mr. G. F. Hart were for the appellants; Mr. Sebastian was for Clement et Cie.; Mr. Ingle Joyce was for the Comptroller.

The COURT dismissed the appeal on the ground that the respondents were not claiming to be the owners of a registered word or a fancy name. They claimed only the label which they had registered, to which the words "St. Raphael" were not an addition, but they were part of the registered mark or label.

LORD JUSTICE ROMER added that the present decision must not be taken as authorizing the notion that the registration of words which would not in themselves constitute a valid trade mark would be good as a registration of a label merely because a flourish was placed round the words.

IN RE ROBERTS.*

Bankruptcy—Property of bankrupt—Rights of trustee—Personal earnings—Bankruptcy Act, 1883, sec. 44.

After bankruptcy and before discharge whatever property a bankrupt acquires belongs to his trustee, save only what is necessary to support himself and his wife and family.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice Wright's, reported in The Times of July 25. The application was by the trustee in bankruptcy of John Roberts, the celebrated champion billiard player, for an order that the bankrupt might deliver up to him all the bonzoline billiard balls which the bankrupt had received since March 2, 1899, from the Bonzoline Manufacturing Company (Limited) under a certain contract. John Roberts had been adjudicated a bankrupt early in the year 1898, and was still undischarged. On October 5, 1898, he entered into a written contract with the Bonzoline Manufacturing Company (Limited) whereby it was mutually agreed as follows:—"The company, in consideration of the agreement on the part of the said John Roberts hereinafter contained, will for a period of five years from the date hereof, subject to the determination of this agreement at the expiration of three years from the date hereof as hereinafter provided, supply the said John Roberts or his nominees annually during such period as aforesaid, free of cost, with 2,000 bonzoline balls as manufactured by the company, such balls to be supplied as and when required by the said John Roberts, on his giving to the company not less than seven days' notice requiring the same. In consideration of the company undertaking to supply him with such balls as aforesaid . . . the said John Roberts hereby agrees with the company that he will not during the said period of five years, or during the said period of three years from the date hereof in the event of this agreement being determined at the expiration of such period as hereinafter provided, play any public exhibition of billiards, pyramids, or other game on a billiard table other than with bonzoline balls manufactured and supplied by the company." Under this agreement the bankrupt had received from the company 2,000 balls. The balls were said to be worth about 6s. each, so that the gross total value would be £600. It was estimated that the bankrupt after deducting the expenses of advertising the balls would clear about £450 from the sale of them. The bankrupt alleged that he had already sold all except about £80 worth. On behalf of the trustee it was contended that the balls passed to him under section 44 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. On the other hand it was contended for the bankrupt that these balls were really earned by him as payment for his professional services and were therefore personal earnings which did not pass to the trustee. The learned Judge held that, assuming that these balls could properly be regarded as the fruits of the bankrupt's skill as a billiard player, the sum which they would produce was more than sufficient for the personal maintenance of the bankrupt, and he thought that substantial justice would be done by ordering him to deliver to the trustee all balls not exceeding £200 in value which he had in his possession on May 1, 1899, on which date he undertook not to part with any more balls during the pendency of these proceedings. The bankrupt appealed.

Mr. Tindal Atkinson, Q.C., and Mr. F. C. Willis were for the bankrupt ; and Mr. Reed, Q.C., and Mr. Holloway for the trustee.

The appeal was argued on October 27, when judgment was reserved.

The MASTER of the ROLLS now delivered the judgment of the Court, dismissing the appeal. He said:—Mr. Roberts, a professional billiard player, was adjudicated bankrupt in April, 1898, and on July 24, 1899, an order was made by the Judge in Bankruptcy for the delivery by Roberts to his trustee of certain billiard balls worth £70 or £80, which Roberts had in his possession on May 1, 1899. He had acquired these under an agreement made by him, after his bankruptcy, with the Bonzoline Company (Limited) and dated October 5, 1898. The trustee claims these billiard balls under section 44 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. Mr. Roberts contends that he is entitled to retain them upon the ground that they are his personal earnings, and are therefore excepted from the operation of that section. The alleged exception is not to be found in the Act itself, but is said to be an implied exception based upon a long series of authorities and well recognized for the last 100 years. On looking into these authorities we are of opinion that they have no application to the present case. The exception is based upon the case of "Chippendale v. Tomlinson," decided in 1785 and reported in 4 Dougl., 318, and Cooke's Bankruptcy Law, 428, 8th edition, and referred to in a note in 7 East, 58. In this case a solicitor, who had become bankrupt, brought an action for professional services rendered by him after his bankruptcy. His assignees made no objection and made no claim to the money which he sought to recover, and it was held that under these circumstances the bankruptcy of the plaintiff was no bar to the action. That was the only point really decided. There are numerous subsequent authorities to the same effect, and, so far, the law seems clear. According to the report in Douglas Lord Mansfield said, "the single question is whether the assignees are entitled to the earnings of a bankrupt, and we are clearly of opinion that they are not." According to the report in Cooke's Bankruptcy Lord Mansfield said, "the only question is whether the assignees of a bankrupt are entitled to the profits of his personal labour. The assignees cannot let out the bankrupt ; they cannot contract for his labour." Attempts have been made to establish on the foundation of these statements the doctrine that whatever a bankrupt earns by his personal labour or ability after the bankruptcy belongs to him. "Chippendale v. Tomlinson" is not an authority for any such proposition, and both Mr. Justice Buller and, according to a note in Douglas, Lord Mansfield also stated that if a bankrupt acquired a large sum of money or considerable effects they would undoubtedly belong to his assignees. So also said Lord Alvanley in "Hesse v. Stevenson," 3 Bos. and P., 565, in which it was held that a patent acquired by a bankrupt after his bankruptcy passed to his assignees. Lord Alvanley's observations on pp. 577-78 appear to us to represent the true doctrine on this subject. It may be that a bankrupt's trustee cannot maintain an action for money earned by the bankrupt since his bankruptcy by his personal exertions if such money is required by him for his personal support and maintenance (see "Williams v. Chambers," 10 Q.B., 337, the pleadings in which, however, alleged promises to pay to the assignees for work done by the bankrupt). The Bankruptcy Act of 1893, like its predecessors, excepts a bankrupt's tools and contemplates the acquisition of future property by a bankrupt, and he must live to use his tools and acquire such property. The present Act, like previous Bankruptcy Acts, must be construed so as to enable him to do so, and the language of section 14, clear and express as it is, must not, therefore, be taken so literally as to deprive the bankrupt of those fruits of his personal exertions which are necessary to enable him to live. But, on the other hand, the necessity is the limit of the exception. This is in entire accordance with modern decisions. "Benwell's Case" (14 Q.B.D., 341), does not conflict with other cases. That case turns entirely on section 53, and is only an authority for the proposition that a prospective order cannot be made impounding the future personal earnings of a bankrupt. Similar observations apply to "In re Rhine" ([1892] 1 Q.B., 622). Those cases are no authority for the proposition that property of a bankrupt acquired by his personal exertions since his bankruptcy and not wanted for his present support do not belong to his trustee. No such doctrine can be maintained in face of section 44. After bankruptcy, and before his discharge, whatever property a bankrupt acquires belongs to his trustee, save only what is necessary for his support. He may sue for and recover his earnings if his trustee does not interfere, but what he recovers he recovers for the benefit of his creditors, except to the extent necessary to support himself and his wife and family. The exception seems to include them. In this case, we have not to consider the right of the trustee to sue a stranger for money payable to the bankrupt, for the bankrupt has in his own possession the property ordered to be delivered up. Moreover, that property is not wanted for the bankrupt's support. He can, and does, support himself without it. Even if, therefore, the billiard balls can be regarded as obtained by the personal exertions of the bankrupt, the order for the delivery to the trustee would be quite right. This being so, it is unnecessary to consider whether the billiard balls can be properly regarded as personal earnings. They are delivered to the bankrupt under an agreement which imposes no obligation on him to play billiards or otherwise exert himself. All he undertakes to do is not to play in public (except in genuine championship matches), with any billiard balls except those made by the Roncolina Company. The agreement is no doubt based on the assumption that Roberts will play billiards in public; but, after all, its object is to advertise the company's balls, and as Roberts need not play at all, or otherwise exert himself, it is not easy to see how the case could be brought within the exception even if it were wider than upon examination it turns out to be. The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Pound Breach—Distress—Constructive possession
11 Geo. II., c. 10, sec. 10.

Where goods distrained for rent have been impounded on the premises it is not necessary that some one should be left in possession of the goods.

This was an appeal by the defendant from the judgment of the Divisional Court (Mr. Justice Lawrence and Mr. Justice Channell) reversing the decision of the Judge of the Southwark County Court; reported in

*Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

15 The Times L.R., 164; [1899] 1 Q.B., 470. The action was brought to recover treble damages for pound breach. The plaintiff was the owner of a house which was let to a tenant at a yearly rent. On Wednesday, July 13, 1898, the rent being in arrear, the plaintiff put in a distress, when the bailiff took an inventory of the goods, and left a man in possession. The County Court jury found that everything required for impounding the goods within 11 Geo. II., c. 19, s. 10, was done. The goods seized were almost entirely the property of the defendant, who was a furniture dealer, the tenant being in possession of them under a hire-purchase agreement. On the night of Thursday and Friday the man in possession went home to sleep about 10 o'clock, returning next morning, as there was no sleeping accommodation in the house. On Saturday the man in possession left the house in the evening and did not return until Monday. During his absence the defendant came in and took possession of the goods. This was the pound breach complained of. The County Court Judge found that the goods had been impounded; that the man in possession had no reasonable necessity for his absence, and, therefore, that he had abandoned possession, but that he intended to return on Monday, so that he had not abandoned the distress, and might be considered in constructive possession, if that was sufficient. He held, however, that to support the action as against the true owner of the goods real possession was necessary. He therefore gave judgment for the defendant. The Divisional Court reversed this decision and entered judgment for the plaintiff, holding that, as the goods had been seized and impounded, and were therefore in the custody of the law, it was not necessary to keep a man in actual possession. The defendant by leave appealed.

Mr. SCHWABE, for the defendant, contended that where the impounding was brought about merely by a man being left in possession the man must continue in possession. If there was not a physical pound, the man must remain in possession. In this case the goods were not locked up in one room, but were left as they were before the seizure, and they only remained in the custody of the law as long as the man remained in possession. He referred to "Bagshaw v. Deacon" ([1898] 2 Q.B., 173).

Mr. J. D. Crawford, for the plaintiff, was not called upon.

The Court dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that leave to appeal had been given in this case by the Divisional Court upon one point only. The County Court Judge found that the goods had been actually impounded, and upon that hypothesis the Divisional Court gave judgment. The learned counsel here sought to say that there had been no impounding, but that point was not open to him now. That being so, the only question was whether the man must always remain in possession of the goods in order to keep them in the custody of the law. The question had only to be stated to carry its own answer. Where there was, as here, an impounding, a man need not be left in actual possession.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS and LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS delivered judgment to the same effect.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL V. LONDON AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.*

Railway Company—Level crossings—Speed of trains—Contravention of Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, sec. 48—Speed exceeding four miles an hour over level crossing—Injunction.

*Reported by F. G. ROGER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Decision of Bruce, J. (15 The Times L.R., 39), affirmed.

This was an appeal by the defendants from the judgment of Mr. Justice Bruce, reported in 15 The Times L.R., 39; [1899] 1 Q.B., 72. It was an information filed by the Attorney-General, on the relation of the Warwickshire County Council, against the defendants for an injunction to restrain them from allowing their trains to cross the Watling-street at the level crossing adjoining Atherstone railway station at a speed greater than four miles an hour. The Watling-street at the point in question was a main road within the meaning of the Highways and Locomotives Act, 1878, section 13, and was within the county of Warwick and was vested in the county council pursuant to section 11 of the Local Government Act, 1888. The defendants or their predecessors in title had obtained power by the Trent Valley Railway Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict., c. cxii.), to carry their railway across the road in question on the level, and with this Act was incorporated the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. By section 48 of the last mentioned Act, "where the railway crosses any turnpike road on a level adjoining to a station, all trains on the railway shall be made to slacken their speed before arriving at such turnpike road, and shall not cross the same at any greater rate of speed than four miles an hour." The road in question came within the above section. The defendants had for a long time past constantly caused their trains to cross the level crossing at a speed greatly exceeding four miles an hour. The crossing was part of the main line, and a large number of express, ordinary, and goods trains passed over the crossing every 24 hours. The vehicular traffic on the road was seriously impeded by reason of the railway traffic. The gates were kept closed against the public during the 12 hours from 6 a.m. to 6 p.m. for a period ranging from 275 to 319 minutes, or for an average during each hour during that period varying from 23 to 26 minutes. The defendants alleged that the inconvenience to the public would be increased if they were obliged to slow down the speed of all their trains as they approached the level crossing, as each train would remain a longer time in the section of the line, as worked upon the block system, in which the level crossing was situate, the practice being to close the gates across the road at the level crossing so long as any train was within the limits of the section in which the crossing was situate. They therefore contended that the Court ought in its discretion to refuse to grant an injunction. Mr. Justice Bruce held that he could not go into questions of convenience, it being the duty of the Court to enforce the express terms of the statute, and he accordingly granted the injunction. The defendants appealed, and it was stated that the real dispute between the parties was as to whether the railway company should bear the expense of making a bridge to carry the road over the railway.

Sir Edward Clarke, Q.C., Mr. Cripps, Q.C., and Mr. Ernest Moon appeared for the defendants; Mr. Asquith, Q.C., Mr. Dickens, Q.C., and Mr. P. Bagnall Evans appeared for the informant.

The COURT, without calling upon counsel for the informant, dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said this was an appeal from an injunction which had been granted to restrain a railway company from passing their trains by a level crossing over a turnpike road at a greater rate of speed than four miles an hour. The company or their predecessors had power conferred on them by Act of Parliament to make a railway over the road in question, but a fetter was placed on that power by section 48 of the Railways Clauses Act, 1845, which said that where a railway crossed a turnpike road on a level adjoining to a station (which was the case here), all trains passing over such a crossing should slacken their speed to a rate not greater than four miles an hour. There was no doubt that the railway company had for a long time been disregarding this section, and the question was whether the Attorney-General was within his rights in taking these proceedings to enforce the provisions of the Act of Parliament. The company now came into Court, and said that the course which they were adopting of sending their trains over the crossing at a great rate of speed was more beneficial to the public than it would be to slacken the speed of their trains to four miles an hour, and that therefore the Attorney-General was not entitled to obtain an injunction against them. This was the first time that he had ever heard of such a thing as that a person, who was indictable for the offence of breaking a statutory obligation, should by way of defence say that it was better for him to break the statute than not. Counsel for the company admitted that they had no authority supporting their contention, but they suggested that there was no authority against it. In his opinion the authorities bore against it. He would not discuss the question whether running the trains at an excessive speed kept the gates shut a longer or a shorter time than running them at the lower speed. It could not be the duty of the Court, when the Legislature said that trains should not go over a certain point at a greater rate than four miles an hour, to inquire whether it would be for the benefit of the public that trains should be allowed to go at a faster rate. It was said that the Attorney-General was not entitled to maintain these proceedings unless he showed some injury to the public arising from what the defendants were doing. But he could not see in any of the cases which had been cited any trace of such a rule, where the express obligation of an Act of Parliament had been broken. His Lordship referred at some length to the cases of "Attorney-General v. Cockermouth Local Board" (L.R., 18 Eq., 172); "Attorney-General v. Great Eastern Railway Co." (11 Ch.D., 449); "Attorney-General v. Shrewsbury (Kingsland) Bridge Co." (21 Ch.D., 752); and "Attorney-General v. Great Western Railway Co." (7 Ch. App., 767). This was the case of a clear statutory enactment imposing a duty, and the injunction for enforcing it had been rightly granted. The appeal must be dismissed.

WEIR V. GIRVIN, ROPER, AND CO.*

Ship—Charter-party—Advance freight.

A portion of the cargo put on board was destroyed by fire before completion of the loading; held, that advance freight was not payable under the charter-party on the portion so lost.

Decision of Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J. (15 The Times L.R., 69), affirmed.

This was an appeal from the judgment of the Lord

*Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Chief Justice at the trial of the action without a jury, reported in 15 The Times L.R., 69; [1899] 1 Q.B., 193. The question in the action shortly was whether, under a charter-party which provided that freight should be payable two-thirds in cash three days after sailing from final port of loading, and the balance on unloading and right delivery, where a portion of the cargo put on board had been destroyed before completion of the loading, two-thirds of the freight was payable in advance in respect of the cargo so lost. The facts were as follows:—The plaintiffs, as owners of the Olivebank, entered into a charter-party, dated March 31, 1898, with the defendants, who carried on business in London as agents for Messrs. Girvin and Eyre, of San Francisco. The following were the material clauses of the charter-party:—"The said vessel shall proceed to a loading berth in the River Tyne or Tyne Dock, and there load a full and complete cargo of coke and lawful merchandise (excluding coals, subject to stipulations in margin, scrap iron, acids, gunpowder, and explosives), the cargo being of such a nature as will load vessel to Lloyd's freeboard (subject to provisions of side clause) not exceeding what she can reasonably stow and carry, and being so loaded shall proceed to San Francisco and deliver the same. The captain to sign bills of lading for the weight of cargo taken on board as presented, without prejudice to the tenor of this charter, provided same equal the amount of the chartered freight. Charterers' liability with respect to this charter to cease, except for freight as provided, on the vessel being loaded, the captain and the owner to have an absolute lien on the cargo for all unpaid freight and demurrage. Freight for the said cargo to be paid on final discharge at the rate of 16s., except on cargo shipped in Hull, as hereinafter provided, per ton of 2,240lb. on the quantity to be delivered to the consignees. The freight to be due and paid as follows:—Two-thirds in cash, less 6 per cent. for all charges, three days after sailing from Tyne, ship lost or not lost, and the balance on unloading and right delivery of the said cargo. The act of God . . . fire, &c., mutually excepted." The charter-party contained in the margin the following clause:—"Charterers undertake to ship, and owners to load, 1,000 tons of dead-weight cargo (of which 500 tons may be cannon coal in charterers' option) in manner required by master in Hull on due notice being given, vessel being where cargo can be delivered in the usual manner, freight on cargo shipped at Hull being paid at 14s. per ton. In event of charterers not loading vessel to her marks, it is agreed that freight shall be paid on the basis of 4,350 tons, which owners hereby guarantee to be vessel's capacity of cargo for the voyage, less pro rata freight on any quantity of cargo short delivered in San Francisco." The charter-party was signed by the defendants "as agents for Girvin and Eyre, of San Francisco." The Olivebank went to Hull and there loaded about 967 tons of cement and 50 tons of cannon coal, all dead-weight cargo. She then proceeded to the Tyne and loaded about 461 tons of firebricks. When the loading had proceeded so far, a fire broke out on board the vessel, and the cargo was damaged to such an extent that the cannon coal had to be taken out and sold, and the firebricks unshipped. Five hundred and sixty-seven tons of the cement were taken out, and the remaining 400 tons were left on board as stiffening and carried on in the vessel as ballast, and not as cargo, and for the purposes of the case were treated as if they had been destroyed and taken out. Assuming that the defendants were bound, under the marginal clause, to ship 4,350 tons of cargo, there remained, after deducting the 1,478 tons destroyed and taken out, 2,872 tons to be shipped by the charterers. The charterers, in fact, shipped a further quantity of 2,590 tons, which, with the original cargo, would have filled the vessel. They thus shipped in all 282 tons less than the quantity stipulated for in the margin of the charter-party. By an arrangement between the parties (which, it was agreed, did not affect the question in the case) the owners took on board 500 tons of coke at a freight of 16s., payable in advance. The ship sailed, and three days after sailing the advance freight became payable. At the time of the hearing of the action the Olivebank was still upon her voyage to San Francisco. The defendants assumed any responsibility that Messrs. Girvin and Eyre might be under in respect of the advance freight on the cargo damaged by fire. The plaintiffs claimed two-thirds of the freight upon 4,350 tons, less 6 per cent. The defendants brought into Court the amount of two-thirds of the freight upon 2,590 tons, the cargo which was being carried to its destination, less 6 per cent. As to the advance freight on the 282 tons short loaded, they did not admit liability. It was proved in evidence that a dead-weight cargo of 4,300 tons would just sink the vessel to her marks, and that the total weight of cargo provided by the charterers would not have done so. The Lord Chief Justice held that advance freight was not payable under the charter-party on the portion of the cargo which had been destroyed by fire, and gave judgment for the defendants. The plaintiffs appealed.

Mr. Carver, Q.C., and Mr. J. A. Hamilton appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. T. E. Scrutton for the defendants.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that by the charter-party the charterers had to do two things, to load a full and complete cargo, and to load the ship down to her marks, and there was a clause in the margin which provided that in the event of the charterers not loading the ship to her marks there was to be a conventional figure—viz., 4,350 tons, upon the basis of which freight was to be paid. The charterers loaded less than a full cargo by 282 tons, and so the marginal clause came into operation, and freight was to be payable on 4,350 tons. What happened was this—1,478 tons of the cargo were shipped, and before the time arrived for payment of the advance freight the 1,478 tons were burnt. It seemed to his Lordship that the case of "Aitken, Lilburn, and Co. v. Ernsthausen and Co." ([1894] 1 Q.B., 773), which was a decision of the Court of Appeal, was important, for there a fire occurred on the ship and destroyed a portion of the cargo on board before the ship sailed, and it was held that the charterers could not be called upon to load further cargo to take the place of that burnt, nor were they liable to pay freight in respect of such part of the cargo. The shipowners could have filled up the space so left vacant with other cargo provided that in so doing they did not delay the voyage. Here 1,478 tons were put out of question altogether when the advance freight became payable. The 1,478 tons were eliminated from the adventure. Then came the question, upon what was the advance freight to be paid? It was said that it should be paid upon the 1,478 tons burnt. But why? That part of the cargo was taken out of the adventure. The Lord Chief Justice held that in the circumstances of the case the conventional amount of 4,350 tons was reduced by the 1,478 tons burnt, which left 2,872 tons as the right earning part of the cargo, and two-thirds of the freight payable as advance freight would be calculated on that basis. With that view he (the Lord Justice) agreed. The judgment would therefore be affirmed.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS and LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS delivered judgment to the same effect.

THE VALENTINE MEAT JUICE COMPANY V. THE VALENTINE EXTRACT COMPANY.*

Trade Name—Imitation—Using own name—Bona fides—Injunction refused.

In this case the plaintiffs, who were an American company and proprietors and manufacturers of the well-known extract called "Valentine's Meat Juice," sought an injunction to restrain the defendant company from carrying on business as manufacturers or vendors of any preparation of extract of meat or meat juice under any name or title of which the name "Valentine" or "Valentine's" formed part; and to restrain the defendant, C. R. Valentine, from carrying on any such business under any such name or title, without clearly distinguishing such business from the business of the plaintiffs. The business of the plaintiffs was originally founded in 1871 by Mr. Mann T. Valentine, who had discovered a mode of preparing meat juice; and the business had always and still consisted entirely in the manufacture and sale of that preparation. In 1892, on the death of the founder, the business passed into the hands of the plaintiffs. They had no depôt, and employed no agent, in England, although they made annual consignments to a few firms in this country to the extent of upwards of a quarter of a million bottles of their meat juice. Their preparation was mainly, but not exclusively, used by sick people and invalids. It was a liquid, and had always been sold in bottles of one size and of a distinctive shape, and under some designation of which the name "Valentine" formed part. In some cases it had been sold or referred to as "Valentine" simply. Until 1898 there was no other preparation of meat on the market connected with the name of Valentine. The defendant company was incorporated in this country in 1897 with a capital of £4,000, divided into 3,000 preferred shares of £1 each and 1,000 deferred shares of a like value, and having amongst its objects the carrying on of the business of meat extract or meat juice manufacturers and vendors. This company was promoted by the defendant, Charles Richard Valentine, and he was its managing director. In 1895 he was in the employment as manager of the Colonial Consignment and Distributing Company, who were dealers in colonial produce, including, at one time, extract of meat manufactured according to Liebig's and other processes. Some time in 1895 the defendant Valentine conceived the idea of putting up solid extract of meat in the form of globules enclosed in a protecting cover, so that it could be carried about in small quantities, and be made readily available as food by travellers and others. For this process he subsequently obtained a patent which, in 1897, he sold to the defendant company for £1,440, to be paid as to £500 in cash and the balance in deferred shares. The memorandum of association was signed by seven clerks who were nominees of the defendant Valentine, but the company was not, in his Lordship's opinion, altogether what is ordinarily understood as a "one man company." The defendant Valentine left the service of the Colonial Consignment Company in June, 1898, and the defendant company then commenced the sale of meat globules. They were at first packed in boxes bearing labels describing them as "Valentine's Valtine Meat Globules," the word "Valtine" being a registered trade-mark which was acquired by the company on its formation from the defendant Valentine. Since the commencement of this action the description on the labels had been altered to "Valtine Meat Globules." The plaintiffs did not now complain that the defendants had got up their goods so as to resemble the plaintiffs', but that the defendants had made use of the name "Valentine" in such a way as to deceive the public into the belief that the goods sold by the defendants were manufactured by the plaintiffs.

Mr. Meulton, Q.C., Mr. Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Mr. Sebastian appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Upjohn, Q.C., and Mr. A. Sims for the defendants.

MR. JUSTICE STIRLING, in giving his reserved judgment, after stating the facts and reviewing the evidence which had been given at great length at the trial of the action, said that it was not unimportant to observe that the goods of the plaintiffs and defendants respectively were of a different nature. The plaintiffs' preparation was a liquid, the defendants' was a solid. The plaintiffs' was principally intended for use with cold water, the defendants' was most conveniently used with hot water. Speaking broadly the plaintiffs' preparation was a medicine; the defendants' was a food, and on the evidence his Lordship found that there was no substantial competition between the two articles. He then considered the law applicable to such a state of facts upon the assumption that all the acts complained of were being done by the defendant Valentine personally. The law might be very shortly stated. It was this—"Nobody has any right to represent his goods as those of somebody else," per Lord Halsbury, L.C., "Reddaway v. Banham" ([1896] A.C., 204). If a plaintiff complained that such representations were being made by a defendant, it was not necessary in order to obtain an injunction that he should prove any intent to deceive on the part of the defendant. This point was decided by Lord Cotton in "Millington v. Fox" (3 My. and Cr., 338), and again more recently by the Court of Appeal in the case of "Reddaway v. Bentham Hemp-Spinning Co." ([1892] 2 Q.B., 639), and had been distinctly stated to be the law of the Court by the Lord Chancellor in "Cellular Cloth Co. v. Maxton" ([1899] A.C., 326). It was, therefore, for the plaintiff in a case such as the present to establish that the defendant was selling his goods in such a way as to represent to the public that they were the manufacture of the plaintiffs. Where the defendants bore the same name as the plaintiff it was not an easy task to satisfy that burden. "If a man," said the Master of the Rolls in "Powell v. Birmingham Vinegar Brewery" ([1896] 2 Ch., 69), "uses his own name to denote his own goods, it would be intolerable to confer on him the right to prevent other people of the same name from honestly using their own name to denote their own goods, even although they might be of the same kind as his and be undistinguishable from them, 'Burgess v. Burgess' (3 D., M., and G., 896); 'Turton v. Turton' (42 Ch. D., 128)." This point had recently been considered by Mr. Justice Byrne in "Jameson v. Jameson" (15 R.P.C., 169). That learned Judge was of opinion that a burden was cast on the new trader to take care to distinguish his goods from those of the original trader, and on the facts he was of opinion that the defendant had not discharged the onus which lay on him. The Court of Appeal, before whom the case afterwards came, did not differ from the law thus laid down, but did differ on the question of fact, being of opinion that the defendant had taken sufficient care to distinguish his goods. There the defendant had simply placed his own Christian name and surname on his goods, which were of the same kind and were got up in the same way as the plaintiffs', that got up being common to the trade. That the Court of Appeal held (in the absence of mala fides) to be enough.

*Reported by G. A. STREETEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

It was sought in argument to distinguish "Jameson v. Jameson" from the present case on the ground that the plaintiffs had established that in the market their goods had come to be known by the name of "Valentine." The evidence did show, in his Lordship's opinion, that the plaintiffs' preparation had been designated as Valentine's Meat Juice, or Valentine's Extract, or Valentine's simply; and if the defendants were selling a preparation similar to the plaintiffs', it might be that the latter would have succeeded in establishing what the Lord Justice called their first premise. The plaintiffs, however, had never manufactured or sold any goods such as the defendants had put on the market. The articles sold by the defendants were both in appearance and in reality different from that made and sold by the plaintiffs. No one buying the defendants' article could possibly suppose that he had ever bought such an article of the plaintiffs'; the defendants' article had never been known on the market as the plaintiffs'. If the well-known firm of Bass and Co. brewed nothing but pale ale, and that ale had acquired the name of Bass, could that firm restrain another brewer of the same name from selling porter or stout manufactured by the second brewer, giving his name or address? His Lordship thought not, and in his judgment the defendant Valentine, if he were honestly carrying on the business of selling these meat globules in his own name and on his own account, could not be restrained from using his own name in connexion with that business. His Lordship then considered the question whether the defendant Valentine had not done something more than use his own name in such a way as to render him liable to be restrained from carrying on business as he had done, and he proceeded to deal with certain attacks made by the plaintiffs upon the good faith of the defendant Valentine, but on the whole, though he thought the case had many features of suspicion, he came to the conclusion that want of good faith had not been established. There still remained the question whether the defendant company was entitled as against the plaintiffs to make use of the name Valentine. If the defendant Valentine had himself commenced the business and carried it on under his own name, his Lordship thought he would have been entitled to assign to a company formed for the purpose the goodwill of that business, and the right to use his name in connexion with it, always supposing that all this was done in good faith. The defendant Valentine, however, had never himself carried on the business of manufacturing and selling these globules. He formed the defendant company, giving it his own name, and making over to it a so-called goodwill, consisting of the benefit of promises made to him by persons well disposed towards him and the business proposed to be carried on. Such a goodwill could not be of any substantial value, though it was possible that rights in respect of it might have been enforced in equity upon the principles laid down in "Trego v. Hunt." Still the defendant Valentine was the inventor of these globules; he had a reputation as a man of business, though not in connexion with extract of meat; and he intended that the business of the globules should be carried on for his own benefit, though his own resources were not sufficient to enable him to start it. His Lordship thought that under these circumstances the defendant Valentine was entitled, acting in good faith, to give his own name to the company which he founded. The case did not fall within the principle of such authorities as "Day v. Day," where a man having no real interest in a business was introduced into it simply to give it the desired name. The action therefore failed, but under the circumstances it would be dismissed without costs.

MOXHAM AND OTHERS V. GRANT.*

Company—Winding up—Directors—Misfeasance —Payment of dividend out of capital.

Directors who had been compelled to pay the liquidator capital improperly, but with the assent of the shareholders, distributed as dividends held entitled to recover such dividends from the shareholders.

Decision of the Divisional Court (15 The Times L.R., 180) affirmed.

This was an appeal from the judgment of the Divisional Court (Mr. Justice Lawrence and Mr. Justice Channell), reported in 15 The Times L.R., 180; [1899] 1 Q.B., 480. The plaintiffs were directors of a company named Cory's Steamers (Limited). The company owned a steamship named the Primrose, which was lost in 1894. The underwriters paid £719 2s. 6d. in respect of the loss. That sum represented capital, as it represented the steamship. In April, 1894, the directors sent a circular to the shareholders in the following form:—"We have a sum of money in hand from insurance received on account of the loss of the Primrose. We propose remitting 10s. per share. If you see no objection, we will send you £—, being 10s. on your — shares, on your sending a receipt on enclosed form, and provided all the shareholders consent. There will be a considerable sum more to receive for insurance of Primrose." The form of receipt was as follows:—"Received of Cory's Steamers (Limited) the sum of £—, being a reduction of 10s. per share on the — shares held by me." In reply to the circular the defendant sent the following letter:—"I quite agree with the proposition of your letter of April 10, and enclose my receipt for £13, being 10s. on my 26 shares." Other similar payments were made to the defendant, the total amount being £35 15s. Upon December 29, 1896, a winding-up order was made against the company, and on December 22, 1897, the liquidator of the company obtained an order under section 10 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, declaring that the payment to the defendant and other shareholders of the various sums, amounting in the whole to £719 2s. 6d., was a payment of part of the capital of the company and was unlawfully and improperly paid in reduction of the capital of the company, and it was further ordered that the directors should pay to the official liquidator the sum of £719 2s. 6d. The order was expressly made without prejudice to the right of the directors to be recouped by the shareholders the amounts paid by the directors to them. The directors, the plaintiffs, then brought an action against the defendant to recover the £35 15s. they had paid to him. The County Court Judge gave judgment for the plaintiffs, and the Divisional Court affirmed this decision. The defendant appealed.

Mr. J. G. Witt, Q.C., and Mr. Poley appeared for the defendant; Mr. Meager appeared for the plaintiffs.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that it was admitted that the £719 2s. 6d., which was paid by the underwriters on the loss of the Primrose, was part of the capital of the company. The directors and shareholders agreed that they did not want this money as capital and resolved to divide it. Therefore the shareholders knew that it was part of the capital of the company. It was not a case where shareholders received money of the company in ignorance that they had no right to receive it. There was no order of the Court obtained for the reduction of the capital of the company. When the company was wound up the liquidator discovered what had been done, and, in his Lordship's opinion, the liquidator might have taken proceedings against every one who had received portions of the £719 2s. 6d. Instead of doing that, the liquidator, as the most convenient course, took proceedings against the directors, who had received the money and who had distributed it among the shareholders, and he recovered the whole amount from them. The directors thereupon brought an action against the defendant to recover from him the amount which he had received, and which the directors had been compelled to pay to the liquidator. What was the position of a shareholder who had received money of the company with notice that it formed part of the company's capital? It seemed to his Lordship that the position of the shareholder in such a case was, as laid down by Sir George Jessel in "Russell v. Wakefield Waterworks Company" (L.R., 20 Eq., 474, at p. 479), that of a constructive trustee. That being so, the rule of equity as between two trustees had been explained in many cases, and in "Chillingworth v. Chambers" ([1896] 1 Ch., 685) the matter was fully discussed by Lord Justices Lindley and Kay and himself, and he would only refer to one passage in his own judgment (at p. 707):—"As between two trustees who are in pari delicto, the one who has made good a loss occasioned by a breach of trust for which the two are jointly and severally liable may obtain contribution to that loss from the other." The case cited in support of that proposition was "Lingard v. Bromley" (1 V. and B., 114) (see p. 710 of the report). In the present case the defendant took his portion of the £719 2s. 6d. with notice that it formed part of the capital of the company. He became a constructive trustee, and must recoup his co-trustees, who had been compelled to pay it back, the amount so received by him. Upon that ground the judgment of the Divisional Court was right. His Lordship also thought that the doctrine laid down in "Bonner v. Tottenham Building Society" ([1899] 1 Q.B., 161) applied. He desired to add that the passage in "Lindley on Companies" (5th ed., pp. 389, 390) did not apply where the shareholders took the money with notice, as here, nor where one person had been compelled by process of law to pay in relief of another.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS concurred. When the circumstances of the case were understood, it was clear that the liquidator could have enforced against each shareholder repayment of the moneys received by each. That he could enforce repayment against the directors to whom the whole fund had originally passed lay at the root of the matter. Therefore they began the discussion with these facts. The directors, being the persons who had collected and distributed the fund, were liable to repay it to the liquidator, and the persons to whom it was distributed were also liable to the liquidator, and the directors were compelled to pay the whole sum distributed. Further, that payment had necessarily gone in relief of the shareholders. Upon those facts—namely, a payment by compulsion by one of a sum for which another was liable to the same person—there arose by implication of law a right in the person paying to be recouped by the person relieved. Having got those facts, which entitled a person so paying to indemnity or contribution, what was the answer attempted to be set up? The only possible answer was that these persons were joint tortfeasors, and that there was no right of indemnity or contribution. Lord Denman, in "Betts v. Gibbins" (2 A. and E., 57, at p. 74), in dealing with "Merryweather v. Nixon" (8 T.R., 186), said that that case "seems to me to have been strained beyond what the decision will bear. The present case is an exception to the general rule. The general rule is that between wrongdoers there is neither indemnity nor contribution; the exception is where the act is not clearly illegal in itself." He (the Lord Justice) did not suppose that any of those who dealt with this money thought that there was any illegality in doing what was done. The only illegality was a technical one; it was an ultra vires act. It had been held over and over again that money paid in breach of trust to persons who took it knowing the payment to be a breach of trust did not constitute those persons joint tortfeasors. Mr. Justice Channell dealt with that point and with the line of authorities relating to it; and Vice-Chancellor Bacon, in Flitcroft's case (21 Ch.D., 519, at p. 527), also so held. That disposed of the case. But he (the Lord Justice) would deal with the argument whether or not there was a trust. The only bearing this had lay in establishing that the person who received the money received it in such circumstances as made it capable of being recovered back. If the money was paid to the shareholder unarmarked, so that the liquidator could not claim it as money had and received to his use, the chain of consecution out of which the right to indemnity arose was broken. Unless the payment was made in relief of the person against whom the indemnity was claimed, the claim for indemnity was gone. Therefore, it must be shown that the liquidator would be entitled to sue the shareholder. That was established if the liquidator could follow the money, and that was so in the present case, because the shareholder received it with notice, from which, if he knew his law, he must have known that the directors had no right to pay it to him. The whole chain therefore was established. The payment by the directors to the liquidator was in relief of an existing liability of the shareholders, and was a payment which they were compelled to make. Therefore there arose upon common law principles a right of indemnity. There was also the same right on the general rules of equity, and this right was not affected by any question of the parties being joint tortfeasors.

THE BRUNEL.*

Ship—Collision—Limitation of liability—Exemption from registry—Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, sec. 3.

The words "15 tons burden" in sec. 3 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, mean net register tonnage, not gross tonnage.

Decision of Gorell Barnes, J. (15 The Times L.R., 92), affirmed.

This was an appeal from a judgment of Mr. Justice Gorell Barnes, reported in 15 The Times L.R., 92. The action was brought by the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the city of Bristol, the owners of the steam tug Brunel, to limit their liability for damages occasioned by their tug to the defendants' steamship Glanmire, on October 27, 1897. The Brunel was a vessel not registered in accordance with the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, and was of the gross tonnage of 35.99 tons, ascertained by measurement in accordance with the Act, her engine-room space being 17·8 tons and her crew space 6·73 tons. The plaintiffs claimed to be entitled to limit their liability to the amount of £8 for every ton of the ship's tonnage. They contended that the Brunel was exempted from registry under section 3 of the Merchant Shipping Act, as she was employed solely in the manner mentioned in that section, and, if measured in accordance with the Act, she did not exceed 15 tons burden. The defendants contended that the Brunel was not exempt from registry, as she was a vessel of more than 15 tons burden, and that the owners were therefore not entitled to limit their liability. Mr. Justice Gorell Barnes held that the Brunel was exempt from registry, and that the plaintiffs were entitled to limit their liability to £8 for each ton of her gross tonnage ascertained by measuring her according to the Act. The defendants appealed.

*Reported by F. G. BUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law

Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. Butler Aspinall, Q.C., appeared for the defendants; Mr. Robson, Q.C., and Mr. Lauriston Batten for the plaintiffs.

The Court dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that in this case the owners of the Brunel had taken proceedings for limitation of liability under section 503 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, and the point taken against them was that, as they had not registered their ship, they were not entitled to a limitation of liability. Mr. Justice Barnes held otherwise, because the Brunel was a ship not exceeding 15 tons burden, and therefore by section 3 of the Merchant Shipping Act was exempted from registry. The question was, What was the meaning of "15 tons burden" in that section? Did it mean gross tonnage or register tonnage? In the Court below counsel for the defendants had argued that "burden" in that section meant carrying capacity. But in the face of the judgment of Mr. Justice Barnes they had given up that contention, and they now said that it meant gross tonnage, at least that was the effect of their argument. The word "tonnage" was used many times throughout the Act, and the Act consisted of a number of groups of sections dealing with various matters. But in his opinion, on the true construction of this particular section, the words "tons burden" there used meant register net tonnage, and not gross tonnage. The vessel therefore did not require to be registered, and the judgment of Mr. Justice Barnes was right.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS and LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS delivered judgments in which they arrived at the same conclusion.

RICE V. NOAKES AND CO. (LIMITED).*

Mortgage—Redemption—Restrictive covenant—"Tied" publichouse.

Mortgagor held entitled to redeem free from the "tie."

This case raised an important question as to the rights of mortgagors and mortgagees of tied publichouses. The plaintiff, a licensed victualler, in October, 1897, became the purchaser of property at Camberwell, including a publichouse known as the King's Arms, held upon lease for a term expiring at Christmas, 1923. Prior to his purchase the defendants, Noakes and Co. (Limited), brewers, had a mortgage on the property, the terms of which were practically identical with those of the mortgage of 1897 mentioned below. The defendants were not the vendors, but they released their security in order to enable Messrs. Nicholson, the second mortgagees, to sell to the plaintiff for £6,800. As is usual, the plaintiff only found a small portion of the cash, the defendants, the brewers, advancing £4,850 on a first mortgage. This mortgage was dated October 7, 1897. It recited that the defendants had agreed to lend to the plaintiff the sum of £4,850 upon having the repayment thereof and of such other moneys as were thereafter mentioned secured in manner thereafter appearing; and it was witnessed that, in consideration of £4,850 then lent to the plaintiff by the defendants and for securing the payment to the defendants of the said principal sum and all such further sums as thereafter mentioned, the plaintiff demised and conveyed to the defendants the leasehold premises, and all trade and tenant's fixtures, and the goodwill of the business of a licensed victualler or other business carried on upon the said premises, and the full benefit and advantage of all certificates and the magistrates' and Excise licences for carrying on such business or relating to the said premises, to hold to the defendants subject to a power of redemption therein contained. By this proviso it was declared that, if the plaintiff should, either on demand by the defendants left at the demised messuage, or without such demand, pay to them all such principal moneys and interest as were respectively mentioned in the covenant for payment thereafter contained, and as should then be due on that security, then the defendants would, at the request and cost of the plaintiff, surrender or reconvey the premises to the plaintiff or as he should direct, and (after attorning tenant at a peppercorn rent if demanded) the plaintiff covenanted with the defendants that he would on demand pay to them the said principal sum and interest at 5 per cent. until payment, and all such further sums as should be due from the plaintiff, as well for money advanced to or for the use of the plaintiff, or paid on his behalf as therein mentioned, or on any other account or otherwise howsoever, with interest at the rate aforesaid, as also for goods sold and delivered by the defendants to the plaintiff. After other provisions the deed continued as follows:—"And for the considerations aforesaid the mortgagor, so as to charge the premises. . . hereby demised into whosoever possession the same may come, whether by act of the party or by operation of law or by any other ways or means however, and to the further intent that the obligation of this covenant may run with the land, doth hereby covenant with the company that the mortgagor shall not, nor will at any time during the continuance of the term aforesaid, and whether any principal moneys or interest shall or shall not be owing upon the security of these presents, use or sell, or permit to be used or sold, in, upon, or about the said demised premises any malt liquors except such as shall be bona fide purchased by the mortgagor of the company. And, further, that, if and whenever there shall be a breach of the said covenant, he, the mortgagor, shall and will pay to the company the sum of £1,000 as and for ascertained liquidated damages for each such breach, and will sell all such malt liquors pure, unadulterated, and unmixed, and of the like strength, character, and quality in all respects as the same shall be supplied to him." The deed also declared that the words "the mortgagor" and "the company," except when otherwise controlled by the context, should, throughout the deed, include all persons deriving title under them respectively. The plaintiff was willing to pay off all money due to the defendants under the mortgage, and required them, on payment being made, to reconvey the leasehold property to him, and to release him from the covenant by which the house purported to be "tied" to the defendants during the whole currency of the lease, or to transfer the mortgage to him and assign the benefit of the covenant. The defendants were willing to reconvey or transfer, but not to release or assign the covenant, and the present action was brought to obtain a declaration that the plaintiff was entitled, not only to reconveyance or transfer, but also to a release or assignment of the covenant.

Mr. Astbury, Q.C., and Mr. Edward Beaumont were for the plaintiff; and Mr. Eve, Q.C., and Mr. Stanley Fisher for the defendants.

MR. JUSTICE COZENS-HARDY, in delivering judgment, after stating the facts, proceeded as follows:—The question which I have to decide is whether the "tie" can be retained by the defendants. If this case had arisen for decision a few years ago, I think no Judge of first instance would have hesitated to hold that the "tie" could not be enforced after the discharge of the security. It would have been regarded as a plain case of "clogging" the equity of redemption. But the supposed ancient doctrine of the Courts has been so treasured upon in recent years that it is very difficult to say what part (if any) of it still remains. It has been held that a mortgagor may be precluded from redeeming for a fixed period, such as five or seven years, Teevan v. Smith (L.R. 20, Ch.D., 724, 729). It has been held that, during the full period in which a mortgagor is precluded from redeeming, he may be bound by covenant to buy his beer only from the mortgagee, Biggs v. Hoddinott (L.R. [1898], 2 Ch., 307). In that case, the "tie" was objected to, not on the ground of its being a clog on the equity of redemption, but on the ground that it conferred on the mortgagee a collateral advantage which he was not entitled to retain. The objection, however, did not prevail. It has been held that a mortgagee of a leasehold theatre may, in consideration of a cash advance, take a covenant to repay the sum advanced with interest by quarterly instalments extending over five years, and to pay a share of the net profits of the theatre during the whole residue of the lease extending beyond the five years, and that a proviso for redemption on payment of all moneys covenanted to be paid, including the share of profits, is not invalid, Santley v. Wilde (L.R. [1899], 2 Ch., 474). It will be observed that in that case the proviso for redemption was nugatory, because it only came into operation on the expiration of the lease, at which date, ex hypothesi, there would be nothing upon which the proviso could operate. If I rightly understand the judgment of the Court of Appeal, it established that a mortgage of leasehold property expressed to be a security for the due discharge of future recurring obligations cannot be redeemed before those obligations have matured, even though the period covered by the obligations may or must exceed the duration of the lease. I do not think any other or larger principle can be extracted from that case. On the other hand, "once a mortgage, always a mortgage," is still a sound legal maxim. Anything which is comprised in a mortgage security must, when the debt is paid or the obligation is discharged, be returned to the mortgagor. It must be returned in its entirety. No part of it can be retained by the mortgagee. A remarkable instance of this doctrine is to be found in Salt v. Marquis of Northampton (L.R. [1892], A.C., 1). This doctrine is not questioned, and indeed is expressly admitted by the Court of Appeal in Santley v. Wilde. It remains to apply to the present case, as best I can, the principles to be gathered from the authorities both ancient and modern. In the first place, the mortgage is in terms a security only for the moneys covenanted to be paid—i.e., principal and interest, and the price of goods sold and delivered. All these moneys the plaintiff offers to pay. It does not profess to be a security for the performance of the negative covenant which is commonly called a tie. In the second place, on payment of that which the plaintiff offers to pay, the event will happen upon which, by the terms of the deed, the defendants are bound to "surrender or reconvey the premises." In the third place, such a surrender or reconveyance is inconsistent with the retention of any charge on or interest in the premises. In the fourth place, the negative covenant or "tie" is expressed to be a "charge" on the premises. I doubt whether this phrase is strictly accurate. The precise operation of such a covenant has been described in different ways. Lord Cottenham in Tulk v. Moxhay (2 Ph., 774) calls it an "equity attached to the property by the owner." Sir George Jessel in L. and S.-W.R.Co. v. Gomm (L.R., 20 Ch.D., 583) calls it an "equitable burden." This much at least is clear, that, in the hands of the plaintiff and of any person taking with notice, this covenant imposes a fetter upon the enjoyment of the property and materially lessens its value. And in the present case no purchaser of the lease could escape being affected with notice. Upon the whole, I think the "tie," though perfectly valid during the continuance of the security, cannot be maintained when all moneys due upon the security have been paid off. It seems to me to be involved in the very idea of a mortgage that a mortgagee, when paid off, shall have no estate or interest in the mortgaged premises, and no right to interfere with the mortgagor in his enjoyment or user of the premises. I must therefore declare that, on payment off of all moneys due, the plaintiff is entitled to have a reconveyance of the property, or at his option a transfer of the security, free in either case from the tie. The defendants must pay the costs of the action.

VOGAN AND CO. V. OULTON.*

Contract—Hiring—Warranty—Damages—Remoteness.

Decision of Wright, J. (15 The Times L.R., affirmed.

This was an appeal by the defendant from the judgment of Mr. Justice Wright at the trial of the action without a jury, reported in 15 The Times L.R., 33. The action was brought to recover damages for breach of an implied warranty that certain sacks hired from the defendant by the plaintiffs to be used for the purpose of unloading a cargo of peas from the steamship Norlands, lying in the Surrey Commercial Docks, were reasonably fit for that purpose. The plaintiffs hired a large number of sacks, amounting to about 3,800, from the defendant, who was in the habit of letting out sacks on hire. The plaintiffs were the consignees of a cargo of peas which arrived in London by the steamship Norlands, and which was discharged by the dock company, as was usual, in the dock; but in accordance with the rules of the dock company the sacks had to be supplied by the consignees. The plaintiffs accordingly hired the sacks from the defendant, who knew the purpose for which the sacks were to be used. As one of the sacks, filled with peas, was being hoisted out of the hold it broke off at the neck and fell upon a man named Batt, who was engaged in the work of unloading. Batt brought an action in the County Court against the present plaintiffs for damages for the injury sustained by him in consequence of the negligence of the plaintiffs in using a sack which was unfit for the work, and recovered £25. The plaintiffs now claimed from the defendant the £25 and costs which they had to pay to Batt, on the ground that there was an implied warranty that the sack in question was fit for the purpose for which it was supplied. Mr. Justice Wright held that there was an implied warranty as contended, and that the sack in question was at time of hiring unfit for the purpose for which it was supplied, and that the defendant contemplated that it would be used in the manner in which it was used. He accordingly gave judgment for the plaintiffs for the damages and costs in the County Court, which they had to pay to Batt.

Mr. W. F. Taylor, Q.C., and Mr. W. H. S. Oulton appeared for the defendant; Mr. Carver, Q.C., and Mr. E. P. Hewitt for the plaintiffs were not called upon.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that the defendant, when he let the sacks out to the plaintiffs, knew that they were to be used for the purpose of unloading peas from the hold of the ship. While one of the sacks was being so used the neck of the sack gave way, and the sack fell upon a man named Batt, who was engaged in the hold in the work of unloading, and injured him. Batt sued the present plaintiffs in the County Court and recovered £25 damages and costs. The plaintiffs then brought this action against the defendant to recover the damages and costs so paid to Batt, and their cause of action was for breach of warranty in supplying them with an article which was at the time of the hiring unfit for the purpose for which the defendant knew that the plaintiffs wanted it. Mr. Justice Wright found that the sack was at the time of the hiring not fit for the purpose for which it was to be used. They could not possibly interfere with that finding of fact. It was then said that the damages were too remote, because the parties could not have contemplated that it might fall upon a person in the hold. He (the Lord Justice) could not accept that. It was a matter of fact. The defendant knew that the sacks would be used in hoisting peas out of the hold. The case, therefore, was on all fours with "Mowbray v. Merryweather" ([1895] 2 Q.B., 640). He could not see any distinction between the two cases, and every point taken on behalf of the defendant was answered in the judgment of Lord Esher in that case.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS agreed. When the facts of the case were once understood, the case did not raise any question of law. Mr. Justice Wright had found that the particular class of user to which the sack was applied was an ordinary user for such a sack, and that therefore the defendant must be taken to have contemplated the use to which it would be put. That was a question of fact, and, having once got those facts, the case was covered by "Mowbray v. Merryweather."

Court of Appeal (A. L. Smith, Collins, } 1899. and Vaughan Williams, L.J.J.) } Nov. 17.

IN RE AN ARBITRATION BETWEEN THE SOUTHAMPTON TRAMWAYS COMPANY AND THE MAYOR, &C., OF SOUTHAMPTON.*

Tramway Company—Purchase of undertaking—Determining the price—Tramways Act, 1870, sec. 43.

Decision of the Divisional Court (15 The Times L.R., 217) affirmed.

This was an appeal by the Southampton Tramways

Company from the judgment of the Divisional Court (Mr. Justice Bruce and Mr. Justice Ridley) upon a case stated by Sir Henry Oakley, the umpire appointed under the Southampton Corporation Tramways Act, 1897, to decide certain disputes between the Southampton Tramways Company and the Southampton Corporation as to the price at which the corporation should take over the undertaking of the Tramways Company in accordance with the Act of 1897. The case is reported in 15 The Times L.R., 217. The questions for the opinion of the Court were (1) whether, in determining the price to be paid under the Act of 1897, the arbitrators and umpire should treat the undertaking of the company, as defined by that Act, as an undertaking which the company only enjoyed subject to the contingency of being compelled to part therewith under the terms of section 43 of the Tramways Act, 1870; or (2) whether, in determining the price to be paid as aforesaid, the arbitrators and umpire should treat the undertaking as an undertaking which the company enjoyed free from all obligation to part therewith otherwise than under the terms of the Act of 1897 itself. If the first question was answered in the affirmative, the umpire fixed the price at £51,505; and, if the first question was answered in the negative and the second in the affirmative, the price fixed was £109,963. The material statutes were shortly as follows:—By the Southampton Street Tramways Act, 1877 (40 and 41 Vict., c. cxxi.), the Southampton Tramways Company was formed for the purpose of making and maintaining tramways, and the Lands Clauses Consolidation Acts, 1845, 1860, and 1869, and parts 2 and 3 of the Tramways Act, 1870 (which included section 43), were expressed to be incorporated with the Act and to form part thereof except where expressly varied by the Act. By section 48 of the Act, in case the corporation should at any time after 11 years from the completion of any portion of the tramways within the borough of Southampton, but not later than 21 years after the passing of the Act, desire to purchase the tramways, and the works, material, and equipment connected therewith, and any lands or buildings acquired for the purposes of such tramways, and should apply to Parliament for powers to do so, and to enable the company to sell the same, the company should not oppose such application, and in the event of such powers being obtained should accordingly sell the tramways and premises to the corporation, and the terms of such purchase should, failing agreement, be determined by arbitration in manner provided by the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, for the settlement by arbitration of questions of disputed compensation. The Act received the Royal assent on August 10, 1877, so that the 21 years would expire on August 10, 1898. Section 43 of the Tramways Act, 1870, which was incorporated with the Southampton Street Tramways Act, 1877, empowered the local authority within six months after a period of 21 years from the time when the company were empowered to construct the tramway, and within six months after the expiration of every subsequent seven years, to require the company to sell their undertaking upon the terms therein mentioned. In 1894 the House of Lords, in "Edinburgh Street Tramways Co. v. Lord Provost of Edinburgh" and "London Street Tramways Co. v. London County Council" ([1894] A.C., 456), decided that section 43 of the Tramways Act, 1870, empowered the local authority to buy the tramway upon the terms of paying only for the value of the structure and plant. In 1897 the Southampton Corporation Tramways Act, 1897 (60 and 61 Vict., c. xxvi.), was passed to enable the corporation to purchase the tramways. Section 1 of that Act defined "the undertaking" as meaning "the undertaking, works, lands, easements, plant, fixed and movable stock-in-trade, buildings, equipment, rights, powers, privileges, and authorities of the company, including the right to demand and take and recover tolls, rents, and charges." Section 3 provided that "the corporation shall purchase and the company shall sell the undertaking of the company" for such price as might be agreed on or settled by arbitration under the Lands Clauses Acts, and the purchase was to be completed on June 30, 1898. By section 4:—"The undertaking of the company shall by virtue of this Act become, and shall on and as from the transfer day be transferred to and vested in the corporation, subject to and according to the provisions of this Act, and free, as between the company and corporation, from the mortgage debt of the company, and all current debts and pecuniary liabilities of the company at the transfer day, and from that day the corporation shall hold the undertaking subject to and shall take over, perform, and satisfy all duties, contracts, engagements, obligations, and liabilities of the company in relation to the undertaking transferred other than and except the debts and liabilities aforesaid." On June 30, 1898, the undertaking was, by virtue of the Act, transferred to and vested in the corporation. It was contended on behalf of the Tramways Company that the price to be paid should be calculated as if the company enjoyed the rights and privileges of the undertaking free from all obligation to part therewith other than the obligation created by the Act of 1897; in other words, that the company were entitled to be paid as though they were selling a concession of their privileges in perpetuity. It was contended on behalf of the corporation that the company had a concession liable to be determined under section 43 of the Tramways Act, 1870, at the end of 21 years, and after that at the end of each subsequent seventh year, and that that was all the company had to sell, and that therefore the smaller figure—£51,505—was the proper amount of the purchase money. The Divisional Court adopted the contention of the corporation. The Tramways Company appealed.

Mr. Asquith, Q.C., Mr. J. D. Fitzgerald, Q.C., Mr. G. M. Freeman, Q.C., and Mr. A. Lyttelton appeared for the Tramways Company; Sir Edward Clarke, Q.C., Mr. Cripps, Q.C., and Mr. Haldane, Q.C., appeared for the corporation.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that the case was a plain one. There were two contentions put before the umpire, and he found two figures according as the Court thought which was the right contention. It was clear that the Tramways Company held their property fettered with the condition contained in section 43 of the Tramways Act, 1870—namely, that they might be called upon to sell their undertaking at the end of 21 years, or at the end of each subsequent seven years, for a price fixed in accordance with the decision of the House of Lords in the Edinburgh and London tramway cases ([1894] A.C., 456). Prior to the Southampton Corporation Tramways Act, 1897, all that the company had to sell was its undertaking clogged with that condition. The undertaking of the company was defined in section 1 of the Act of 1897, and it seemed clear to him that when that Act empowered the corporation to buy the undertaking, it was an undertaking fettered with the condition contained in section 43 of the Tramways Act, 1870. There was nothing in the Act of 1897 to show that the undertaking to be sold was to be free from the fetter.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS and LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS concurred.

DE BRAAM V. FORD.*

Bill of Sale—Validity—Form in schedule of Act—Non-compliance with—Stipulated time for payment—Payment "on or before" 1st November.

This was a motion raising an extremely narrow point on the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, which provides section 9) that bills of sale must be in accordance with the form given in the schedule to the Act. The form provides for payment of the debt secured by instalments "at stipulated times or time." In this case the plaintiff, Jean André de Braam, had borrowed money from the defendant, a money-lender, of Cork-street. The borrower and his wife gave a bill of sale to the lender over certain furniture. It was agreed that payment of the principal sums secured should be made "on or before the first day of November, 1899." The money purported to be secured was not paid, and the defendant was taking steps to realize. The plaintiff issued a writ claiming a declaration that the bill of sale was void, and an injunction to restrain the defendant from removing or seizing the furniture. This motion was made on the part of the plaintiff for an interim injunction.

Mr. Macnaghten, Q.C., and Mr. Stewart Smith were for the plaintiff; Mr. Herbert Reed, Q.C., and Mr. Thorn Drury for the defendant.

MR. JUSTICE NORTH said that there was here a question of pure law—on the construction of two documents the form given in the schedule to the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, and the bill of sale given by the plaintiff. It had been urged that the Court could not decide the question for trial on an interlocutory injunction, but there were cases in which the Court must, to deal with an application for an interlocutory order, decide the question in the action. Here there could be no evidence, and the whole materials were before the Court. His Lordship referred to the cases "Hetherington v. Grooms" (13 Q.B.D., 789) and "Sibley v. Higgs" (15 Q.B.D., 619), where it had been held in one case that an agreement to pay "on demand," in the other case that an agreement to pay "seven days after demand," was not an agreement to pay at a stipulated time. He said that an agreement to pay on or before a named day was equally an agreement to pay at an uncertain time, and therefore not in accordance with the form in the schedule to the Act. The present variation from the form might be in favour of the borrower. If the instrument did not accord with the statutory form it was void, whether the variation was in favour of the one party or the other. His Lordship therefore granted an injunction.

ELLIS (APPELLANT) V. CAMBERWELL ASSESSMENT COMMITTEE (RESPONDENTS).†

Poor Rate—Assessment—Publichouse—Increase of value—Premium paid for lease—Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869, secs. 46 and 47.

An increase in value arising merely from general prosperity is not an alteration in value within the meaning of sec. 46, subs. 1, of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869.

*Reported by D. FITCAIRN, Esq., Barrister-at Law.
†Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at Law.

The amount of the premium paid for the lease of a publichouse is admissible in evidence on the question of alteration in value.

Decision of the Divisional Court (15 The Times L.R., 149) reversed.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Divisional Court (Mr. Justice Lawrance and Mr. Justice Channell), upon a case stated by the London Quarter Sessions upon an appeal against the supplemental valuation list for the parish of Camberwell for the year 1897. The case is reported in 15 The Times L.R., 149, and it raised important questions as to the valuation of houses (in the present case a publichouse) in the metropolis. The facts were as follows:—The appellant is, and has been since October, 1896, the occupier of a publichouse known as the Adam and Eve, High-street, Peckham, in the parish of Camberwell. At the quinquennial valuation in 1895 the gross and rateable values of the publichouse were fixed at £485 and £405 respectively, which values were duly entered in the quinquennial valuation list made in that year. By a provisional list made in December, 1896, the assessment of the publichouse was increased by the overseers to £600 gross and £500 rateable value, and objection was made by the appellant to the increased assessment on the ground that the said publichouse had not in the course of the year in which the provisional list was made increased in value by the addition thereto or erection thereon of any building, nor had there been any increase of value from any cause within the meaning of section 47 of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869. At the hearing of the objection the assessment committee endeavoured to get from the appellant information as to the premium given by him for the lease of the publichouse. This information the appellant refused to give, and the assessment committee, after hearing the objection and viewing the publichouse, reduced the assessment to £575 gross and £485 rateable value. In the supplemental valuation list made in 1897 the appellant's publichouse was again valued and assessed at £575 gross and £485 rateable value. The appellant objected to the valuation, and, on appearing before the assessment committee, contended inter alia (1) that the publichouse had been improperly included in the provisional list and therefore ought not to be included in the supplemental list, and that it was therein too highly rated; (2) that no alteration in the value of the publichouse had taken place during the 12 months preceding the making of the supplemental list within the meaning of section 46, subsection 1, of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869; (3) that the overseers were not in law entitled to consider, or in any way to act on, any sum of money paid or supposed to have been paid for the publichouse either since the date of the valuation list in force at the time of the making of the provisional list or at all. The assessment committee, after hearing the objections, refused to give the appellant any relief, and he appealed to the London Quarter Sessions. At the hearing of the appeal counsel for the appellant objected to any questions being asked or any evidence being given about the premium paid by the appellant. The Court, however, overruled the objection and the fact was elicited by the respondents on cross-examination that the appellant had paid £16,400 as the consideration for his lease. No evidence was given as to the precise amount of the premium paid in 1895 or any time previously, but it was admitted by one of the appellant's witnesses that assuming the valuation appearing in the quinquennial list made in 1895 to have been calculated according to the method usually adopted in the parish of Camberwell the valuation must have been based on a supposed payment of a premium of about £6,400. The assessment committee, however, at the time of the revision of the quinquennial valuation list did not in fact know the precise amount of the premium which had been paid by the then occupier. Evidence was given by a valuer on behalf of the respondents that there had been since the date of the quinquennial valuation list a general appreciation of licensed premises throughout the metropolis, and that, in his opinion, the annual value of the said publichouse had between April and October, 1896, increased by about £100. It was, however, admitted that there had been no structural alteration to the publichouse. No evidence was given of any circumstances specially affecting the annual value of the publichouse. The respondents contended that they were not bound to give any such evidence, but that it was enough for them to show that the value had in fact increased. It was further admitted that no publichouses had been placed in the provisional or supplemental lists except such as had in fact been sold since the date of the quinquennial valuation thereof, although publichouses in the neighbourhood had generally increased in value. For the assessment committee it was contended that it was not necessary that there should be a structural alteration of the rated premises in order to warrant their insertion in a supplemental list; that the facts mentioned as to the premium given for the lease of the publichouse were evidence of an alteration in matters stated in the quinquennial valuation list during the 12 months preceding the making of the supplemental list under section 46 of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869; and that the payment of such premium showed that there had been such a material and unforeseen alteration of the value of the publichouse as to warrant its insertion in the supplemental list. For the appellant it was contended that the facts above mentioned were not in law any evidence of an alteration within the meaning of section 46, subsection 1, of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869, and that all evidence as to the amount of premium paid by the appellant for the publichouse in October, 1896, was irrelevant and inadmissible, and that the amount of such premium in the absence of any evidence, save as hereinbefore stated as to the premiums previously paid, would not afford any indication of an alteration in the value of the publichouse. The Court of quarter sessions gave judgment in the following terms:—"We find that although there had been no structural alteration in the appellant's premises between 1896 and April, 1897, there has been alteration in value in these premises by way of increase in that period. The appellant has failed to establish in our opinion that the alteration in gross and rateable values made by the assessment committee in the supplemental list is in excess of the actual increased value within the statutory period, and we confirm the alteration of the list made by the assessment committee with costs." The values in the supplemental list were, therefore, ordered to remain as assessed by the assessment committee. The questions for the opinion of the Court were:—(1) Whether the alteration in value which took place during the 12 months preceding the making of the supplemental valuation list was in law an alteration within the meaning of section 46, subsection 1, of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869; (2) whether the amount of premium paid by the appellant in October, 1896, for the said premises ought to have been received in evidence; (3) whether the amount of such premium was in law any evidence of an alteration within the meaning of that subsection. If the Court should answer all the foregoing questions in the affirmative the order of sessions was to be affirmed, and if the Court should answer all or any of the questions in the negative the order of sessions was to be quashed and the gross and rateable values of the publichouse were to be reduced to £485 and £405 respectively, or the premises were to be struck out of the valuation list, or the Court was to make such other or further order as to the Court should seem fit. The Divisional Court answered all the questions in the affirmative, and affirmed the order of quarter sessions.

Mr. Littler, Q.C., Mr. Page, Q.C., and Mr. William Russell appeared for the appellant; and Mr. Macmorran, Q.C., and Mr. Ryde for the respondents.

The COURT, having taken time to consider, delivered judgment, allowing the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS read the judgment of the Court as follows:—The 43rd section of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869, which, as the preamble states, was passed to secure uniformity in the assessment of rateable property in the metropolis, provides that the valuation list shall last for five years "subject to any alterations that may be made by any supplemental or provisional list as hereinafter mentioned." Now alteration is provided for in section 46 and section 47. The former provides for supplemental valuation, the latter for provisional valuation. Supplemental valuation takes place at the end of each year. The old list is then to be supplemented by making a new list of all the alterations which have taken place within the last 12 months. If there are no such alterations which make a supplemental list necessary in any of the matters in the valuation list (which, of course, includes gross and rateable value) the overseers are to send to the assessment committee a certificate to that effect. Provisional valuation deals with the alteration by increase or decrease in value of a particular hereditament "from any cause" during the 12 months. The provisional valuation takes effect immediately and remains in force till the making of the supplemental or other valuation list at the end of the year. The alterations in the supplemental list seem to be the confirmed provisional valuations. It seems to follow that whether one is dealing with the supplemental list or with the provisional list the question whether there has been such an alteration in the value of the premises as to justify an alteration in the valuation seems to be the same in either case. Now what are the conditions of such an alteration? It seems to us they are these:—(1) The alteration in value must be such that, if the fact relied on as constituting the alteration had been present at the time of the original valuation, it could properly have been taken into consideration in arriving at the assessment; (2) that the fact constituting the alteration in value should affect the hereditament in question in particular. We do not think that a general rise in values would be a fact constituting such an alteration. This, it seems to us, would be inconsistent with the expressed intention of the Act that the valuation list should remain in force for five years. Moreover, we do not think that the mere proof of a rise in value of a class of hereditaments including the one sought to be dealt with by the provisional or supplemental valuation would of itself justify a new valuation under sections 46 and 47, because such a rise in no way negatives a general rise in the values of hereditaments of all classes. After all, the rise in the value of licensed houses generally depends on a general cause, such as prosperous times, which give the mass of the people more money to spend in the luxuries of life, whether drink, or bread, or meat, or clothing, or sight-seeing, or houses, or anything else. The licensed victualler will obtain a better price if he sells his publichouse; the butcher or the baker will obtain a better price if he sells his business. Theatres and music-halls will be easy to sell. Houses and leases will command good prices to let and to sell. All this flows from one cause, the prosperity of the people. We do not think sections 46 and 47 apply in such a case to any class of hereditaments increased in value as a class by a cause affecting all classes, such as general prosperity. The fact, however, that the increase in value affects a class as a whole will not exclude the increase from the operation of these sections, provided it is shown that the increase of value arises from some cause affecting merely the class, and not from the cause of general prosperity affecting all classes of the community—e.g., if the taste for cycling makes factories which are conveniently situated for this manufacture command higher prices to sell or to let, this is a cause affecting a class—viz., premises suitable for cycle manufacturing which go up in value by reason of a new fashionable taste; but the cause is independent of the general prosperity of the community, and such an increase in value would justify an alteration under sections 46 and 47 during the currency of the quinquennial period of the assessment. The same would be true if war sent up the value of premises licensed for the purpose of carrying on the manufacture of gunpowder, the cause of increase of value being independent of general prosperity. But in each case it is for those who alter the assessment to prove the nature and cause of the alteration in value. It is easy to do this where the increase of value arises from some local cause affecting a class or some hereditaments in a class—for instance, when the building of a bridge sends up the value of the houses of a street thus made more accessible, or the removal of a cul-de-sac makes the houses in a street of shops more valuable from an increased traffic through the street, or the houses in a residential street less valuable from the increase of noise. Betterment or depreciation of such a character affecting all or some of the houses in a street is clearly within sections 46 and 47, and the cause of the increase in value is easy of proof. The proof is more difficult where the cause of the increase in value is not a local physical cause, but in our judgment the onus of proving that the cause of the alteration in the value of the hereditament in the preceding 12 months is a cause which does not affect all classes is clearly on those who seek to have a provisional or supplemental list made. These being the conditions for the application of sections 46 and 47, let us see how far the facts stated in the special case show that there has been within the 12 months an alteration in the value of this publichouse. Two sorts of alteration are alleged. First, a witness says in his opinion the value of the particular publichouse increased by £100 a year in the 12 months in question, and he attributes this to the rise in value of licensed houses throughout the metropolis. For the reasons which we have given we do not think that the onus on those who seek to say that there has been an alteration in value within the meaning of these sections is satisfied by proof of a rise in value which is consistent with a general rise resulting from general prosperity. Secondly, it is said that the fact that this publichouse has just been sold for £16,400 is evidence of an alteration in value within the 12 months. We think not. It may be that £16,400 was the very sum the vendor paid on going into possession in or prior to 1895. It is said not so, because in such a case the valuation in 1895 would have been higher than it in fact was. That, however, depends upon how much of that £16,400 the assessment committee apportioned to personal goodwill or other matters not affecting the letting value of the publichouse; see "Bradford-on-Avon Assessment Committee v. White" ([1898] 2 Q.B., 680). The questions at the end of the special case we answer as follows:—The answer to question 1 is No; there is nothing in the facts stated in the case nor in the evidence stated to have been adduced sufficient to justify the conclusion that the alteration which took place during the 12 months preceding the making of the supplemental list was in law an alteration within the meaning of section 46. It is quite consistent with such facts and evidence that the alteration in value resulted from general prosperity. The answer to question 2 is Yes, and to question 3 No; for although evidence of the amount of the premium is admissible, the amount of the premium was not in law any evidence of an alteration within section 46, unless some evidence was given of the premium previously paid beyond that which appears by the case to have been given.

WILLIAMS V. POULSON.*

—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, Sched. 1, clause 1 (b)—Intermittent employment—Basis for calculating compensation.

This was an appeal from an award of the Judge of the Liverpool County Court in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. The applicant was a casual labourer, and at the time of the accidental injury for which he claimed compensation was in the employment of the respondent, who was a stevedore. The County Court Judge made an award in favour of the applicant for a weekly payment of 7s. 6d. during his incapacity for work. The applicant appealed.

Mr. RUEGG, Q.C., and Mr. SEGAR appeared for the applicant, and said the only question in the appeal was as to the proper basis for calculating the compensation to which the applicant was entitled under schedule 1, clause 1 (b), of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. The applicant was a casual dock labourer, and was not in any permanent employment, but worked sometimes for one stevedore and sometimes for another. At the time of the accident he had been working for the respondent for three days and a half. During the previous year he had been engaged to work for a great number of stevedores at different times, and he had worked many times for the respondent. From March 5, 1898, to January 25, 1899, when the accident happened, he had worked for the respondent in each week except four, though sometimes he only worked for one day in the week. There was, however, no continuous employment, the applicant being taken on when wanted. The County Court Judge had taken together all the periods during which the applicant had worked for the respondent, and found that the applicant's total wages during those periods amounted to £38 13s. 6d. He divided that sum by the number of weeks, and calculated the applicant's average weekly earnings to be about 15s., and made an award for a weekly payment of half that sum. That, however, was not the proper method of assessing the compensation in this case under the schedule to the Act. By Clause 1 (b) of the schedule the Court had to consider the average weekly earnings for the period during which the workman had been continuously employed under the same employer—“Jones v. Ocean Coal Company” ([1899] 2 Q.B., 124); “Price v. Marsden and Sons” ([1899] 1 Q.B., 493). The applicant had been employed at the time of the accident for three days and a half, and during that time his earnings were 5s. a day, which gave an average weekly earnings of 30s. The County Court Judge ought to have made an award for a weekly payment of half that sum—viz., 15s. They also referred to “Small v. McCormick” (36 Sc., L.R., 700).

Mr. CARVER, Q.C., and Mr. HORRIDGE (Mr. D. H. Crompton with them), for the respondent, contended, first, that the applicant was not entitled to recover any compensation at all, because the Act did not apply. The Act only applied where there was continuous employment under the same employer for at least two weeks before the accident. There was no mode provided by the Act of assessing compensation where the employment was for a shorter period. [LORD JUSTICE COLLINS.—You have no cross-appeal. You cannot, therefore, take that point now.] It could be taken for the purpose of defeating the appeal, not for the purpose of reducing the amount awarded. Secondly, if the Act did apply, the County Court Judge was right in awarding 7s. 6d. a week. He must be taken to have found continuous employment with the respondent during the whole period from March 5, 1898, to January 25, 1899.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that the sole question before them was, What was the amount of compensation payable to the applicant? Between March 5, 1898, and January 25, 1899, the applicant had been working for the respondent during a portion of each week, except on four occasions when he did not work for the respondent for some reason not appearing. There was no pretence for saying that there had been any break in the continuity of the employment. It had been decided in this Court in “Price v. Marsden and Sons,” and in Scotland in “Small v. McCormick,” that the workman must be in the employment of the same employer during the period in question, and other employments could not be taken into consideration in calculating the compensation. Now it seemed to him that the County Court Judge had found in this case that the employment by the respondent continued without any break. In “Keast v. Barrow Hematite Company” (15 The Times L.R., 141) this Court held that if a man went away on a holiday, that was not a break in his employment. The County Court Judge seemed to have found that the applicant had been in the employment of the respondent during the period mentioned. The Judge then found that during that period the applicant had earned £38 13s. 6d., and he divided that sum by the number of weeks during which the employment lasted, and he took one-half of the sum so found. That seemed to him to be right. It was not necessary to decide the very important point whether the Act applied at all where the employment continued for less than two weeks. It was enough to say that in this case the applicant had been awarded as much as he was entitled to.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS concurred. The appeal must fail unless the applicant could show that the County Court Judge gave him less than he was entitled to. The Judge treated him as in the employment of the same employer during a number of weeks short of a year, and on that basis he had assessed the compensation. Clause 1 (b) of schedule 1 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, provided that in such a case the workman was to receive a weekly payment amounting to 50 per cent. of his average weekly earnings during the period in which he had been in the employment of the same employer. Mr. Ruegg's contention came to this, that where the workman had been employed only for a period less than a week by the employer the amount of compensation should be calculated as if he had been employed by the same employer for at least two weeks at the same rate of daily wages that he was earning at the time of the accident; and he got that out of the words in clause 1 (b) of schedule 1. It was not for them to say whether in point of fact there was during the period over which the County Court Judge had calculated the weekly wages such a continuous employment by the same employer as would justify the award. That was a question of fact, and he (the Lord Justice) rather thought that the County Court Judge had found that there was a continuous employment by the same employer, though there might have been temporary gaps in the employment. But whether the Judge had so found as a fact or not, there was no appeal brought by the respondent, and therefore the question whether the employment was for less than two weeks and whether in such a case the Act applied at all was not open. The Court had, he assumed, to support the decision of the County Court Judge by all necessary conclusions of fact.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS concurred.

AND OTHERS.*

Settlement—Marriage—Rents and royalties—Mines Right of tenant for life to income of.
Decision of the Court of Session reversed.

This was an appeal against the opinion and judgment of the First Division of the Court of Session (the Lord President, Lord Adam, Lord McLaren, and Lord Kinnear), dated January 25, 1898, and given on a special case which raised the question whether certain rents and royalties payable under a lease and received by the marriage settlement trustees of Mr. and Mrs. Greville-Nugent, in respect of stone quarries on the estate of Cove, were to be treated as capital or income. The facts were thus stated by Lord Adam in the course of his judgment:—The questions in this case arise upon the construction of a deed of settlement on the marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Greville-Nugent, dated June 3, 1882, and which we should call an ante-nuptial marriage-contract. At that date Mrs. Greville-Nugent, then Miss Ogilvie, was proprietrix of the estate of Cove, in Dumfriesshire, and by the contract she bound herself to convey that estate to the trustees therein named, upon trust, at the request of her husband and herself during their joint lives, or of the survivor of them, and after the death of both, at the discretion of the trustees, to sell the same, and all necessary powers of sale were given them for that purpose. Power was also given to them in the meantime to lease the unsold parts of the lands, and they were directed to hold the proceeds of the sale and the net rents and profits of the Cove estate until sale upon the trusts therein declared. These were that they should hold certain investments, including the net moneys to arise from the sale of the estate, but not including the rents and profits of the estate until sold, in trust to pay the annual income thereof to Mrs. Greville-Nugent for her sole and separate use, and after her death to her husband under certain conditions which need not be mentioned, and after their death for the children of the intended marriage. As regards the rents and profits of the estate until sold, or of so much thereof as should not have been sold, the trustees were directed to pay and apply them to the person or persons for the purposes and in the manner in which the annual income of the residue or net money to arise from such sales would be payable or applicable if the sale and investment thereof were then actually made. Mrs. Greville-Nugent is the person who would at present be entitled to the annual income of the moneys arising from the sale of the estate. These being the provisions of the trust-settlement, the facts which raise the present questions are that, the estate not having yet been sold, the trustees on June 11, 1895, let certain quarries in the estate to tenants who pay therefor a fixed yearly rent of £100 and a royalty of one-twelfth of all stone quarried. These yielded in the year ending July, 1896, a rent or profit of £225 19s. There is only one child of the marriage, Miss Greville-Nugent, who is the party of the second part, and the question is whether Mrs. Greville-Nugent is entitled to receive the rent and royalties received in respect of the quarries so let, or whether the rent and royalties are to be regarded as capital, of which she is only entitled to the income.

The Court of Session adopted the view that the rent and royalties were capital, of which the life renter was only to receive the interest. Lord Adam relied on words of Lord Cairns in "Gowans v. Christie" (11 Macph., H.L., 1), who, speaking of mineral leases, said:—"There is no fruit, that is to say there is no increase, there is no sowing and reaping on the ordinary terms, and there are no periodical harvests. What we call a mineral lease is really, when properly considered, a sale out and out of a portion of land. It is liberty given to a particular individual for a specific length of time to go into and under the land, and to get certain things there, if he can find them, and to take them away just as if he had bought so much of the soil."

The Lord Advocate (Mr. Graham Murray, O.C.), Mr. Elgood, of the English, and Mr. A. S. D. Thomson, of the Scottish Bar, appeared for the appellants; Mr. Guthrie, Q.C., and Mr. Taylor Cameron, both of the Scottish Bar, for the respondent Miss Nugent, and Mr. Methold for the respondents the trustees.

The LORD CHANCELLOR, in moving that the interlocutor appealed from should be reversed, said that the learned Lord President appeared to have been misled by the forms of English conveyancing. It was familiar machinery in English conveyancing to create a trust for sale and subsequent trusts for the application of the income of the property sold, with provisions for the payment of income until sale. The learned Judge had, from the form of settlement adopted, erroneously assumed that the main purpose of the settlement was a sale, and that the other provisions were intended to be only temporary. Counsel for the respondents had not dealt with that aspect of the question at all. Their Lordships had, therefore, only to look and see what was the intention of the parties apart from any consideration of the power of sale. In that view the question was governed by authority. There was included in the settlement a mineral estate as well as another estate, and the point was, what was conveyed by the words. He was not prepared to defend the logic of some of the earlier decisions. The case of coals and minerals was absolutely different from that of the products of the soil, and strictly speaking the term "rent" was inapplicable to coal and other minerals, though in fact we habitually spoke of the rent and royalties of coal and other mines. The coal or other mineral was really a part of the soil itself and not a return from the soil. But it was useless to argue on the matter, though if it were res integra there might be much to say in favour of the view taken by the Court of Session, inasmuch as a long course of decisions had established that open mines were part of that which might be given to the tenant for life, and that he was entitled to take the mineral therefrom as though it were the recurrent produce of the soil. The respondents had sought to limit the application of the rule to mines opened by the settlor or testator. The suggestion was an absolute novelty, because in all the cases the question had been simply "what is the thing bequeathed or settled?" No case had been cited in support of any such distinction.

LORD MACNAGHTEN was of the same opinion, and said that the Lord Advocate was perfectly justified in saying that the Lord President had been misled by the terms of conveyancing used, which were really only in common form. The tenant for life was entitled to the income of the settled property, part of which was open mines. The words clearly included the income derived from these mines.

LORD MANSFIELD concurred.

LORD BRANSTON, in expressing himself to be of the same mind as the other noble and learned Lords, said these quarries had been worked for more than a century, but for some years they were not worked. In that case they might be termed "discontinued," but for the purpose of this settlement they must be regarded as open mines.

LORD BRANSTON concurred.

Court of Appeal (Lindley, M.R., Sir J. F. Johns, and Bowen, L.J.) } 1899, Nov. 20.

LITTLEDALE V. LIVERPOOL COLLEGE.*

Limitations, Statute of.—Land.—Possessory title
—Animus possideandi.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs from a judgment of Mr. Justice Fry dismissing the action. The action was one of trespass and was brought for the purpose of establishing the title of the plaintiffs to a small strip of land near Toxteth-park, Liverpool. The land in dispute was a narrow strip open at both ends, situate between two fields belonging to a Dr. Solomon, the defendants' predecessor in title, and having hedges the whole length of the strip. The strip led from a public road called Penny-lane to a piece of land belonging to a person named Minelair and adjoining the two fields above referred to, but separated by them from Penny-lane. In 1848 this piece of land, which was then pasture, was conveyed to the plaintiffs or their predecessor, and it is hereinafter referred to as the plaintiffs' field. The strip of land was grass and was the means of access to the plaintiffs' field from Penny-lane. Formerly there did not appear to be any other access to the plaintiffs' field except along this strip; but before 1848 other roads leading to the field from other places were laid out and the strip in question became comparatively unimportant as a road to the field. It was admitted that the conveyance of 1848 did not include this strip of land, and that so far as the title thereto was shown by the documents it belonged to the defendants and not to the plaintiffs. On the other hand, it was conceded that the plaintiffs were entitled to a right of way along the strip of land. The plaintiffs, however, claimed to make a title to the land in dispute under the Statute of Limitations. They relied upon several acts of user referred to by the Master of the Rolls in his judgment and particularly upon the fact that they had erected two gates, one at each end of the strip of land, and had subsequently kept the gates locked. The appeal was heard on November 13.

Mr. Hughes, Q.C., and Mr. Briscoe were for the plaintiffs; Mr. McCall, Q.C., and Mr. Cochran were for the defendants.

The Court dismissed the appeal.

The Master of the Rolls (after stating the facts as above) said: In order to acquire by the Statute of Limitations a title to land which has a known owner, that owner must have lost his right to the land by being dispossessed of it or by having discontinued his possession of it. See 3 and 4 William IV., c. 27, s. 3. I will consider discontinuance by the defendants first. About 13 or 14 years ago, when one Lewis was Solomon's tenant, Solomon told him to pull down part of the fence between the strip and his own field, asserting, as the truth was, that the strip was his. Lewis made openings in the fence accordingly. This was long after the gates were put up. The incident disproves discontinuance of possession by Solomon at the time in question. It is true that the defendants have done nothing on the strip since this time, but they had no occasion to do so. I cannot infer from the evidence any discontinuance of possession by the defendants or their predecessors either before or after this act of ownership. If the defendants have lost their right to the strip it must be not by reason of any withdrawal or discontinuance of possession on their part, but by reason of their being dispossessed by the plaintiffs or their predecessors. I turn then to what the plaintiffs have done. Many years ago the plaintiffs or their predecessors put up two gates, one at each end of the strip of land in question, and they put locks on these gates, and they were kept locked until recently, when disputes arose. The plaintiffs or their tenants have kept the keys. If the plaintiffs had been strangers, having no right to or over the strip in question, the natural inference would be that they put up these gates in order to exclude every one, and that every one was in fact excluded. But the erection of the gates and the fact that they were locked is in this case open to a very different explanation. Let us take the gates separately. The plaintiffs had a right to put up a gate in their own field, and if they put it up there and not actually in the strip of land, they in no way dispossessed the defendants of any land of theirs nor interfered with any right of theirs, for the defendants had no right to go from the strip of land on to the plaintiffs' field. The evidence does not show where exactly this gate was. If it was in the strip of land its erection was a trespass and so far an invasion of the defendants' rights, but far short of an eviction from the strip. The gate at the Penny-lane end of the strip may well have been put up to protect the strip and the plaintiffs' right of way over it from invasion by the public, and not to dispossess the defendants. There is evidence to show that rubbish was thrown on the strip at the Penny-lane end; but there is no evidence to show that the gate was put up with the intention of dispossessing Solomon, the defendants' predecessor in title. The gate was in fact a protection to his property as well as to the plaintiffs' rights. Nor is it, I think, true to say that whatever the plaintiffs' intentions may have been the defendants or Solomon were in fact dispossessed of the land by the erection of these two gates. They could not be dispossessed unless the plaintiffs obtained possession themselves; and possession by the plaintiffs involves an animus possideandi—i.e., occupation with the intention of excluding the owner as well as other people. The evidence that the plaintiffs never had any such intention is extremely strong. The correspondence shows that until quite recently they only claimed a right of way. Even when they commenced this action they claimed a right of way and no more. It was only at a later stage that they claimed the ownership of the strip. When possession or dispossession has to be inferred from equivocal acts the intention with which they are done is all-important. See "Leigh v. Jack" (5 Ex. D., 264). I am myself convinced that the gates were put up, not to exclude the defendants, but to protect the plaintiffs' right of way and to prevent the public from going along the strip of land now claimed by the plaintiffs. The other acts of ownership relied upon by the plaintiffs are far less important. The fact that horses or cattle lawfully on the strip grazed more or less in it does not in my opinion assist the plaintiffs. It is too insignificant. So is the leave given to put up a telegraph pole on the edge of the strip some three or four years ago. So is clipping the fences on the strip sides.

* Reported by H. R. MUMFORD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The fact that one of the plaintiffs' tenants—viz., Peacop—let the pasturage of the strip to Carruthers some 15 years ago, and afterwards to Boote, who was a tenant of the defendants, is more important. This, however, was an arrangement between two tenants. The reason for it as regards Carruthers is not explained. As regards Boote, he tells us he paid Peacop 5s. a year for three or four years for convenience and grazing. He wanted to go along the strip to some buildings on his land and his cattle got through the fence where Lewis had cut it down, and Peacop complained of this. There is no evidence to show that the plaintiffs knew anything about either of these arrangements. There is no evidence to show that the plaintiffs or their predecessors ever themselves let the strip of land or dealt with it as their own otherwise than by shutting it in by the two gates already mentioned and by giving leave to put up a telegraph pole. I have looked at all the decisions I can find which throw any light on this subject. "Leigh v. Jack" is the nearest and most instructive. "Rains v. Burton" (14 Ch. D., 537) (the underground cellar case) presented no difficulty except on the point of concealed fraud. The owner of the cellar was there plainly dispossessed by the plaintiff, who took and kept possession of the cellar intending to acquire it for himself. In "Seddon v. Smith" (36 L.T., 168), and "Norton v. L. and N.W. Ry. Co." (13 Ch. D., 268) the acts of ownership were unequivocal—there was ploughing up and cultivation of a strip of land. Combining all the evidence adduced by the plaintiffs, I think Mr. Justice Bigham was quite right in holding that the plaintiffs had failed to prove the acquisition of a title to the strip of land in dispute. The evidence is not enough to prove that the defendants or their predecessors have been dispossessed for the statutory period of the strip which unquestionably was theirs. The appeal fails, and ought to be dismissed with costs.

The PRESIDENT of the PROBATE DIVISION arrived at the same conclusion, but with great hesitation. The facts of possession appeared to him to be extremely strong, and where all the acts of user relied on were on one side and none or practically none on the other he was very much inclined to say that there was proof of dispossession. But on the whole he was not prepared to differ from the learned Judge below, since the plaintiffs' right of way was undoubted, and it was difficult to distinguish acts done for the protection of that right and acts constituting possession.

LORD JUSTICE ROMER concurred.

CROSHAW V. FRITCHARD AND RENWICK.*

Contract—Offer and acceptance—Estimate—Construction—Custom of trade.

An offer is no less binding because in the form of an estimate, and headed "Estimate."

This was an action to recover damages for breach of contract. The plaintiff was the owner of certain freehold premises in Bermondsey, and the defendants were builders. In August of the present year the plaintiff was desirous of having certain building work done on his premises, and on August 22 the following letter was written by the plaintiff's architects to the defendants:—

"Our client, Mr. Croshaw, of No. 116, Fenchurch-street, the freeholder of premises in the occupation of Messrs. Roberts, Adlard, and Co., as above, is about to make additions to the property, and we should be glad to know whether you would be willing to give us a tender in competition for the work. No quantities will be supplied, and our client does not bind himself to accept the lowest or any tender."

Subsequently the specification was sent to the defendants, and on September 14 the defendants wrote to the plaintiff the following letter, which was headed "Estimate":—"Our estimate to carry out the sundry alterations to the above premises according to the drawings and specification amounts to the sum of £1,230." On the next day the plaintiff wrote that he accepted the defendants' offer to execute for the sum of £1,230 the work in question. At a later date the defendants wrote that they had made an error in their figures, and that under the circumstances they must withdraw their estimate. The plaintiff had the work done by another builder at a price higher than that given by the defendants, and he now brought this action to recover the difference in price as damages for breach of contract. The question was whether there was a complete contract binding on the defendants. Their contention was that their letter of September 14 was not a binding tender; that the word "estimate" was advisedly used by them in order to avoid a final and binding agreement, which would have resulted from the use of words such as "we offer to execute the work." Evidence was given by several builders to show that this distinction is always observed in the trade.

Mr. Herbert Reed, Q.C., and Mr. T. E. Scrutton appeared for plaintiff; Mr. English Harrison, Q.C., and Mr. Acland for the defendants.

The cases of "Lewis v. Braas" (3 Q.B.D., 667) and "Harvey v. Facey" ([1893] A.C., 552) were referred to.

MR. JUSTICE BIGHAM said that the plaintiff's letter of August 22 was an invitation to the defendants to send in a tender in competition for the work. That meant that they were to state the price at which they would do the work, and the specification was sent in order that they might have the necessary materials upon which to tender. Then, on September 14, the defendants sent the letter headed "Estimate," and the question was whether that letter was an offer to do the work at the price mentioned. His Lordship was clearly of opinion that it was. It had been suggested that there was some custom or well-known understanding that a letter in this form was not to be treated as an offer. There was no such custom, and if there was it was contrary to the law. Both the plaintiff and the defendants, in his Lordship's opinion, intended these letters to constitute a complete contract. It was said that there was no complete contract, because in the specification there was a blank left as to the time within which the work was to be completed. In the ordinary course a subsequent agreement would be come to as to the time, but if there was no subsequent agreement then the work would have to be done in a reasonable time, but the absence of any such subsequent agreement would not have the effect of setting aside the already existing contract. The question for decision did not in fact depend upon any supposed custom of the trade, but on the language of the letters which had passed between the two parties. The defendants had made a mistake, and they must abide by the consequences of it. There would be judgment for the plaintiff for £250, with costs.

IN RE TURNBULL—TURNBULL V. NICHOLAS.*
Married Woman—Writ of attachment—Non-compliance with order of Court—Jurisdiction.

*Reported by F. O. ROBINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

*Reported by G. A. STREETEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The Court has jurisdiction to issue a writ of attachment against a married woman who, as the legal personal representative of a deceased intestate, fails to comply with an order for payment into Court of a sum of money forming part of the personal estate of the intestate.

This case raised an important question as to the liability of a married woman to have a writ of attachment issued against her in respect of her non-compliance with an order made upon her to pay money into Court. The question arose under the following circumstances. The defendant, Agnes Nicholas, a married woman, was the legal personal representative of Catherine Turnbull, a deceased intestate, and was by two orders, dated respectively May 8, 1899, and July 10, 1899, ordered to deliver an account of the personal estate of the intestate coming to her hands. In pursuance of such orders she on July 22, 1899, made an affidavit exhibiting an account, whereby it appeared that the sum of £277 18s. 7d., forming part of the personal estate of the intestate, was in her hands. By an order dated August 10, 1899, she was ordered to pay the amount into Court within four days after service. The defendant failed to comply with this order and a motion was made for leave to issue a writ of attachment against her. Upon that motion coming on before the Court, counsel for the defendant raised the objection that the defendant being a married woman was not liable to attachment. It was also suggested that the order of August 10, 1899, was wrong in form and ought to have been made in the form settled by the Court of Appeal in the case of "Mott v. Morley" (20 Q.B.D., 120). It was agreed that this point should be disposed of on the hearing of the motion as if the defendant had given a notice of motion to discharge or vary the order of August 10, 1899.

Mr. H. Henderson appeared for the plaintiff in support of the motion and Mr. H. L. Fraser for the defendant.

Mr. Justice Mellish, in giving judgment, after stating the facts, said that by order 42, rules 4 and 24 of the Rules of the Supreme Court, 1883, an order for payment of money into Court might be enforced by writ of attachment or, in cases in which attachment was authorized by law, by attachment. As was pointed out by Mr. Justice Chitty in the case of "In re Green" ([1895] 2 Ch., 217), attachment there meant attachment of the person. By virtue of the third exception contained in sec. 4 of the Debtors Act, 1869, such attachment was authorized by law in the case of default by a trustee or person acting in a fiduciary capacity, and ordered to pay by a Court of Equity any sum in his possession or under his control. If the defendant were not a married woman there would clearly be jurisdiction to order the issue of the writ. What was decided in "Scott v. Morley" (20 Q.B.D., 120) was that there was no power under sec. 8 of the Debtors Act to commit to prison a married woman for her default in paying a sum for which judgment had been recovered against her in a Court of law, and which under sec. 1, subsec. 2, of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, was payable out of her separate property and not otherwise. His Lordship then referred to the form of judgment as settled by the Court of Appeal in that case as given at p. 132 of the report, and, continuing, said that the decision plainly did not govern the present case; but it was necessary to consider the reasons on which it was based, and to ascertain how far they applied. Put shortly, the ratio decidendi appeared to be this: Sec. 1, subsec. 2 of the Act conferred on a married woman the capacity of entering into and rendering herself liable on any contract in respect of and to the extent of her separate estate, and of suing and being sued either in contract or tort as if she were a feme sole, but the damages and costs recovered against her in any action or proceeding against her were to be payable out of her separate estate and not otherwise; and this enactment (in the words of Lord Justice Bowen) created only a proprietary and not a personal liability. On the other hand, sec. 5 of the Debtors Act, 1869, only authorized a committal where there was a "debt due from" the defendant; and a debt payable out of the separate property of a married woman was not a debt due from her. The order in the present case was not an order for payment of a sum to a person, but for payment of a sum into Court. The distinction between the two was pointed out and explained in "In re Green." The present order did not create a debt, and the provisions of sec. 5 of the Debtors Act, 1869, had no application. The material sections of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, were sec. 1 subsec. 2 (which was dealt with in "Scott v. Morley", secs. 18 and 24. These enactments introduced very considerable changes in the law. They enabled a married woman to accept the office of a trustee, executrix, or administratrix without the consent of her husband, which she could not previously do; they made her separate estate liable for her breaches of trust and devastavit which it previously was not (see "Wainford v. Heyl," 20 Eq., 321), and they relieved her husband from liability and from being sued in respect of her acts. If the object of the order of August 10, 1899, was to compel the defendant to make good a loss occasioned by some act of hers amounting to a devastavit or breach of trust, his Lordship would be of the opinion that much of the reasoning in "Scott v. Morley" as to the nature of the liability applied to the case before him, and that the order was wrong in form and ought to be discharged, or varied so as to make it accord with the form settled by the Court in "Scott v. Morley." He thought, however, that such was not the object of the order. So far as appeared from the evidence on which the order was made no breach of trust or devastavit had been committed, nor any liability by reason thereof incurred by the defendant. What did appear was that the defendant had in her hands a sum of money forming part of the intestate's estate. That sum of money ought not to have been mixed up with the defendant's separate estate, but ought, if the defendant had performed her duty, to be standing to a separate account in her name as administratrix with some bank; and the object of the order was to get that sum, for greater security, transferred from the bank into Court. It seemed to his Lordship that an order for payment of the sum by the defendant out of her separate estate would not be appropriate to such a state of facts, and that the order was properly made in the present form. That being so the case fell within the third exception in sec. 4 of the Debtors Act, 1869; and an order for attachment might be made if there was jurisdiction to make such an order previously to the passing of that Act. Upon that, authority was very scanty; for previously to the passing of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, the husband was liable, and orders would be naturally sought for and made against him, and not against the wife. The cases of "Bell v. Hyde" (Proc. in Ch., 328) and "Otway v. Wing" (12 Sim., 90) appeared to show that attachment might in a proper case issue against a married woman, and his Lordship was of opinion that, so far as at present appeared, this would be a proper case. His Lordship must, however, take into consideration the provisions of the Debtors Act, 1878. Upon the motion for the attachment an affidavit had been made by the defendant's present solicitor to the effect that she had applied the sum appearing by the account to be in her hands, or part of it, in payment of the intestate's debts. The affidavit was, however, insufficient to enable his Lordship to exercise the powers conferred by the Debtors Act, 1878, or to ascertain how the money which came to her hands had been disposed of. It seemed to him that the order for the issue of the writ ought to go, but that the writ ought to lie in the office for a fortnight or three weeks to enable the defendant to make a proper affidavit showing what had become of the money traced to her hands.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL V. SIMPSON.*

River—Public navigable river—Liability to maintain and repair locks.

The facts of this case are sufficiently set out in the judgment.

Mr. Upjohn, Q.C., Mr. N. Tebbutt, and Mr. Brooke Little appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Neville, Q.C., and Mr. R. J. Parker for the defendant.

MR. JUSTICE FARWELL, in delivering judgment, said:—The Attorney-General (on the relation of the County Council of Huntingdon) and the County Council of Huntingdon seek to establish against the defendant a public right of navigation over the river Ouse from St. Neots to St. Ives, coupled with a liability on the defendant to maintain and work certain locks and a stanch. The distance between St. Neots and St. Ives is about 16 miles, and there is a fall in that distance of about 28ft. The plaintiffs assert that the river is and has been time out of mind a public navigable river, and on this basis they also assert that the defendant is liable by reason of certain patent grants and an Act of Parliament to maintain the six locks—namely, St. Neots, Offord, Brampton, Godmanchester, Houghton, and Hemingford—which all stand on practically the same footing, and a stanch at St. Ives to which different considerations apply. The first issue that I have to determine is whether the river is and has been from the earliest times, or at any rate anterior to the grant of the patent rights, a public navigable river. The question whether a non-tidal river is navigable or not depends not on the question of possibility of navigation, but on the proof of the fact of navigation. If the fact be proved, then the channel of the river is the King's highway and as such is open to the free passage of all the King's subjects. See "Williams v. Wilcock" (8 A. and E., 329); "Mayor of Nottingham v. Lambert" (Willes Rep., 111 and 114); and Hale, "De Jure Maris," 374. A quantity of evidence has been adduced on this issue, and it is impossible for me to dissect and comment on it in detail. I can only deal with it generally. The earliest document put in was the Domesday Book, and there can be no doubt that there were mills upon the river in the time of Domesday, and that such mills were water mills, because as a matter of history windmills were not introduced into England before the 12th century. It is also plain that all such mills must have had dams in order to be worked. There is, however, nothing to show where such mills were situate, and I therefore get very little assistance from this document. The plaintiffs rely on the statements contained in certain inquisitions appearing on the Hundred Rolls made in the time of Edward I. These inquisitions were held with the object of ascertaining whether any wrong had been done to the King or to his subjects during his absence in the Holy Land. They were made by special commissioners appointed for the purpose upon the oath of a jury of every hundred and town affected by the inquisition—that is to say, by men who may be deemed to have had a special local knowledge. It is obvious that the inquisitions quo warranto do not amount to any decision; but they are admissible as reputation in a question of public right such as the present, and are entitled to consideration from the local knowledge of the deponents. The short effect of the presentments is that the jurors assert that ships and boats were wont to come up the river and that their passage had been obstructed by the mills, stanches, and weirs of Reginald de Grey and the Abbot of Ramsey and the Prior of Huntingdon. But there the matter ends; no judgment appears to have been taken in any of these cases, and although I think it plain that there was public navigation between mill-dam and mill-dam, so far as a free passage throughout from St. Neots to St. Ives is concerned, the conclusion is, to my mind, against the plaintiffs. It is plain that the question was raised and the claim was made, but that the obstructions nevertheless remained and were not in fact removed. This conclusion is fortified by a deed in 1467 between the Abbot of Ramsey of the one part and the townships of Godmanchester and Huntingdon of the other part, and sealed with the seal of the Duchy of Lancaster. This deed gives a graphic picture of this part of the river in the 15th century. There was a dam, and ships were drawn over at a place which had been long used for that purpose and which was known as the "drawing place." There was no general right to the public, and the grant of this limited right is wholly inconsistent with the evidence of a general public right. Further, in the reign of Henry VII. it appears, from a decree made by the County Palatine Court at the suit of the Abbot of Ramsey, that the inhabitants of Godmanchester had broken the flood-gates of the mills at Houghton and afterwards submitted to restore them and make their peace with the Abbot; and further orders were made in the same Court in the seventh year of Henry VIII. If these flood-gates had been obstructions in a public navigable river, the inhabitants would have been justified in abating them. In the sixth year of James I. an inquisition was taken at Huntingdon which contains various allegations which point to the existence of an ancient right of passage; but little reliance can be placed upon this, for not only was no action taken to give effect to such representation, but the patent grants were shortly afterwards granted in order to make the river navigable. The result is I find as a fact that down to the year 1618, which has been treated by counsel as the first period for consideration, the river Ouse was not navigable in its entirety from St. Ives to St. Neots, but was navigable in sections. Having regard to the fall of the river, I think it would have been impossible to navigate between St. Neots and St. Ives if there had been no dams at all; the effect of damming back the water by the various locks was to make a succession of reaches navigable, with the right, in some places, at any rate, if not in all, of "drawing over" in order to continue the transit. This conclusion is adverse to the plaintiffs, because the public way ceases in each instance at the spot at which they claim their right. But the view that I have expressed appears to me to be consistent with all the documents and to be in accordance with what one would expect in days when each town had its own separate government, and public rights in the modern sense were little understood; and in this connexion I would refer to Hale, "De Jure Maris," 374, who in speaking of public rivers describes them as common highways for men or goods or both "from one inland town to another." I have now to consider the effect of three grants by letters patent, dated respectively 1618, 1628, and 1638, having regard to the fact that I have already found that down to 1618 the river Ouse was not a public navigable river throughout, but only by sections—i.e., from mill-dam to mill-dam. The patent of 1618 purports to grant a monopoly to one Gason as the inventor of improvements in locks and the like for 21 years from its date. No sum is mentioned as the remuneration to be collected by the patentee, and he is left to make his own bargain in each case after he has erected his locks, which the letters patent assume will be erected on land to be acquired by him for that purpose. In my opinion this patent operated solely as an inventor's patent, and created no toll of any sort or description. It appears from the Privy Council's registers of December 5, 1625, that, under this patent, sluices had been erected from St. Ives to St. Neots by Arnold Spencer and John Jackson, and that unreasonable tolls were complained of as being taken in respect of them by John Gason and his assignees of his said patent. Various inquiries and proceedings ensued, and the important point relied upon by the plaintiffs is that the sluices appear to have been made and the river therefore to have become navigable throughout before 1625. By the patent of 1638 it is stated that Arnold Spencer informed the King that, by his "directions, inventions, pains, and exceeding great charge, the river of Ouse had been made navigable from St. Ives to St. Neots, to the great benefit of the inhabitants residing thereabouts," and that he proposed to do similar works in other rivers in the kingdom. The King granted him the right to make all manner of locks, sluices, bridges, cuts, dams, and other inventions for making rivers and streams navigable and passable, and, the same being so made navigable, to pass and row upon them with boats and other vessels. Then follows a prohibition restraining all persons from interfering with Spencer in the exercise of his rights, and a grant to Arnold Spencer of full power to take all profits, &c., accruing from any vessel passing, anchoring, or sailing in or over any of the rivers, cuts, passages, streams, or sluices to be so cut, made navigable, or perfected. These profits were limited to 3d. a ton per lock. The patents contemplate the purchase by Spencer of land for the purpose of making locks, and proceeds to state that the King is informed that Spencer had already made navigable the Ouse from St. Neots to St. Ives. The King grants to Spencer all the benefit to be received in respect of the river so made navigable; the term for which the said profits were granted was 11 years from the date and 80 years further. The second patent was granted, it will be observed, during the continuance of the first, and it is not easy to understand how this came about, but the inference I draw is that the second patent is in aid of the first. The second patent differs from the first inasmuch as it creates a toll. It first creates, in my opinion, a monopoly analogous to a modern patent for invention for 11 years, and then proceeds to grant a toll for the term of 11 years and 80 years further. In effect, the inventor is repaid by the creation by the Crown of a toll, and that this is the true construction of the patent is, I think, borne out by the consideration that the Statute of Monopolies (21 James I., c. 3) had been passed only five years before, under which the Crown could not grant a monopoly for a new invention for more than 14 years. The question that has been argued on this patent is whether a toll has been thereby created, and, if so, whether it is toll thorough or toll traverse. Toll thorough is toll for passing over the King's highway and cannot be lawfully granted without consideration to the public. The power of the Crown to grant such a toll is limited ("Attorney-General v.

Parmeter," 10 Price, 378). The Crown cannot grant a toll passing over a public highway without consideration, or so as to extend or be taken beyond the place where such consideration arises ("Brecon Market Case," 7 C.P., 566). Such consideration need not be expressed, but has often been implied; for example, the grant of a ferry implies the liability to maintain the ferry. The implication is necessary to support the validity of the grant. See "Huzzey v. Field" (2 Cr. M. and R., 432). A toll traverse, on the other hand, is toll taken for passing over the land of the grantee of the toll; the use of such land is sufficient consideration and no other consideration need be implied. I use the term "toll traverse" with regard to a toll the title to which is severed from the ownership of the land over which the road in respect of which it is charged passes. A landowner can, of course, make what bargain he pleases with persons who desire to cross his land; but he cannot create and reserve to himself a legal toll on land which he dedicates to the public. I think the statement in "Hale," p. 376, is correct—that "no man can take a settled or constant toll even on his own private land for a common passage without the King's licence." It is essential to toll traverse that the reservation of the toll should be contemporaneous with the dedication to the public. It appears that the lands on which the locks were made were acquired by the patentees for the purpose; the evidence on this head is meagre, but I prefer that of Mr. Thornter to that of Mr. Wheeler, and I am confirmed in this by the consideration that it would have been practically impossible to cut through the dams, which would have been the only other way of making the locks. I am asked to infer from the statement in the petition of 1625 and in the patent of 1638 that Gason or Jackson or Spencer had already made the Ouse navigable, and had, therefore, dedicated the river to the public before the date of the second patent. I cannot so hold. If this had been done, I cannot see how he could afterwards have had any benefit of the first patent. That patent granted no toll, and if an inventor chooses to put the subject matter of his invention on a public highway he has no means by which he can afterwards compel the public to pay him for it. The case of "Jackson v. Thornhill" corroborates this; for the objection was there raised on this very patent that the Ouse was a common river and the Court decided in the plaintiff's favour on the ground that the locks were on his own land. The expression that the patentees had made the Ouse navigable is ambiguous; it may well, and I think it does, mean "capable of navigation" only, as distinct from "dedicated to the public for the purpose of navigation." But the patent of 1638 does not merely grant the ordinary inventor's rights, but creates a toll for a period far exceeding the legal term under the Statute of Monopolies. This, coupled with the fact that the water of the Ouse had been diverted in some measure to give effect to the patent, leads me to infer that the locks were dedicated to the public contemporaneously with the grant of the toll. It has been argued that there can be no dedication of a highway subject to a toll, and this may well be in the case of an individual attempting to create a toll for himself as against public bodies having the care of highways. See "Austerbury v. Oldham Corporation" (29 Ch. Div., 750). In addition to the difficulty that a subject cannot create toll traverse properly so-called without a grant from the Crown or an Act of Parliament, dedication requires not merely the intention to dedicate by the grantor, but an acceptance by the public authority, because the latter by acceptance comes under a liability to keep in repair, for a river differs in this respect from a public road. The further difficulty that an individual cannot create a toll traverse does not apply to the present case, and, if authority is needed, in my opinion the legal possibility of the creation of a toll traverse by the Crown and a contemporaneous dedication by the owner of the land subject to the toll to the public is shown by Mr. Justice Willes's judgment in the Brecon case (supra) and the earlier authorities therein referred to. I, therefore, hold that under the second patent the locks were dedicated to the public for ever, and that a toll traverse was granted by the Crown to Spencer. Mr. Parker suggested that no dedication could be implied for a longer term than the term of the toll traverse, and quoted "Rex v. Miller (1 B. and Ad., 32). But that was a case of an Act of Parliament granting terminable turnpike annuities and turned on the construction of the particular Act, and the Court was influenced in their conclusion that there had been no dedication in perpetuity by the consideration that the acceptance of the road would have implied the acceptance of liability to repair it. This, as I have already shown, does not apply to the case of a river. Even if I came to the conclusion that the toll created by the second patent was "toll thorough," such toll, with its corresponding liability came to an end in 1718, and unless I could adopt the plaintiffs' contention as to a lost grant the plaintiffs would gain nothing by my holding that the toll was toll thorough. I now come to the third patent—that of 1638. By that patent King Charles I. purports to grant to Arnold Spencer and his heirs the sole and exclusive passage and transit for boats, barges, and other vessels laden with corn, coal, and all other goods, through the Ouse from St. Ives to St. Neots, and also in perpetuity the sole and exclusive licence for carrying and transporting in the river from St. Ives to St. Neots and thence to within four miles of Bedford, and so much further as Spencer should make navigable, and the sole and exclusive government and disposition of vessels sailing on the river and all profits in carrying on the river at a yearly rent of £6 13s. 4d. The patent proceeds to forbid all other persons to navigate the river to the injury or prejudice of Spencer. In my opinion, this patent is clearly void. The river had from time immemorial been navigable in sections, and had been made navigable throughout at that date from St. Ives to St. Neots, and King Charles had no more power to exclude the public from the Ouse than from the Thames. It was suggested that the King was the riparian owner, and as such could make this grant. It is enough for me to say that this contention was not supported by evidence. I also find from the evidence in the suits of "Jemmatt v. Ashley" that down to 1696 no one had ever attempted to put the patent in force, that all persons used the river on payment of the 3d. toll granted by the patent of 1628, and that Ashley as part owner of the rights under the patent and a predecessor in title of the defendant in his answer in the second suit deposed that he had never known the patent to be put in execution, and that all traders and others had enjoyed free passage from St. Ives to St. Neots on payment of the 3d. toll. It was contended for the defendant that the decree of July, 1696, in the second suit of "Jemmatt v. Ashley" amounted to a decision of the validity of the patent. I do not so read the decree so far as the plaintiff and the defendant Ashley were concerned, both suits were between the co-owners of whatever patent rights there were, and the validity of the patent of 1638 never came in issue. Ashley, by his answer, says that if he could support the patent he would be glad to do so. The other defendant in the second suit, Wilkes, was sued for an account as a trader using the navigation, but the only account directed against him was an account of the 3d. toll. The existence of this 3d. toll under the patent of 1628 is wholly inconsistent with the supposed title to the river itself alleged to have been granted by the patent of 1638.

No. 5.—VOL. XVI.

The only item of evidence in the defendant's favour on this head is the payment of £6 13s. 4d. rent under the patent of 1638 to the Crown. The difference between this and the £5 per river reserved by the patent of 1628 is small, and I infer that the larger sum was paid per incuriam down to 1718, and that payment was then continued because no one took the trouble to ascertain why or in what respect it was paid. The result is, I find, that the river was dedicated in perpetuity to the public in 1628 in consideration of a toll traverse created by the King contemporaneously, and that such toll expired in 1718. It has been proved that the toll of 3d. has been paid by all barges, &c., laden with goods down to 1851. In that year, in consequence of the competition of railways, the amount allowed to be carried for the 3d. was increased, with the result of diminishing the toll. No toll was ever paid for empty barges or for pleasure boats before 1868, in which year, in consequence of drought, the water was low, and the defendant's predecessor, at the request of the millers and for their benefit, attempted to impose a 5s. toll on pleasure boats with a view to stopping the traffic. The toll was paid in very few instances, and when paid was appropriated by the millers. About 1892, a 6d. toll on pleasure boats was imposed by the predecessors in title of the defendant, and has been usually paid. The defendant claims, as owner, to be entitled to charge what he pleases. His title arises under a conveyance of February 3, 1893, which contains no reference to the patent of 1638, or to any exclusive right of navigation, or to the charge of £6 13s. 4d., but is really appropriate to a conveyance of the tolls as tolls. I understand the defendant has no such title to the river or locks as would enable him to impose any charges, arbitrary or otherwise. But the plaintiffs ask me also to presume a lost grant in or subsequent to the year 1718, a "toll thorough" of 3d. a lock per ton to the plaintiffs' predecessors in title and to infer from that a corresponding liability on the defendant to repair and maintain the locks and employ men to work them. No doubt the Courts have in many cases made strong presumptions in order to give validity to ancient titles—"Saltau v. Goodman" (7 App. Cas., 633). But I am unable to make any such presumption in the present case. The result is that the plaintiffs have succeeded in establishing that the river is a public navigable river, but have failed in establishing that the defendant is liable to maintain and repair the locks, and the defendant has failed in his contention that the locks were his private property. There remains only the question of the St. Ives staunch. This depends on the Act of 1719. The rights and duties of an individual or corporation under an Act of Parliament differ materially from their rights and duties under a Royal grant. There is no constitutional limit to the powers of the Legislature, and there is therefore no necessity to imply any consideration for legislative interference with public or private rights. The rights and duties under the Act are to be found within the four corners of the Act. A railway company which is empowered by permissive words to make and maintain its line and works is under no obligation to make or maintain or reinstate such line and works, although the Acts were passed on the usual evidence of public benefit, and with the usual powers of compulsory purchase, interference with highways, &c. (see "R. v. York and North Midland Railway Company" (1 E. and B., 178, 858), and "R. v. Great Western Railway Company" (62 L.J., Q.B. 572). In this case, the Act is clearly permissive, and imposes no duties of repair or maintenance on the defendant. It contains a provision authorizing the appointment of commissioners, with powers to make orders and decrees for the due regulation and government of the staunch and the preservation of the river, and Mr. Upjohn invited me to make a declaration that the defendant is bound to obey such regulations. No such commissioners have ever been appointed, and I see no ground for making any such hypothetical declaration. I propose to declare that the six locks and the stanch at St. Ives, with their appurtenances, form part of the river Ouse, and that the Ouse from St. Neots to St. Ives is a public navigable river. As the defendant has interfered with the locks by fastening back some of the gates and the like, I propose to grant an injunction restraining him from interfering with the river in general terms. With regard to the costs of the action, the plaintiffs have succeeded in establishing the public rights over the river, including the locks, against the contention of the defendant, that the locks were his private property, but have failed to fix the defendant with the liability to maintain, repair, and work them for the public benefit, and I therefore make no order as to costs.

Court of Appeal (Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J., A. L. Smith and Vaughan Williams, L.J.J.) 1899.
Oct. 31.

NEELD V. HENDON URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL.*

Highway—Roadside waste—Dedication—Presumption—Evidence of user and acts of ownership.

This was an appeal by the defendants from the judgment of Mr. Justice Channell at the trial of the action without a jury. The action was one of trespass, and the question was whether a small piece of land, now enclosed, formed part of a highway, called Butcher's-lane, in the Hendon Urban District. The piece of land was of an irregular triangular shape, and was portion of a strip of greensward lying between the metalled part of the road and an ancient hedge. In 1874 it was enclosed by the erection of posts and rails which separated it from the metalled part of the road. It appeared that the old hedge was on the top of a slope, and that at the bottom of the slope there was a ditch, and that there was another ditch between the posts and rails and the metalled part of the road. The plaintiff's case was that the margin of greensward by the side of the road was part of the waste of the manor, and he relied on certain acts of ownership exercised on the land in question, such as the taking of a quantity of soil from the surface under a licence from the lord of the manor. The defendants alleged that the place in question was always used by the public as a highway until it was enclosed in 1874. The learned Judge gave judgment for the plaintiff. The defendants appealed.

Mr. Cripps, Q.C., Mr. Macmorran, Q.C., and Mr. J. P. Oliver appeared for the defendants; Mr. Asquith, Q.C., and Mr. J. E. Bankes for the plaintiff.

The COURT, without calling upon counsel for the plaintiff, dismissed the appeal.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE said that the burden lay on the defendants to show that the piece of land in question had been dedicated to the public as part of the highway. The defendants had cited the case of "Regina v. The United Kingdom Electric Telegraph Company" (31 L.J., M.C., 166), and they relied on the presumption that, where there is a highway with adjacent hedges on each side, all the space between the hedges is prima facie dedicated to the public. It seemed to him to be difficult to assent to the proposition that in all circumstances and under all conditions, if there was a metalled high road and a margin of green on each side and hedges beyond, the general presumption, apart from the conditions of the thing itself, was that all between the hedges was part of the highway. He thought that something must depend on whether the district in which margins were so left was an enclosed district or not, on the regularity or irregularity of the fences, and on the relative levels of the various parts of the strips of land adjoining the metalled road. But the question now to be considered was whether, assuming that presumption to exist, it had not in this case been rebutted. It was impossible to tell the circumstances under which the land through which this highway ran was originally enclosed. The owners may have refrained from enclosing the whole of their land up to the beaten track for various reasons, possibly in order to avoid liability to repair ratione clausurae, possibly in order to leave strips of land capable of being used for deviation. He doubted whether it could be right to say that, where an owner left margins outside his fences, he necessarily intended to dedicate them for all time and for all purposes. His Lordship then described the locus in quo, and said that as far back as the year 1872 permission was asked by a tenant of the lord of the manor to make the enclosure, and the posts and rails were erected in 1874. This must have been done openly, and it was done some few years after the passing of an Act which cast on public bodies the duty of regulating the use of highways. In 1885 the posts and rails were re-erected. He thought these facts were strong to rebut the presumption of dedication. Further, the facts connected with the removal of soil were evidence of acts of ownership amply sufficient to rebut the presumption that the locus in quo was to be regarded as part of the highway. He wished not to be understood as meaning that in his opinion the rights of the public over a highway were confined to the metalled part of the road. In his judgment the decision of Mr. Justice Channell was right, and the appeal must be dismissed.

The LORDS JUSTICES delivered judgments to the same effect.

THE VESTRY OF ST. MARYLEBONE, LONDON, V. THE SHERIFF OF LONDON.*

Sheriff—Rates—Seizure of goods of a person from whom rates due—Liability of sheriff to pay rates on demand—Local Act, 35 Geo. III., c. 73.

This was an action to recover money under the provisions of section 195 of a local Act applicable to the parish of St. Marylebone (35 Geo. III., c. 73) in respect of parochial rates due to the plaintiff vestry from one Bush, whose goods had been seized under a writ of fi. fa. by the defendant. By section 195, it is enacted that when the goods of any person liable to pay any rate by virtue of the Act "shall be taken in execution" by the sheriff before the rate has been paid, then the sheriff, on demand being made by the rate-collector, shall, in the first place, pay such rate, provided that the sheriff shall not be charged with the payment of more than one year's rate or of a larger sum than the value of the goods taken in execution. The facts were as follows:—The defendant being in possession of the goods of Bush under a fi. fa., a demand was made on November 24, 1898, on the defendant by the rate-collector for the payment of rates owing by Bush. The amount demanded was less than the value of the goods and of the judgment debt. The defendant did not pay the rates. On November 25 the defendant received the amount of the judgment debt, which he paid to the execution creditor, and then went out of possession.

*Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

*Reported by F. O. ROBINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. H. F. MANISTY, for the plaintiffs, argued that, in the circumstances of the case, the goods of Bush had been taken in execution within the meaning of section 195 just as much as if there had been a sale of the goods by the sheriff. He cited, in support of this contention, the judgment of Lord Esher in "Smith v. Critchfield" (14 Q.B.D., 873).

Mr. P. ROSE-INNES, for the defendant, contended that the goods had not been taken in execution. On the question of the construction of the section, he referred, by way of illustration, to the language of the Statute 8 Anne, c. 4, and he cited "In re Mackenzie" (15 The Times L.R., 526) and other cases decided under that Act. He also contended that this local Act had been repealed, by implication, by the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, and that the rates in question were not rates made by virtue of the local Act, but under the Act of 1855.

MR. JUSTICE BIGHAM, in giving judgment, having stated the facts and referred to the section in question, said that before the sheriff could be called upon to perform the obligations of the section two conditions must be fulfilled. First, the sheriff must have taken in execution the goods of a person liable to pay a rate; secondly, the sheriff must have been served with a demand for the payment of the rate. If those two conditions were fulfilled, it was clearly the duty of the sheriff under the statute to pay the rate. In his Lordship's opinion, the rate having been made, the liability to pay it attached at once, and the fact, if it was a fact, that the demand note required payment at a later date than November 24 was of no significance. The goods which had been seized were therefore the goods of a person liable to pay a rate. Then, had the goods been taken in execution? His Lordship was of opinion that they had. In ordinary language the sheriff was said to have taken goods in execution when he had seized them. It was said that words in the statute of Anne similar to those in question had received a different interpretation. The words there, however, were different from these and of different signification. The language of the statute of Anne pointed to a removal of the goods. The goods in this case had been taken in execution just as much as if there had been a sale, in which case it could not be doubted that the sheriff would have been liable to pay the rate out of the proceeds of the sale. There was no ground for saying that the local Act had been repealed by the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, nor was there anything in the suggestion that the sheriff was not liable because some of the rates in question had been levied under the Act of 1855. For the recovery of rates levied under that Act the vestry retained the powers and remedies of the local Act. There would be judgment for the plaintiffs for the amount claimed, with costs.

Court of Appeal (Lindley, M.R.,) 1899.
Jeune, P., and Romer, L.J.) Nov. 23,

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL V. CLARKSON.*

(a)—Finance Act, 1896, sec. 14.

*Reported by W. L. CABELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This appeal against a decision of a Divisional Court (Mr. Justice Wills and Mr. Justice Bruce) raised a question upon the construction of section 5 of the Finance Act, 1894—viz., whether property contingently settled by a will or other instrument is liable to "settlement estate duty" under that section—whether, as the Master of the Rolls expressed it, that section applies not only to property actually settled, but also to property "liable to become settled." In the present case the question arose with reference to the estate of the late Mr. Peter Robinson, who died in October, 1895, leaving property worth more than a million. By his will he bequeathed the sum of £30,000 to each of three of his sons "to be paid to them respectively if and when they respectively shall attain the age of 25 years," with interest in the meantime. In case either of the sons should die under 25 leaving issue, his legacy was to be held in trust for his children. But in case either of the sons should die under 25 without leaving issue, his legacy was to fall into the testator's residuary personal estate. And he gave the residue of his estate on trust for such of his seven other children—four of whom were daughters and three sons—"as, being male, attain the age of 25 years, or, being female, attain that age or marry, in equal shares as tenants in common." The share of any of the children who was a daughter was not to vest absolutely in her, but was to be retained by his trustees upon the usual trusts of a marriage settlement for the benefit of the daughter, her husband, and children. In case any of the daughters should die in the testator's lifetime leaving issue living at his death, the share thereinbefore directed to be held upon trusts for her and her issue, and the income thereof, should be held upon the same trusts as if the daughter had died immediately after the testator. If any of the three sons should die in the testator's lifetime leaving a child or children living at the testator's death, the share thereinbefore bequeathed in trust for him, and the income thereof, should be held in trust for his children or child who, being sons or a son, should attain 21, or, being daughters or a daughter, should attain that age or marry, and if more than one in equal shares, and if there should be no such child should go by way of addition to the share or shares of the others or other of the testator's children. Two of the three first-mentioned sons attained 25 before the death of the testator; the third attained 25 in August, 1897. One of the seven secondly-mentioned children died before the testator and under 25. The other six were living at the time of the testator's death, and were all unmarried. One of the daughters had since married, but all the six are still under 25. Under these circumstances, the Commissioners of Inland Revenue claimed the payment of settlement estate duty on the whole of the residue of the testator's estate, including the sum of £30,000 contingently bequeathed to the son who attained 25 in August, 1897. The trustees and executors of the will contended that no such duty was payable. By the Finance Act, 1894 (section 5, subsection 1), "Where property in respect of which estate duty is leviable is settled by the will of the deceased, or, having been settled by some other disposition, passes under that disposition on the death of the deceased to some person not competent to dispose of the property—(a) a further estate duty (called settlement estate duty) on the principal value of the settled property shall be levied at the rate hereinafter specified, except where the only life interest in the property after the death of the deceased is that of a wife or husband of the deceased." By section 22, subsection 1, "(h) The expression 'settled property' means property comprised in a settlement. (i) The expression 'settlement' means any instrument, whether relating to real property or personal property, which is a settlement within the meaning of section 2 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, or if it related to real property would be a settlement within the meaning of that section." By the Settled Land Act, 1882, section 2, "Any deed, will, . . . or other instrument . . . under or by virtue of which instrument . . . any land, or any estate or interest in land, stands for the time being limited to or in trust for any persons by way of succession, creates or is for purposes of this Act a settlement, and is in this Act referred to as a settlement." (4) "The determination of the question whether land is settled land, for purposes of this Act, or not, is governed by the state of facts, and the limitations of the settlement, at the time of the settlement taking effect." By the Finance Act, 1898, section 14, "Where, in the case of a death occurring after the commencement of this Act, settlement estate duty is paid in respect of any property contingently settled, and it is thereafter shown that the contingency has not arisen, and cannot arise, the said duty paid in respect of such property shall be repaid." The Divisional Court, following a former decision of Mr. Justice Vaughan Williams and Mr. Justice Kennedy, in "The Attorney-General v. Fairley" ([1897] 1 Q.B. 698), held that the claim of the Commissioners was well founded. The trustees of the will appealed.

The appeal was heard in this Court because Lord Justice Vaughan Williams, from whose decision it was in substance brought, is now sitting in Court of Appeal No. I.

Mr. Haldane, Q.C., and Mr. Danckwerts were for the trustees; the Solicitor-General (Sir R. B. Finlay, Q.C.) and Mr. Vaughan Hawkins were for the Commissioners.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said that the question raised was one of some difficulty, but he thought that the argument on behalf of the appellants, ingenious as it was, was one to which the Court could not accede. The real question was whether the residuary estate of Mr. Peter Robinson was settled by his will. If it was, then "settlement estate duty" was, under section 5, subsection 1 (a), payable on the "principal value" of the settled property. Looking at the will his Lordship could not say that, in ordinary conveyancing language, this property was not settled by the will. It had been forcibly argued that the Court must see whether the property was settled on "persons by way of succession" regard being had to subsections 1 and 4 of section 2 of the Settled Land Act, 1882. His Lordship would admit that this argument raised a very nice question whether this property could be regarded as governed by subsection 4. In "The Attorney-General v. Fairley" the Divisional Court held that upon the true construction of section 5 of the Finance Act, 1894, settlement estate duty was payable in such a case as the present. This Court was now asked to overrule that decision. His Lordship was not prepared to say that the Court would have done so, but it was a very nice question. Since, however, that judgment was given, section 14 of the Act of 1898 had been passed. No doubt that section did not apply to the present case; it applied only "in the case of a death occurring after the commencement of the Act." But it appeared to his Lordship that section 14 had recognized the construction which had been put on the Act of 1894 in "The Attorney-General v. Fairley." The section adopted that decision, and said in effect that the duty must be paid whether the contingency on which the settlement was to take effect had or had not arrived, and if it did not and could not arrive, the duty was to be repaid. His Lordship thought that this amounted to a Legislative adoption of the construction which the Court had put upon the former Act. The Legislature found that that construction might work oppressively, and so they provided that for the future if the contingency did not happen the duty which had been paid should be repaid. This settled the doubt which had been raised, but his Lordship did not say that he might not have arrived at the same conclusion independently of the Act of 1898.

The PRESIDENT of the PROBATE DIVISION agreed. But he should have felt great doubt but for the Act of 1898. He had been much impressed with the argument of Mr. Haldane, and especially with that of Mr. Danckwerts.

LORD JUSTICE ROMER would only say that he agreed with the judgment of the Master of the Rolls.

YOUNG v. KERSHAW—BURTON v. KERSHAW.*

Practice—New trial—Fresh evidence—Rule as to granting new trial on the ground of new evidence.

The plaintiff in the first action was the Rev. Hamilton Young, the vicar of the parish of Alne, in the diocese of York. The plaintiff in the second action was Miss Mary Ann Burton, who resided with her mother at Alne. The defendant was Mr. Richard Kershaw, who was the owner of the advowson of Alne, and the father-in-law of the plaintiff Young. The alleged libel, which was the same in both actions, was contained in a letter written on behalf of the defendant to the secretary of the Archbishop of York, dated December 27, 1898. The letter contained a charge of improper intercourse between the plaintiff Young and the plaintiff Miss Burton in February, 1897, March, 1897, and from time to time from then until July, 1898, and that in this latter month the two plaintiffs stayed together for several days at Brussels at the house of Madame Dau Flouche, at 68, Rue de l'Aurore. In this letter the writer said that if the plaintiff Young chose to treat the letter as a libel upon him, and to bring an action for damages in respect thereof, he was authorized, on the defendant's behalf, to undertake that he would not claim any privilege for the letter, but would in any such action plead that the statements in the letter were true in substance and in fact, and if he (the defendant) should, which he did not anticipate, fail to prove his plea, he would be prepared to accept the consequences in damages and costs. The action was tried before Mr. Commissioner Bosanquet, Q.C., and a special jury at York, when the jury found verdicts for the plaintiffs, awarding £100 damages to the plaintiff Young, and £1,000 damages to the plaintiff Miss Burton. Judgment was given for the plaintiffs accordingly. The defendant applied for a new trial on the grounds (1) that the verdicts were against the weight of the evidence; (2) that there was misdirection; and (3) that the defendant discovered after the trial new evidence which he could not by reasonable diligence have discovered before the trial. The defendant further complained that the damages in the second action were excessive.

SIR EDWARD CLARKE, Q.C. (Mr. Tindal Atkinson, Q.C., and Mr. Beverley with him), for the defendant, said that in August, 1898, Mrs. Young left her husband and went with her children to live with her father. The learned counsel then read the letter upon which the action was based, and dealt with the evidence given at the trial as to the incidents alleged against the plaintiffs, and proceeded to state the nature of the new evidence which was discovered since the trial. The new evidence, the learned counsel said, was evidence of an act of improper intercourse not gone into at the trial. [LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH.—Unless you can put it on the ground of surprise, how can you read the evidence?] It was sufficient to show that the new evidence, of which neither the defendant nor his advisers were aware at the trial, could not by reasonable diligence have been discovered before the trial. “Anderson v. Titmas” (36 L.T., 711). [LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH.—It was laid down in that case that the new evidence must be conclusive.] If it was merely a new witness discovered who could corroborate a witness called at the trial, that would be a different case. But here the new evidence was that of two proposed witnesses in respect of an incident in August 1897, not gone into at the trial. [LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH.—Surely it is in the public interest that there should be an end of litigation. When a person libels another he ought to have his materials ready at the trial.] A man was not confined to what he knew when he wrote the alleged libel. He could prove anything relevant that came to his knowledge before the trial. [LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH.—But the defendant must, as a general rule, be confined to what he knows at the trial.] That was the general rule, no doubt, but he was entitled to say that, though it was in the public interest that there should be an end of litigation, it was still more important in the public interest that justice should be done between the parties. If the new evidence showed that the verdict was wrong, the verdict ought not to stand. What was more, this evidence would be before the Divorce Court in the proceedings pending in that Court, and the question was whether this Court would run the risk of allowing a verdict to stand when the other Court might come to a different conclusion. Apart from the new evidence he did not ask for a new trial upon the ground that the verdict was against the weight of the evidence, or upon the other grounds. But he did say that the facts of the case were such that, if the new evidence had been given before the jury, it was reasonably probable that the jury would have come to a different conclusion. He also referred to “Broadhead v. Marshall” (2 W. Bl., 955.) The learned counsel then read the affidavits containing the proposed new evidence as to alleged impropriety, the witnesses being an engine cleaner in the employment of the North-Eastern Railway Company, 20 years of age, and a private in the 2nd Dragoon Guards, 19 years of age, who at the time of the incident spoken to was a labourer. The defendant’s solicitor a few days after the trial received a letter from one of these witnesses stating the incident, and saying that he had told Mr. Mintoft, who advised him to write to the defendant’s solicitor, and this was how it came to the knowledge of the defendant’s solicitor.

Mr. TINDAL ATKINSON, followed on the same side, and contended that it was not necessary that the evidence should be conclusive. He referred to “Shields v. Boucher” (1 De G. and Sm., 40); “Thurtell v. Beaumont” (12 Bing., 339).

Mr. SCOTT FOX, Q.C. (Mr. H. T. Kemp with him), for the plaintiffs, contended that upon any view of the law the proposed new evidence was not admissible. A great point at the trial was whether the charge brought by Mrs. Young against her husband was not an afterthought, made in consequence of a charge made by Mr. Young against his wife in relation to Mr. Mintoft. That was a charge made in December, 1895, and Mintoft had written a letter to the plaintiff Young in that month, in which he said that he was quite willing to leave the place as he, the plaintiff, desired to avoid a scandal, but not that he was guilty of what the plaintiff accused him of. From that time Mr. Young ceased to cohabit with his wife. The basis upon which the action was fought was whether the attack upon Mr. Young was an honest attack upon him by Mrs. Young, the bona fides of the father, the defendant, not being questioned, as he believed in his daughter. This was a case in which the evidence produced through Mintoft should be looked upon with suspicion. Further, even if the evidence were of the strongest kind, the general rule was most strict in a libel action that the defendant must have his tackle ready at the trial. The present case was not one in which the rule should be relaxed. Again, the rule as to granting a new trial on the ground of new evidence was that the new evidence must be such that the Court was practically convinced of the truth of the story asked to be laid before the jury. The evidence proposed to be adduced in the present case was not of that character, and had already been contradicted at the trial. He referred to “Weak v. Calloway” (7 Price, 677).

SIR EDWARD CLARKE, in reply, said that until May, 1899, no proceedings were taken by the plaintiff Young against his wife in respect of her alleged impropriety with Mintoft in December, 1895. He agreed that at the trial an attack was made on Mrs. Young, and that was the reason why he asked the Court to postpone the hearing of the appeal until after the trial in the Divorce Court, where all the evidence would be before the Court, and where Mr. Mintoft could be called. The whole question would be raised in those proceedings, because Mrs. Young had a counter-claim, alleging adultery between her husband and Miss Burton, and claiming judicial separation. He would now ask the Court to postpone their judgment until the proceedings in the Divorce Court were over.

The COURT dismissed the application.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that the trial at York occupied four days, and in the result the jury found a verdict for the two plaintiffs. The sole defence was a justification, and indeed, when the letter was written, it was stated on behalf of the defendant that he would only plead that the statements were true in substance and in fact, and that if he failed, which he did not anticipate, he was prepared to accept the consequences in damages and costs. The action was for a libel upon a clergyman and upon a lady who, so far as he (the Lord Justice) knew, was a lady of unimpeached character. The libel was published to three or four other persons besides the secretary of the Archbishop of York. The application for a new trial was applied for on various grounds, but only one ground was pressed in argument—namely, that new evidence had been discovered since the trial. What was the rule which applied in such a case—when there had been a trial with a jury? It seemed to him that the authorities showed that a new trial might be ordered where the new evidence proposed to be adduced could not have been obtained by any reasonable diligence before the trial, and where the evidence, if admitted, would be conclusive to show that the verdict ought to have been the other way. Could it be said that the new evidence proposed to be adduced of two witnesses, one of 19 years of age and the other of 20 years, was conclusive of the matter? In the first place, one of the new witnesses wrote a few days after the trial to the defendant’s solicitor, at the instance of Mintoft, against whom it was alleged that he had been guilty of impropriety with Mrs. Young. The circumstances of the letter were suspicious. The statement by the proposed new witnesses was remarkably like the incidents deposed to by a witness at the trial, who was also obtained through the instrumentality of Mintoft. From that fact alone he (the Lord Justice) would say that the proposed new evidence was not conclusive at all, so that he could say that the jury would act upon it. Again, it was oath against oath, the oaths of those two boys against the oaths of the two plaintiffs. How could the Court say that the evidence, if given, would be conclusive. The case did not come within the rule at all. It was then said that the Court ought not to give judgment until the trial in the Divorce Court was over. But why were not the plaintiffs entitled to the verdict, and to enter upon the proceedings in the Divorce Court with the benefit of that verdict? It was now admitted that there was no ground for impeaching the verdict on the evidence given at the time. For these reasons the application must be dismissed with costs.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS concurred. It was of the highest importance that all the evidence which could be got together at the trial should be the only evidence admitted. It was obviously most undesirable that a party, after the ordeal of a trial had been gone through, and after he had found out the weak points in his adversary's armour, should come with fresh evidence to meet those weak points. In exceptional cases the Court had granted a new trial on the ground that new evidence had been discovered since the trial. But that had been fenced round with limitations. The party must show that the fact that he had not brought it forward before was not owing to any remissness on his part. Then as regards the class of the evidence, in his opinion the rule was that the evidence must be such that, if adduced, it would be practically conclusive. On looking at the new evidence it was obvious to him that it related to the same incident as that deposed to at the trial, and was merely throwing in a fresh piece of evidence to support a charge already contradicted at the trial and disposed of by the jury. Taking the rule in its widest possible view, how could the Court say that the new evidence would render it probable that the verdict would have been different? The evidence was open to criticism on many grounds. Why was not the evidence brought forward before? One of the witnesses professed to know about the parties and of the rumours that were about. The evidence itself was also subject to criticism as to the source from which it came. Taking it as a whole, in his judgment it was very far from being conclusive, and indeed he did not know whether the jury, if it were admitted, would attach much weight to it at all.

THE OAKVILLE STEAMSHIP COMPANY V. HOLMES.*

Ship—Charter-party—Demurrage—Construction of charter-party—Option of averaging days for loading and discharge.

Mr. J. A. Hamilton appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Robson, Q.C., and Mr. T. E. Scrutton for the defendant.

MR. JUSTICE BIGHAM read the following judgment:—This action was brought to recover £216, being a sum alleged to be payable by the defendant in respect of nine days' demurrage of the plaintiffs' ship Oakville at the rate of £24 a day. The question is whether the defendant, who by agreement is taken to represent the charterer, is liable. The dispute arises (as usual in these cases) by reason of the clumsy wording of the charter-party. If merchants and shipowners would take a little more care about settling the terms of such documents they would save themselves much loss of time and money. The charter-party was for the carriage of a cargo of 1,900 tons of iron ore from Cartagena in Spain to Maryport. The contract provided that the charterer should advance money for ship's disbursements at port of loading, the amount to be endorsed on the bills of lading and to be treated as an advance of freight. The charterer was to be credited with 3 per cent. on the amount of the advance, to cover his commission, interest, and insurance. The cargo was to be loaded at the rate of 200 tons per working day of 24 hours and to be discharged at the same rate. Then came two provisions (not in juxtaposition) which were as follows:—"Charterers have the option of averaging days for loading and discharging in order to avoid demurrage . . ."; "despatch money at the rate of 10s. per hour shall be paid for any time saved in loading or discharging to be settled in loading and discharging ports respectively." Demurrage was to be at the rate of £24 per day of 24 hours. What happened was this. The vessel was loaded much more rapidly than at the stipulated rate of 200 tons per day of 24 hours. Despatch money in respect of the time saved was claimed by the charterers. Thereupon an account was made out at Cartagena showing the amounts of the despatch money so claimed and also the amount of the ship's disbursements; and in this account there was a charge against the ship of 3 per cent. on the total sum. This account was presented to the captain for his signature and was signed by him, but with the following note:—"Loading charge and despatch money to be finally adjusted on quantity discharged at Maryport." This note, however, merely referred to a dispute as to the quantity put on board; a dispute which affected to some small extent the charge for loading, and possibly the amount of the allowance for despatch money. It had no other significance. The bill of lading was then endorsed as follows:—"Received on account of freight the sum of £257 7s. 3d., interest and insurance included." This amount of £257 7s. 3d. represented the disbursements, the despatch money, and the charge of 3 per cent. as shown in the account to which I have referred; and I find that the parties treated the whole sum as money paid in advance of freight. In due time the ship arrived at Maryport; but here the discharge was very slow, the laydays being exceeded by nine days. The plaintiffs thereupon made their present claim for demurrage. The question is, has the defendant any answer to it? He says he has; he contends that he may disregard the settlement made in Cartagena and forgo the despatch money which he claimed and which was allowed to him there, and may then average the loading and discharging days under his option in the charter-party. If he can do this, it is of course very much to his advantage, because the despatch money is credited to him at only £12 a day, whereas the demurrage is debited to him at £24 a day. On the other hand, the plaintiffs say that, as the despatch money at Cartagena has been settled in account by treating it as a payment by the defendant on account of freight, all question as to how the time saved at Cartagena shall be treated is at an end. I am of opinion that the plaintiffs' contention is the right one. I think that when the defendant asked for and obtained his despatch money at Cartagena, claiming and getting his 3 per cent. upon the amount of it, he exercised once for all his option as to averaging the loading and discharging days, that is to say, he elected not to average; and it was too late for him to change his mind after the discharge at Maryport. I have not overlooked the words in the charter-party which provide that the despatch money is to be settled at the port of loading. This only means that the amount of the despatch money is to be settled there. The charterer is notwithstanding these words entitled to refuse to accept payment of despatch money, except on the terms of keeping alive his option as to averaging the loading and discharging days. But if he does what he did here, if he accepts once for all the despatch money, and treats it as paid to him, his option as to average is exercised and gone.

SCOTT V. FOLEY, AIKMAN, AND CO.*

Contract—Hiring—Warranty as to fitness—Charter-party—Personal injuries through defective condition of vessel.

The charterer, having been compelled in an action to pay damages to a stevedore for personal injuries sustained by reason of the defective condition of the vessel, held entitled to recover such damages and all costs incurred from the persons from whom he chartered.

This was an action to recover damages for breach of warranty contained in a charter-party dated April 4, 1898, by which the plaintiff Scott chartered from the defendants for one voyage the ship Senator. The defendants had previously chartered the Senator from her owner. The facts of the case were as follows:—Under the charter-party the ship was to be placed at the disposal of Scott at the Hermitage Basin, London. Scott contracted with a master stevedore to load the vessel at the basin. In the course of the loading it became necessary for a man named Marney, who had been engaged by the master stevedore, to go down into the main hold. In order to do so it was necessary for him to descend a fixed iron ladder reaching from the train hatch down to the bottom of the hold. Marney put his foot on to the top rung of the ladder, when by reason of its insecure condition the rung came adrift, and Marney fell into the hold, and was seriously hurt. Marney brought an action against Scott claiming damages. The action was tried before Mr. Justice Bigham, and is reported in 15 The Times L.R., 320. The learned Judge gave judgment for Marney for £220 and costs, on the ground that Scott should have inspected the vessel before allowing the stevedore's men to go on board, and that the slightest inspection would have shown that the ladder was in a dangerous condition. Scott now brought this action against the defendants, alleging a breach of the warranty in the charter-party that the vessel was "tight, staunch, and strong, and in every way fitted for the voyage or service and to be so maintained by the owners"—i.e., the defendants. Scott claimed as damages for the breach of warranty the damages and costs recovered by Marney in his action against Scott, and also Scott's own costs in that action as between solicitor and client. The defendants pleaded that the damages claimed were too remote, and that Scott's liability to Marney was directly caused by Scott's own negligence.

Mr. RUFUS ISAACS, Q.C. (Dr. Arthur Lennard with him), for the plaintiff, contended that notwithstanding that the present plaintiff might have been guilty of negligence as towards Marney, he was nevertheless entitled to recover the damages claimed from the defendants for the breach of warranty. The case of "Mowbray v. Merryweather" ([1895] 2 Q.B., 640) was on all fours with the present case, and was clear authority in the plaintiff's favour. That decision had recently been followed in the Court of Appeal in "Vogan v. Oulton," reported in The Times of November 18 last. With regard to the costs, both those paid to Marney and Scott's own costs were recoverable because it was a reasonable thing for Scott to defend that action: "Hammond v. Bussey" (20 Q.B.D., 79); "Agins v. Great Western Railway Company" ([1899] 1 Q.B., 413).

Mr. MCCALL, Q.C., and Mr. J. A. HAMILTON, for the defendants, submitted that at the most the plaintiff was only entitled to nominal damages for the breach of warranty. The damages recovered by Marney were not the immediate result of the defendants' breach of warranty, because, in order to enable Marney to recover, an intervening cause was necessary—viz., Scott's negligence. The question was what was in the contemplation of the parties at the time the charter-party was entered into, and it was material on that point to take into consideration that the defendants were not the real owners of the vessel in question. The cases cited turned on breaches of contract, and were, therefore, distinguishable from the present case, which turned on tort. As to the costs it was contended that the defendants were not liable to reimburse Scott for the costs of defending an action, which should not have been defended. It could not have been contemplated by the parties that the liability to pay these costs would result from a breach of the warranty.

MR. JUSTICE BIGHAM, in giving judgment, said that he was of opinion that the plaintiff had sustained the damages which he claimed in this action, by reason of the defendants' breach of the warranty in the charter-party. His Lordship was satisfied that Scott knew of that warranty when he signed the charter-party, and that, knowing of it, he relied upon it, and the omission of Scott to perform the duty which he owed to Marney arose from Scott's properly and justifiably relying on the defendants' warranty. It was said that there was no evidence to support this view; but the existence of the warranty in the charter-party was such evidence, and, speaking from his knowledge of business matters, his Lordship came to the conclusion that Scott dispensed with an examination of the ship's appliances because he knew that the defendants had undertaken that duty towards him and had warranted that the appliances were in a proper state. Both parties knew the purpose to which the ship would be put, and that Scott would have to employ men like Marney on the conditions on which Marney was employed. Therefore, the defendants must have contemplated that there might be claims for damages by persons like Marney if they (the defendants) did not perform their duty under the warranty of maintaining the ship in a fit condition. His Lordship therefore came to the conclusion that the plaintiff's claim as to the damages paid to Marney came within the authorities which had been cited, and that he was entitled to recover those damages from the defendants. There was a further question as to the costs which Scott had had to pay to Marney, and as to Scott's own costs of defending Marney's action. That action had been reasonably defended, and the conduct of the defence had also been reasonable. Could it be said that those costs were in the contemplation of the parties to the charter-party? His Lordship thought that it could be so said, and, further, he was not sure that the question as to costs was not absolutely covered by the cases of "Hammond v. Bussey" and "Agins v. Great Western Railway Company." The question was whether it had been reasonable to defend Marney's action. That was a question of fact, and, inasmuch as that action was due entirely to the defendants' breach of warranty, it could not be said that the costs of defending the action were not damages within the contemplation of the parties. His Lordship further held that Scott's own costs should include solicitor and client costs, subject to taxation, because if it was reasonable for him to defend the action it was inevitable that he should incur those costs. It had been suggested that this case differed from those which had been cited because Scott's liability to Marney arose out of tort and not contract, but his Lordship was quite unable to see why, on principle, that distinction should make any difference.

PAYTON AND CO. (LIMITED) V. SELLING, LAMPARD, AND CO. (LIMITED).*

Trader—Goods—"Get up" of goods—Distinctive "get up"—Features common to the trade—Injunction refused

This was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice Byrne. The action was brought by Messrs. Payton and Co., who were wholesale tea and coffee merchants, of Tower-hill, against Messrs. Snelling, Lampard, and Co., who carried on a similar wholesale business at St. George's-house, Eastcheap, for an injunction to restrain the defendants from selling their coffee in tins got up in such a way as to be calculated to lead to the belief that the coffee therein contained was the plaintiffs' coffee. In 1895 the plaintiffs began to sell a mixture of coffee and chicory (commonly called French coffee in the trade) of three different qualities in cylindrical tins of various sizes, having red, blue, and green labels upon them, the colour of the label denoting the quality of the coffee. In 1897 the plaintiffs began for the first time to use tins enamelled in colours. At this time the use of enamelled tins was a novelty in the trade. The plaintiffs' tins were enamelled in such a way as to reproduce the colour and design of their previously used labels. On the upper part of the tins there appeared the word "Royal" printed in very conspicuous letters, in the centre of the tin there was a design of a shield and a crown, and in the lower part there was printed the word "coffee" in somewhat smaller characters. The defendants had recently begun to sell "French coffee" of three different qualities in enamelled tins of the same colours and of the same shape and the same sizes, but the design and letterpress appearing upon the tins differed in many respects from the plaintiffs'. The upper part of the tin contained the word "Flag" very conspicuously printed, in the centre there was a design of a flag, and below this design there occurred the words "French coffee." The prices at which the defendants sold their coffee were also not the same as the plaintiffs' prices. Mr. Justice Byrne granted an injunction. The defendants appealed.

Mr. Swinfen Ealy, Q.C., Mr. Birrell, Q.C., and Mr. Micklem were for the defendants: Mr. Warrington, Q.C., Mr. Eve, Q.C., Mr. Astbury, Q.C., and Mr. Sebastian were for the plaintiffs.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said that he was bound to differ from the conclusion at which the learned Judge below had arrived, but he was not differing from him upon any point of evidence involving the credibility of the witnesses. In order to succeed it was necessary for the plaintiffs to make out that the defendants' goods were calculated to be mistaken for theirs (the plaintiffs'). In this case the goods of the plaintiffs and of the defendants unquestionably resembled each other, but the features in which they resembled each other were features which were common to the trade, and the plaintiffs must make out that the defendants' goods resembled theirs in features which distinguished their (the plaintiffs') goods from all other goods in the trade. When once the features which were common to the trade were eliminated it could not be said that there was any resemblance between the plaintiffs' and the defendants' goods. The defendants were not infringing the plaintiffs' rights by using a circular tin of a particular colour, and the distinctive designs of the plaintiffs and defendants were so utterly different that it was impossible to maintain this action. This point had been so fully dealt with in the recent case of "Lever v. Beddingfield" (16 P.R., 3) that it was unnecessary to dwell longer upon it. In his Lordship's opinion the defendants were honest traders and were being oppressed by the plaintiffs, who were really asking to obtain a monopoly in these enamelled tins.

The PRESIDENT of the PROBATE DIVISION gave judgment to the like effect.

LORD JUSTICE ROMER also agreed. It was too often supposed that if a trader adopted a novel get-up for his goods anybody else in the trade might be restrained from using that get-up. There was, however, no monopoly in the get-up of goods, though, no doubt, the imitation of the get-up was an element for consideration in determining the probability of deception. The notion that a trader who adopted a new get-up acquired any proprietary rights in that get-up was, of course, not well founded. It was further to be observed that in this case the plaintiffs' goods had not been long on the market, so that there was no ground for assuming that the get-up was necessarily connected with their goods. Then as to the colours of the tins, there was nothing peculiar in the colours adopted by the plaintiffs—they had adopted the brightest and best-known colours in the trade—nor was there any peculiarity in the shape of the tins. He agreed with the Master of the Rolls that the real object of the action was to establish some monopoly in the use of enamelled tins in the coffee trade.

HEWLETT V. HEPBURN AND CO.*

Master and Servant—Master's liability to servant—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897—Amount of compensation—Employment, whether continuous or not.

This was an appeal from an award of the Dartford County Court Judge under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. The only question raised was as to the amount of compensation payable. The respondent was a carpenter, who was in the employment of the appellants. On August 24, 1897, the respondent was first employed by the appellants, and he remained at work for them until February 17, 1898, being paid by the hour. His wages varied during that period. There was no agreement as to what notice was necessary to terminate the employment, but it was admitted that some notice was usually necessary. From February 17 to May 12, 1898, he was absent through illness, and on the latter date he came back to work, and remained at work until August 18, when he was again absent, from ill-health, until September 3, 1898. He then came back and remained at work until February 6, 1899, when he met with the accident in question, which caused the loss of two of his fingers and the partial loss of a third. The question was whether the employment was continuous, notwithstanding the respondent's absence through illness, in which case the compensation payable would be 12s. 9d. a week, or whether the employment was determined when the respondent was absent through illness, in which case the period of employment to be considered in assessing compensation would be from September 3, 1898, to February 6, 1899, when the weekly compensation would be 17s. 9d. No notice to terminate the employment was given, and the respondent, when he went back to work after each illness, did not go in to re-engage himself. He left his tools when he was absent at the appellants' works. He did not receive any wages when absent, and it was stated in evidence to be the regular practice, when a man recovered from illness, for him to go back to work without any application unless notice to the contrary was given. It also appeared that the foreman on several occasions during the absence of the respondent through illness asked the respondent's brother when he was coming back to work. The County Court Judge found that the employment was by the hour, and in law came to an end on August 18, 1898. He accordingly assessed the compensation at 17s. 9d. a week.

*Reported by H. B. HEMMING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

*Reported by F. G. ETCHER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. G. F. HOHLER, for the appellants, contended that there was no evidence upon which the Judge could have found that the employment came to an end on August 18, 1898. It was common ground that notice was necessary to determine the employment, and none was given here. The evidence showed that the employment was not determined by absence caused by illness, though the payment of wages ceased. The respondent left his tools at the works and came back to work without being re-engaged. Moreover, the Judge did not find that the employment had terminated in fact, but he said that in law it had terminated. There was no rule of law that illness terminated an employment. He referred to "Jones v. Ocean Coal Company" ([1899] 2 Q.B., 124) and "Appleby v. Horseley Company" ([1899] 2 Q.B., 521).

Mr. A. J. TABSELL, for the respondent, contended that the case was very similar to "Appleby v. Horseley Company." Every test mentioned in "Jones v. Ocean Coal Company" for ascertaining whether the employment had not come to an end was applicable to this case. The question was really one of fact, though the County Court Judge had spoken of it as a question of law.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that the only question in the case was whether there had, in fact, been a break in the employment of this workman. The employers said that there had been no break, their object being to get a larger divisor for calculating the workman's average weekly earnings. The workman said that there had been a break, and the County Court Judge took that view. The case was treated before the County Court Judge on the basis of the man having been absent from work through illness for 11 weeks. The only question they had to consider was whether there was evidence on which the County Court Judge could find that that absence constituted a break in the employment. In his opinion there clearly was evidence on which the County Court Judge could so find, though no doubt there was evidence the other way also. The appeal therefore failed.

No. 6.—VOL. XVI.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS said he was of the same opinion.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS said he also was of the same opinion. He wished, however, to guard against seeming to hold that there could be no continuity of work unless there was continuity of the contractual engagement.

FARLOW V. STEVENSON.*

Landlord and Tenant—Lease—Lessee's covenants.

—Covenant to pay all taxes, rates, duties, &c.

Decision of Byrne, J. (15 The Times L.R., 249), affirmed.

This was an appeal against a decision of Mr. Justice Byrne (reported in The Times of March 14 last, and in 15 The Times L.R., 249). The question raised was one of a kind which of late years has often arisen between landlords and tenants. The defendant is tenant to the plaintiffs, under a lease for seven, 14, or 21 years made in the year 1895, of a residence known as Berkeley-house, Clapham. The lease contained a clause specifying that the rent should be paid clear of all deductions except property tax, and also a covenant by the tenant "to pay and discharge all taxes, rates, duties, and assessments whatsoever which now are or hereafter may become payable for or in respect of the said premises, or any part thereof, whether Parliamentary, parochial, or otherwise (except landlord's property tax)." In November, 1897, the vestry served on the premises a notice, under section 85 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, requiring the owners to make certain structural alterations in the system of drainage. It was agreed between the parties that the work should be done by the plaintiffs without prejudice to their right (if any) under the covenant to throw the liability for its cost upon the defendant. The cost incurred was about £150. Mr. Justice Byrne said that he could not distinguish the case from "Brett v. Rogers" (13 The Times L.R., 175, and [1897] 1 Q.B., 525), and he held that the defendant had in effect covenanted to indemnify the plaintiffs, and that he must pay the £150. The defendant appealed.

Mr. Edgar Foa was for the defendant; Mr. Levett, Q.C., and Mr. Gatey, for the plaintiffs, were not called upon.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said that if any one could persuade the Court that the decision of Mr. Justice Byrne was wrong Mr. Foa would have done so by his extremely able and clear argument. But the Court must have regard to the facts and the provisions of the Acts. His Lordship could not imagine wider language than that of the covenant in the present case. The words were not the same as those which occurred in some of the decided cases, or in some of the older forms. The words were "payable in respect of the premises," and his Lordship did not see how it was possible to employ larger language. The power of the vestry to require drains to be put in order by the owner or occupier of premises, and to do it themselves if it was not done and recover the expense from the owner or occupier of the premises, was conferred by section 85 of the Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855, as modi-fixed by section 64 of the Metropolis Local Management Act, 1862. His Lordship agreed with the able argument of Mr. Foa that the word "duties" in the covenant referred to the payment of money. But he wanted to add to the word "payable" in the covenant the words "by the occupier." Apart from the authorities the language was perfectly clear, and it excluded the narrow construction which it was sought to put upon it. It was urged that the case was governed by "Tidswell v. Whitworth" (L.R., 2 C.P., 326). But the language of the covenant was much wider than it was there, and one could not help seeing that the intention was to make it wider. In every prior case in which the word "duties" had been used the decision had been against the tenant. In his Lordship's opinion the decision of Mr. Justice Byrne was quite right, and the Court would be splitting hairs if it differed from him.

The PRESIDENT of the PROBATE DIVISION agreed. He thought that "Brett v. Rogers," on which Mr. Justice Byrne had relied, was rightly decided.

LORD JUSTICE ROMER said that the covenant was peculiarly worded. The numerous cases were not easy to reconcile, and they gave rise to fine distinctions. He thought that this covenant was general and applied to taxes, &c., whether payable by the landlord or the tenant. And his Lordship thought that the word "duties" covered the sum payable in the present case.

NATIONAL TELEPHONE COMPANY (LIMITED) v.
COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE.*

Revenue—Stamp duty—Ad valorem duty—Agreement for hire of chattel in consideration of annual payment—"Bond, covenant, or instrument of any kind whatsoever"—Stamp Act, 1891, Schedule I.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (15 The Times L.R., 98) affirmed.

This appeal raised the short question whether an agreement between the appellant company and one of their customers ought to be stamped with an ordinary sixpenny agreement stamp or, as the Commissioners insisted, with an ad valorem stamp of 7s. 6d., on the ground that the agreement came within the words "Bond, covenant, or instrument of any kind whatsoever" within the meaning of the First Schedule to the Stamp Act, 1891. The Divisional Court (Mr. Justice Grantham and Mr. Justice Channell), giving judgment on December 14, 1897, followed the decision, in favour of the Commissioners, of "Jones v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue" (11 The Times L.R., 78; [1895] 1 Q.B., 484). The Court of Appeal (Lords Justices A. L. Smith, Rigby, and Collins) affirmed this order on December 9, 1898 ([1899] 1 Q.B., 250; 68 L.J., Q.B., 222). The following are the main provisions of the case stated by the Commissioners in pursuance of the Stamp Act, 1891, section 13:—On the 10th of February, 1897, an instrument, of which a copy is hereinafter set out, was presented on behalf of the National Telephone Company (Limited) (hereinafter called the appellants) by Mr. William E. L.

Gaine, the company's solicitor, to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue under the provisions of the 12th section of the Stamp Act, 1891, for the opinion of the Commissioners as to the stamp duty with which the instrument was chargeable. The following is a copy of the instrument which is upon paper headed "The South of England Telephone Company, Limited—Head Offices, 50, Old Broad-street, E.C. No. 900.

" March 9, 1886.

" The undersigned hereby agree with the South of England Telephone Company, Limited (subject to above conditions), to pay them the sum of £12 per annum yearly in advance, the first payment to be made on the first day of the month succeeding that in which the wire and apparatus are fixed on the premises of the undersigned and each subsequent payment to be made on the corresponding day in each and every following year for the use of a private wire between No. 155, North-street and the South of England Telephone Company's local exchange system in Brighton.

" Either the company or the lessee may put an end to this agreement by giving to the other three calendar months' notice in writing expiring on the day previous to the rent being due in any year. No verbal notice can be recognized.

" Signature of renter (Signed), SAMUEL RIDLEY.

" N.B.—All rentals are payable yearly in advance, and the first year's rent becomes due on the first day of the month succeeding that in which the wire and apparatus are fixed on the premises of the renter.

" Name : SAMUEL RIDLEY.

" Business or occupation : Auctioneer, valuer, and estate agent.

" Address : 155, North-street, Brighton.

" This is signed subject to an arrangement for putting a line on to the Club Middle-street."

There were 13 conditions by which the company were to maintain the wire and apparatus; the renter was to take reasonable care of the wire and was not to allow the wire to be used for money payment, and to give access to the company. The company were not to be liable for telephonic interruption, but were promptly to repair damage. There were also provisions for determining the agreement for non-payment of rent or on bankruptcy of the renter; for the surrender at the end of the agreement of the apparatus by the renter and for proper wayleaves and other matters.

Mr. ASQUITH, Q.C., and Mr. ROSKILL were for the appellants, and contended that a security must be something collateral to an agreement to come within the words "Bond, covenant, or instrument," otherwise any agreement, such as the hiring of a carriage for a month, might be chargeable with an ad valorem stamp.

The SOLICITOR-GENERAL (Sir R. B. Finlay, Q.C.), with whom was Mr. Danckwerts, was stopped by their Lordships.

The LORD CHANCELLOR moved that the appeal be dismissed with costs. It was true that this was a taxing Act and must be construed strictly. But the words had been made as comprehensive as possible and clearly included the present case. Otherwise, anybody who wished to escape taxation would choose a form of instrument by which they could do so; and could avoid executing a document under seal. But this was clearly an instrument of the character which the Legislature intended to tax on an ad valorem scale, and the judgment below must be affirmed.

The other noble and learned Lords concurred.

SMITH AND ANOTHER V. MILLS AND OTHERS.*

Landlord and Tenant—Lease—Covenant to repair —Building erected on demised land after date of lease.

The claim in this action was to recover possession of certain plots of lands and houses in Cross-road, Croydon, held under three leases, by reason of the breach of covenants to repair. One point of general interest was raised in the course of the case—viz., whether a covenant to repair contained in one of the leases applied to a building erected upon the demised land subsequently to the date of the lease. The facts material to this point were as follows:—By a lease dated September 30, 1857, the lessors demised for 99 years a piece of land "and all that messuage or tenement and garden erected and formed on the said piece of ground." A covenant (No. 1) provided that before certain dates the lessees should erect certain fences, a washhouse, and two "messuages or tenements" on the land. A covenant (No. 2) provided that the lessees "will at all times during the demise well and substantially repair, &c., . . . the said messuage or tenement and premises hereby demised and the said fences and new erections and new messuages or tenements to be erected as aforesaid, . . . and will at the expiration of this demise peaceably yield up . . . the said demised premises, fences, new erections, and new tenements . . . in good repair." A covenant (No. 3) provided:—"Further it shall be lawful for (the lessors) at all seasonable times to enter upon the said demised premises or any part thereof to examine the condition thereof and to give (the lessees) notice in writing of any defects and that (the lessees) will within three calendar months after the delivery of every such notice make good the defects specified therein." The lessees duly erected the new structures specified in covenant No. 1. At a subsequent date another building, lately used as a starch factory, which was not included in No. 1, was erected on the demised land. The landlords served notices, under covenant No. 3, to repair all the premises, including the starch factory. The question was whether the covenants to repair applied to the starch factory.

MR. ROBSON, Q.C. (Mr. Montague Lush with him), argued that even if covenant No. 2 did not apply to the factory, No. 3 must do so. The "demised premises" must mean buildings which the lessee might erect, as well as those he must erect under No. 1. The covenant to yield up in good repair would clearly apply. (He cited "Brown v. Blunden," Skinner, 121, and "Sunderland v. Newton," 3 Sim., 450.)

MR. BRAY, Q.C. (Mr. Lightwood with him), argued that both No. 2 and No. 3 applied only to the buildings contemplated by the lease—i.e., the original house and the erections to be made under No. 1. (He cited "Cornish v. Cleife," 3 H. and C., 446.)

MR. JUSTICE BIGHAM, after stating the facts, said that in his opinion the covenant No. 2 clearly referred to the house and premises on the land at the time of the demise, together with the specific erections to be made under No. 1. He had no doubt at all that the intention of the parties to the lease was to that effect. The covenant No. 3 did not carry the previous covenant any further, or throw light upon its construction. As to the undertaking to yield up the premises in good repair, whether that applied to the factory might be a question to be determined by a Judge some 50 years hence. He would give no opinion on it beyond saying that it did not seem to modify the meaning of the covenants to repair. As to the authorities that had been cited, the rule laid down in them was that where there was a general covenant to repair that must refer both to buildings erected at the date of and subsequent to the demise; but where the covenant to repair in its terms applied to certain specified buildings, it must not be extended beyond those buildings.

Company—Winding up—Examination of promoters—Time within which application must be made to discharge order for examination—Delay.

Decision of Wright, J. (ante, p. 8), affirmed.

In this case there were two appeals against two orders of Mr. Justice Wright (reported in The Times of the 2nd inst., and ante, p. 8). This company being in liquidation an order was, on May 8, 1899, made by Mr. Justice Wright in Chambers, on the ex parte application and report of the Official Receiver, for the public examination of Mr. F. G. Willett, Mr. J. W. Taylor, and others. Notice of the order was given to Mr. Willett on May 17, and some of the persons named in the order were examined on June 13. Mr. Willett's counsel attended and cross-examined. On July 26 Mr. Willett took out a summons to discharge the order for the public examination of himself. A similar application was made by Mr. Taylor. The applications were adjourned to the Judge, when the preliminary objections were taken—(a) that the application ought to have been made within 14 days from the date, at any rate, of notice of the order in accordance with the practice of the Chancery Division as to moving to discharge the order of a Judge at Chambers; (b) that by taking part in the examination Mr. Willett had precluded himself from the right to have the order discharged. Mr. Justice Wright held that the applications had been made too late. Without laying down any rigid rule he thought that such an application ought to be made within a reasonable time. On this and other grounds he dismissed the applications. Mr. Willett and Mr. Taylor appealed.

MR. Muir Mackenzie was for Mr. Willett; Mr. John O'Connor was for Mr. Taylor; the Solicitor-General (Sir R. B. Finlay, Q.C.) and Mr. Ingle Joyce were for the Official Receiver.

The preliminary objection as to time was raised again, and on this ground

The COURT dismissed the appeals.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said that such an application ought to be made with reasonable diligence, and there being no explanation of the delay, the appeals ought not to be heard.

†Reported by J. EYRE THOMPSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (14 The Times L.R., 500) affirmed.

This was an appeal involving the construction of somewhat obscure words in a charter-party. The appeal was from a decision of Lords Justices A. L. Smith and Vaughan Williams from whom Lord Justice Rigny dissented, dated August 3, 1908, and affirming the judgment of Mr. Justice Bigham, dated June 17, 1908. The case below is reported in 14 The Times L.R., 500; 3 Com. Cases, 316. The facts are thus stated by Mr. Justice Bigham in his judgment:—"By a written contract, dated December 14, 1897, the plaintiffs undertook with the defendants to provide ships for the carriage of 50,000 tons of iron ore from Seville, in Spain, to ports in the United Kingdom, and elsewhere, over a period of 12 months. The contract was drawn up upon an ordinary printed charter-party form, as used for single voyages, alterations being introduced in writing for the purpose of adapting the form to the particular contract in question. Disputes have arisen as to the meaning of the provisions in this contract, as to demurrage. Those provisions are as follows:—"Charterers or their agents to be allowed 350 tons per working day of 24 hours, weather permitting (Sundays and holidays excepted), for loading and discharging, same to be reversible, and to be averaged voyage by voyage to avoid demurrage, and to count from 6 a.m. of the day following the day when steamer is reported as the Custom-house, unless she be reported before noon, and in which case time to count from notice of readiness, and in every respect ready to load or discharge immediately, and in free pratique. Steamer to work as much of night if required, also on Sundays and holidays, such time not to count as lay days unless used." The plaintiffs contend that those words mean that the defendants are to perform the loading and discharging at the rate of 350 tons per working day, such days to be made up of periods of 24 hours, reckoned from the hour when the vessel starts the one operation or the other. The defendants, on the other hand, say that the words mean that 24 working hours are to be allowed for loading or discharging each 350 tons. The learned Judge decided in favour of the defendants—respondents in the House of Lords.

Mr. Cohen, Q.C., and Mr. Montague Lush were for the appellants; Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. Rufus Isaacs, Q.C., for the respondents.

The LORD CHANCELLOR, in moving that the appeal be dismissed with costs, said that his mind had not been free from doubt on the construction to be placed on these words, because the parties had clumsily expressed what might have been stated in precise language. But it was tolerably clear what was intended; and he thought the majority of the Judges in the Court of Appeal were right. Once the idea was realized that there was a conventional and artificial day to be manufactured out of a certain number of hours—and that there was such a day was common ground to both parties—there was an intelligible result. They wanted to keep a precise record of the time occupied. In effect, they counted a conventional day of 24 hours, which might be made up by broken portions of time in several days. Thus the number of days was to be calculated—each day being complete when 24 hours of the interrupted periods were made up. Mr. Cohen had admitted there was to be a debit and credit account in hours. His Lordship could not make out how that was to be arranged unless these broken periods were to be reckoned together. Mr. Cohen sought to confine the words to the exceptional case of night, Sundays, and holidays. But the interpretation of the Courts below was much more satisfactory. There was no such thing as an "ordinary working-day of 24 hours." The phrasing showed that the parties intended to put the periods together, and to ascertain the number of days by dividing the gross number of hours by 24. But he should be sorry to say that this instrument was a model of clearness.

LORD MACNAGHTEN was of the same opinion. This document was very awkwardly expressed; but, on the whole, he preferred the construction adopted by Mr. Justice Bigham. The difficulty seems to have arisen from the parties putting into their conventional day the same number of hours as in an ordinary day. If the working-day had been fixed at 12 hours there would have been no difficulty at all.

LORD ROBERTSON concurred.

THE HAMPTON URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL v. THE SOUTHWARK AND VICTORIA WATER COMPANY.*

Rating—Rateable value—"Land covered with water"—Reservoir of water company—Public Health Act, 1875, sec. 211, sub-s. 1 (1).

Decision of the Court of Appeal (15 The Times L.R., 96) affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal, dated December 3, 1898, affirming a decision of Mr. Justice Wright and Mr. Justice Darling, sitting as a Divisional Court, dated March 15, 1898. The respondents were the occupiers of certain property—to wit, a reservoir—within the district of the appellants in respect of which certain general district rates have been levied on the respondents as the occupiers thereof, pursuant to section 211 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and the question was whether, according to the true construction of the section, the respondents, as such occupiers, were liable to be assessed on the full net annual value of the said reservoir, as ascertained by the valuation list for the time being in force, or to be assessed in respect of the sum in the proportion of one-fourth part only of such annual value. The Public Health Act, 1875, section 211, after providing for the making and levying of general district rates on the occupier of all kinds of property for the time being by law assessable to any rate for the relief of the poor, enacted:—"(1) The . . . occupier of any land covered with water or used only as a canal or towing path for the same . . . shall be assessed in respect of the same in the proportion of one-fourth part only of such net annual value thereof." The Court of Summary Jurisdiction ordered that the respondents should pay to the appellants the sums of £97 and £40 ss. 4½, as in respect of the full net annual value of that part of the said reservoir situate within the district of the appellants. The respondents applied to the said Court to state and sign a special case for the opinion thereon of a Divisional Court. The questions for the opinion of the Court were:—"(1) Whether the reservoir is or is not 'land covered with water' within the meaning of section 211, subsection 1 (1), of the Public Health Act, 1875." "(2) Whether the appellants (the now respondents) ought to be rated in respect thereof under the said section in proportion of one-fourth part only of the net annual value of the said reservoir or upon the full net annual value thereof." The Divisional Court, Mr. Justice Wright and Mr. Justice Darling, held themselves bound by the decision of the Court in the case of Regina v. The Birmingham Water Works

Sir Edward Clarke Q.C., and Mr. H. Courthorpe Munroe were for the appellants; Mr. Cripps, Q.C., and Mr. Walter C. Ryde, for the respondents, were not heard.

The LORD CHANCELLOR, in moving that the appeal be dismissed, said that no argument had been adduced to show that the Legislature used the words "land covered with water" in any other than their natural sense, which had been attributed to them by the Courts for more than 30 years. Words would have to be added so as to make the statute run:—"land covered by water which is not made so by artificial construction." No such words had been added, and he could not understand the doubts expressed in the Divisional Court.

WOLFE V. DE BRAAM.*

Practice—Trial—Right to a jury—O. 36, r. 6.

This was an appeal from an order made by Mr. Justice Lawrance at Chambers. The action was brought by a money-lender to recover a sum of money lent with interest. On a summons taken out by the plaintiff under Order 14 for leave to sign final judgment, Mr. Justice Lawrance gave the defendant unconditional leave to defend, and directed that the case should be set down for trial in the short cause list. On a subsequent summons taken out by the defendant asking that the case might be tried by a jury, Mr. Justice Lawrance ordered that it should be tried without a jury. From this order the defendant appealed. It was stated that it was a common practice for cases in the short cause list to be tried before a jury. Reference was made to Order 36, rules 3, 4, 5, and 6, and Order 14, rules 6 and 8.

Mr. Foote, Q.C., and Mr. Scarlett appeared for the defendant; Mr. Hugo Young, Q.C., and Mr. Lowenthal for the plaintiff.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that, if Mr. Justice Lawrance meant that no case which was set down in the short cause list could be tried with a jury, in his opinion the learned Judge was wrong. He was not satisfied that the learned Judge had exercised his discretion and had come to the conclusion that this was not a fit case to be tried by a jury. He therefore thought, having regard to Order 36, rule 6, which said that in all causes or matters other than those specified in rules 3, 4, and 5, an order should be made on the application of either party for trial with a jury, that the appeal ought to be allowed and an order made for trial with a jury.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS said he was of the same opinion. If Mr. Justice Lawrance, in making the order giving the defendant leave to defend, had made it one of the terms of the order that the trial should be without a jury he would not have ventured to interfere with such a direction. But the order for leave to defend did not contain any such condition. The order with regard to a jury was made on a separate summons. He did not think that the learned Judge intended to hold that in no case put into the short cause list could there be a trial with a jury.

Decision of Kennedy, J. (15 The Times L.R., 226), affirmed.

This was an appeal by the defendants from a judgment of Mr. Justice Kennedy at the trial of an action without a jury, reported in 15 The Times L.R., 226. The action was brought to recover the sum of £69 7s. as damages for the conversion of a certain order in writing, the property of the plaintiffs, or in the alternative, for money had and received. The facts were as follows. On July 7, 1898, the Great Northern Railway Company gave to the plaintiffs, in payment of a tradesman's account, the following order in writing:—"The Great Northern Railway Company, London, July 7, 1898. The Union Bank of London (Limited), No. 2, Prince's-street, Mansion-house, E.C. Pay to J. Bavins, jun., and Sims, the sum of £69 7s. Provided the receipt form at foot hereof is duly signed, stamped, and dated. £69 7s. (Signature of secretary.) (Signature of assistant-secretary.) Received from the Great Northern Railway Company the above-named sum as per particulars furnished. This receipt is not to be detached from the cheque. Signature Dated . . . , 189." The order was crossed generally. This document was stolen from the plaintiffs, neither the endorsement nor the receipt being signed by them. The document was, on July 15, 1898, brought to the defendants' Shoreditch branch by a man who was accompanied by the husband of one of the defendants' customers, the husband being in the habit of paying in cheques to his wife's account. At the request of the cashier the receipt form was then and there stamped, filled in, signed, and dated, and the order was received by the defendants for collection. The signature was badly written and misspelt, the signature in the receipt appearing to be "J. Bavins, Trench, and Sims." The document had previously been endorsed with a similar signature. Neither signature was, in fact, the plaintiff's signature. The defendants credited the amount to their customer. On July 16 the defendants received in good faith from the Union Bank of London payment of the order, and dealt with their customer upon the footing that the sum belonged to her before they had any notice that the signatures to the receipt and endorsement were forgeries. The defendants first knew on August 13 that the signatures had been forged. Between July 16 and August 13 the defendants' customer had drawn freely upon her account, and an amount exceeding £69 7s. was drawn out by her. The defendants at the trial relied upon section 82 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, which is as follows:—"Where a banker in good faith and without negligence receives payment for a customer of a cheque crossed generally or specially to himself, and the customer has no title or a defective title thereto, the banker shall not incur any liability to the true owner of the cheque by reason only of having received such payment." Mr. Justice Kennedy held that the order was not an unconditional order for the payment of money within section 3 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, and was, therefore, not a cheque within the meaning of sections 73 and 82, and that the defendants were not protected from liability to the plaintiffs. He further held that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover not merely the value of the piece of paper, but the amount which the defendants had collected on the order. He accordingly gave judgment for the plaintiffs for the amount claimed. The learned Judge further held that, if the order was a cheque, the defendants had not been guilty of negligence. Since the judgment in the Court below a section was discovered in the Revenue Act, 1883 (46 and 57 Vict., c. 55)—namely, section 17. That section made an important alteration in the law with regard to the protection of bankers as enacted in the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, but in consequence of the alteration of the law being contained in a Revenue Act, where no one would in ordinary course look for it, the alteration, it was stated, had not been noticed in the text books upon the subject, and was not known to the plaintiffs or the defendants. That section enacts that "sections 76 to 82, both inclusive, of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 . . . shall extend to any document issued by a customer of any banker and intended to enable any person or body corporate to obtain payment from such chamber of the sum mentioned in such document, and shall so extend in like manner as if the said document were a cheque. Provided that nothing in this Act shall be deemed to render any such document a negotiable instrument." This section was now relied upon by the defendants as making this order a cheque and thus bringing the bank within the protection of section 82 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882.

Mr. Herbert Jacobs appeared for the defendants; Mr. J. F. P. Rawlinson, Q.C., and Mr. Denis O'Connor appeared for the plaintiffs.

The Court dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that the defendants could not bring themselves within the protection of section 82 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882. The document was not a cheque within the meaning of that Act, as it was a conditional order for the payment of money. Mr. Justice Kennedy, however, went on to decide that the defendants had received the payment for their customer without negligence. That was merely obiter. It was patent that the endorsement and the receipt were not signed in the same name as that of the payees. Upon the facts of this case there was clearly negligence in the defendants taking this document as they did. Since the trial a new section had been discovered—namely, section 17 of the Revenue Act, 1883, which for certain purposes must be read into section 82 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882. While enlarging the meaning of the word cheque in that section it left the condition as to negligence contained in section 82 applicable, and the defendants had still to show that they had received the document without negligence. Therefore the defendants were not protected under those sections. The matter stood thus. There had been a clear conversion of the document in getting the money from the Union Bank and placing it to the customer's credit. What damages were recoverable? Speaking for himself, he did not think it important whether the damages were in respect of trover, or whether the claim was for money had and received. The defendants had got a document by means of which they received from the Union Bank £69 7s., which otherwise they would not have received. Why should not the damages in trover be £69 7s. Clearly, however, the £69 7s. could be recovered as money had and received to the plaintiffs' use. The defendants received the money from the Union Bank, and in the following August they had notice that the plaintiffs claimed it. From that date they knew that the money belonged to the plaintiffs, and in the circumstances it was money had and received to the plaintiffs' use and could be recovered as such. It was no answer to such an action to say that the defendants as agents had paid the money to their customer as principal. They had not done so. All they had done was to credit their customer with the amount, which was merely a conditional credit, and there was no reason why they should not now debit her account with the amount which they would have to repay. There was no settled account such as debarred them from recovering the money from the customer. The judgment was therefore right.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS concurred. He said that it was not necessary to decide whether the £69 7s. could in this case be recovered as damages for the conversion, because the same end could be reached by another road, namely, by the claim for money had and received. He desired to express no opinion upon that point. Here the document was dealt with by the defendants in such a way that they received from the Union Bank its full face value, the result of their user of the document being that they received the money to the use of the plaintiffs. It was no answer that they had credited their customer with the amount, as that was only a conditional credit depending on whether the document turned out to be all right. There was no settled account between them and their customer, nor anything to debar them from recovering the sum from her.

KEMPMAN.*

Practice—Subpoena—Service—Abuse of the process of the Court—Serving subpoena prematurely.

This action was for the purpose of making an agent account for alleged secret profits. Two motions were this morning made on behalf of stockbrokers who had been subpoenaed as witnesses at the trial to discharge the writs of subpoena, on the ground that the subpoenas had been issued and served under circumstances that made the service an oppressive abuse of the process of the Court.

One motion was made on behalf of Mr. W. King Millar and his partner, Mr. Thomas Lloyd Mostyn Llewellyn, the other on behalf of Mr. Reitlinger. The applicants insisted that the subpoenas had been unreasonably served at an unreasonably early time and for a false date, and in such manner as to hamper them in their movements in an offensive way. The writs were taken out on the 12th ult. They required attendance on the 14th ult. and from day to day during the sittings. They were served on the 15th. At that date the plaintiff corporation had not only not delivered their reply, but on the 18th they obtained an order in Chambers giving them a month further time within which to deliver their reply. On the writ were endorsed the words:—"Notice will be given to you by letter or telegram when your attendance is required." Typewritten letters to the witnesses bearing the signature Slaughter and May, the plaintiffs' solicitors, were delivered with the subpoenas in the following terms:—"Referring to the subpoena which has been served upon you herein, you will of course understand that, as is stated in the memorandum endorsed on the back of the writ of subpoena, your attendance in Court will not be required until you receive notice from us to that effect. The writ as a matter of form requires your attendance on the 14th inst., the above action being in the list of actions to be taken next, but we shall advise you in due course when your attendance is necessary." There was an affidavit by the secretary of the plaintiff company to the effect that the object of serving the subpoenas so early was to keep in touch with the witnesses. A managing clerk of Messrs. Slaughter and May also made an affidavit stating that the statement that the action was in the list of actions to be heard next was an error and that the general purport of the letters sent with the subpoenas was in common form. He deposed:—"There is no foundation so far as I know for the statement that service of the subpoena was made for any other purpose than for securing the attendance of the applicants at the trial; the reason for serving them at this early stage is to get into communication with them and to prevent them leaving the country or being out of the way without the plaintiff company having had an opportunity of taking their evidence on commission or otherwise and generally to get in touch with the witness."

Mr. Vernon Smith, Q.C., and Mr. Percy Wheeler were for Messrs. Millar and Llewellyn; Mr. Henry Terrell, Q.C., and Mr. Younger for Mr. Reitlinger; and Mr. Martelli for the plaintiff company.

MR. JUSTICE NORTH commented on the impossibility of the action being set down for trial this sitting, and the fact that the force of the subpoena expired at the end of the sitting; he read part of the evidence on the part of the plaintiffs, which he said plainly showed that the object of the plaintiffs in taking out and serving the writs at so early a time was to keep control over the witnesses, so that they should not go away without the leave of the plaintiffs, and if they wished to go away should only do so on terms. His Lordship did not intend to lay down an exact rule as to the earliest time at which a subpoena to attend can properly be served; but in his opinion in this case service had been made with a purpose and when the parties must have known perfectly well that the action could not possibly be tried during the present sittings. He must allow the motion with costs.

Husband and Wife—Wife's torts—Husband's liability.

His Lordship delivered judgment in the above action, a report of which appeared in The Times of Monday, November 27. The plaintiff, a widow, living near Andover, at the request of the defendant, Mrs. Georgiana Howard Kingscote, had consented to find £2,000 to pay for certain shares to be bought by Mrs. Kingscote for the joint benefit of the plaintiff and herself. Subsequently, Mrs. Kingscote telegraphed to the plaintiff that she had bought the shares, and the plaintiff sent bills for the £2,000, which were discounted and the proceeds paid to Mrs. Kingscote. The present action having been brought by the plaintiff to protect her interests in the shares, Mrs. Kingscote, in opposition to a motion by the plaintiff for interim relief, swore an affidavit alleging that she had never purchased any shares with the £2,000. The plaintiff stated that she had been induced by the false and fraudulent representations, that the shares had been purchased, to advance the £2,000. Whilst the motion was pending £500 had been paid to the plaintiff on account. It was at the trial of the action consented, on behalf of Mrs. Kingscote, that judgment should be given against her for £1,500 and costs. The plaintiff, however, also claimed to recover judgment against Mrs. Kingscote's husband, the defendant, Colonel Howard Kingscote, on the ground that a husband was by the common law answerable for the torts and frauds of his wife, notwithstanding the disabilities of coverture. It was argued on behalf of the husband that the cause of action was connected with and the means of "effecting a contract" and therefore that the husband was exempted from all liability—"Liverpool Adelphi Loan Association v. Fairhurst" (9 Exch., 422, p. 429).

Mr. Levett, Q.C., and Mr. W. Baker appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Whately for Mrs. Howard Kingscote; and Mr. Latham, Q.C., and Mr. Elgood for Colonel Kingscote.

MR. JUSTICE BYRNE, after referring to the cases of "Liverpool Adelphi Loan Association v. Fairhurst" (9 Exch., 422, at p. 429) and "Wright v. Leonard" (11 C.B., N.S., 258), said that he was of opinion that the cases in which the husband was to be held exempt from his common law liability for his wife's torts must be limited to cases in which the fraud was not only directly connected with the contract and parcel of the same transaction, but was also the means of effecting (in the sense of obtaining) the contract, and that, without disregarding the observations of Chief Justice Erle in "Wright v. Leonard," he ought to follow the clearly expressed view of Mr. Justice Willes and Mr. Justice Williams, and avoid infringing further upon the general law than was justified by the authority of "The Liverpool Association v. Fairhurst." In the present case the contract was effected prior to, and independently of, the fraud complained of, and he found himself unable to say that such fraud was the means of "effecting the contract" in the sense in which that expression was, in his opinion, used in the judgment in the "Liverpool Association v. Fairhurst." It therefore followed that he considered that the defendant Colonel Howard Kingscote was liable in damages for the tort complained of. His Lordship therefore held that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment against Mrs. Howard Kingscote's husband for £1,500 and costs.

RAMAGE V. WOMACK.*

Landlord and Tenant—Lease—Covenant to repair—Wife of deceased tenant—Liability.

In this case Mr. R. G. Glenn appeared for the plaintiff, and Mr. H. F. Manisty for the defendant.

This was an issue directed to be tried by the Master in Chambers, the following facts being admitted. The defendant, Mrs. Sarah Womack, was married before 1878. On April 17, 1878, the trustees of the will of Mary Murray leased to James S. Womack, the defendant's husband, Nos. 26 and 27, Portman-street for 21 years. The lease purported to be in consideration of £900 paid by the defendant out of moneys belonging to her for her separate estate and also of rent reserved, "and of the covenants and agreements hereinafter contained on the part of the said J. S. Womack (the husband), his executors, administrators, and assigns to be paid, observed, and performed." The final clause of the lease declared that J. S. Womack would hold the premises in trust for Sarah Womack as part of her separate estate. Mrs. Womack is described in the lease as a Court milliner and dressmaker, and intended to use the premises for business purposes, and it was admitted that she had, from the first, paid the rent and done the repairs. Mr. Womack died in 1893 intestate, and no letters of administration were ever taken out. Action was now being brought for damages for breach of covenant to repair, and the issue directed to be tried was whether Mrs. Womack was bound by the covenants in the lease. The question was argued on two occasions before Mr. Justice Wright.

*Reported by R. B. SCHOMBERG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

*Reported by H. G. SNOWDEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

His LORDSHIP, after stating the facts of the case, proceeded:—The only question which it is open for me now to decide is whether on these materials alone, including of course any necessary inferences from the admitted facts, it can be seen that the plaintiff is entitled to succeed. There is no allegation in the writ, nor any admission of fact, that a new contract of tenancy on the terms of the lease to Mr. Womack was made expressly or otherwise between the plaintiff and Mrs. Womack, or that she became executrix de son tort of her husband in respect of this lease or otherwise. In the absence of any such allegation or admission, I must consider that the plaintiff's claim is at present based simply on the ground that Mrs. Womack always had the beneficial interest in the lease and always occupied under it, as it was intended she should do, and paid the rent and performed the covenants which her husband or his estate was liable to pay and perform. In other words, I must take it that she neither was originally liable as lessee, unless the lease itself made her liable, nor after her husband's death became tenant on the terms of the lease. This being the case, there is no legal contract of tenancy shown between her and the plaintiff, nor any contract by which she became legally bound by the covenants in the lease. Her liability, if any, must be an equitable liability depending upon her beneficial interest alone or coupled with the fact of occupation. It seems to me to be settled by two decisions of an Appellate Court—"Walters v. Northern Coal Mining Co." [1855] (5 De G. M. and G., 629), and "Cox v. Bishop" [1857] (8 De G. M. and G., 815)—that there is no such equitable liability even where possession has been taken by an equitable assignee or by a cestui que trust who has agreed with his trustee to take over the lease and has entered under the agreement, and that the covenants of the trustee or assignor ordinarily bind the beneficiary or equitable assignee, so as to render him liable to an action on the covenants only when there is a privity of contract between him and the original lessor. Nor can the equitable assignee be compelled by the landlord to take a legal assignment of the lease although the assignee has entered and paid rent ("Moore v. Grey" [1848] 2 De G. and Sm. 304). In "Wright v. Pitt" [1870] (12 Eq., 408) Vice-Chancellor Malins indeed held that the equitable assignee of a mining lease must account for the royalty or share of the value of the minerals got by him, as if he had been tenant under the lease, but this decision cannot affect the decisions of the superior Court, and may be supported on grounds consistent with those decisions, the grant of the minerals being regarded as limited or conditional on the payment of the royalty. Nor does it appear to me to make any difference that in the lease itself the lessee declares himself to hold the lease as trustee for his wife. He does not purport to covenant for her, but for himself. If such a declaration has now the effect of making her liable to an action on his covenants, it must from the first have had that effect except for the fact of her coverture. But it seems plain that the intention of the deed is that his covenant and his interest in the lease are accepted as the sole security for the repairs and this for the very reason that she could not be effectually made liable. Nor does the principle on which "Castellan v. Hodson" [1870] (10 Eq., 47) was decided appear to help the plaintiff's contention. None of the parties here stand in the same relation to each other as in that case, which was one of indemnity, not of covenant; and the husband in the present case could not have sued his wife. This very distinction is taken in "Cox v. Bishop," by Lord Justice Turner, who points out that the obligation as between the assignor and assignees to indemnify does not affect the relation between the lessor and the assignee. Moreover in "Castellan v. Hodson" that judgment turned on the consideration that the man of straw might be eliminated because he was a bare trustee. But in this case the husband was not a bare trustee, but was the party intended to be made liable on the covenants. The result is that on the allegations and materials before me I am not able to say that the action can be maintained. But upon further evidence and upon a proper claim the plaintiff may be able to show that the payments of rent by Mrs. Womack since her husband's death have been made and accepted under such circumstances that the proper inference is that she herself became tenant at law on the terms of the case. See "Buckworth v. Simpson" [1835] (1 C.M. and R., 834). Or it may appear that she paid the rent, or dealt with, or occupied under the lease, in such a way as to necessitate or justify the legal inference that she became executrix de son tort. In either of these cases she may be personally liable, though not necessarily to the same extent or in the same way. I am not at present in a position to find the facts or to draw the inference necessary for determining her position. I can only direct the mode in which the facts are to be ascertained. His Lordship then directed that the issues of facts should be tried with pleadings, without a jury, and that the costs of this argument should be defendant's costs in the cause.

HENSEY V. WHITE.*

Master and Servant—Master's liability to servant
—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897—"Accident," what is—Death caused by disease.

This was an appeal from the decision of the County Court Judge of Bedford (Judge Bagshawe, Q.C.) in proceedings to assess compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. The only question was whether the death of the workman was caused by an accident, the Act only applying where there was personal injury by accident to a workman. The appellant was the widow of a cabinetmaker named Charles Hensey, who at the time of his death was in the employment of the respondent. It appeared that the workmen had to begin their work in the morning by starting a gas engine. Upon the first day after the Christmas holidays, 1898, when the workmen resumed work, Hensey and three other men proceeded to light the gas in the engine and to start the engine. In order to start the engine it was necessary to turn a large wheel. Hensey proceeded to attempt to hoist the wheel, the three other men pulling it down on the other side. Owing to the lapse of time since the engine was last used, air had got into the engine, and the wheel would not move at first. The men made a second attempt and they succeeded in moving the wheel, when Hensey suddenly put his hand to his stomach and left the place. He was found immediately afterwards vomiting blood, and he bled to death. Death was caused by rupture of the small blood vessels of the stomach and intestines. The deceased man had been employed on the work for several years. A post-mortem examination was made, and the medical evidence showed that the deceased man had been suffering from chronic indigestion, which had weakened the blood vessels of the stomach and intestines, and there was evidence of congestion and inflammation. Two of the doctors gave it as their opinion that the rupture of the blood vessels was caused by the strain, whereas another doctor stated his opinion that the strain apart from the disease did not cause the blood vessels to give way, and that, in his opinion, hæmorrhage of the stomach could not result from strain without disease. The County Court Judge found that to make it an accident there must be something happening beyond the mere fact of a disease suddenly taking a fatal turn—e.g., some break in the machinery, some fall of the workman, or something else out of the ordinary and normal course of the workman's employment. It was not enough that ordinary hard work, carried on by the workman in the manner intended, had, as he worked, suddenly caused his disease to take a fatal form. He found as a fact that the deceased man had been long suffering from chronic inflammation of the internal coat of the stomach, caused or accompanied by congestion of the numerous small blood vessels in that coat, that there was an exudation of blood from the stomach which caused death, and that this was the result of the congestion and chronic inflammation of the stomach, and would not have happened without it. He accordingly decided in favour of the respondent.

Mr. MONTAGUE SHEARMAN, for the appellant, contended that the actual and immediate cause which produced death could alone be looked at. The predisposing cause of death could not be looked at. The County Court Judge really only found that without the disease the strain would not have caused death. That was not a finding that the disease was the proximate cause of the death. The strain was the proximate cause, and that was an accident. He referred to "Winspear v. Accident Insurance Company" (6 Q.B.D., 42); "Lawrence v. Accidental Insurance Company" (7 Q.B.D., 216); "Hamlyn v. Crown Accidental Insurance Company" ([1893] 1 Q.B., 750).

Mr. E. Morten, for the respondent, was not called upon.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that the question was whether, upon the findings of the County Court Judge, the death of the workman was caused by accident. The man was at his ordinary work and the wheel of the gas engine had to be started. The wheel happened to be rather stiff, and there was some difficulty in starting it. When attempting to start the wheel the deceased man suddenly put his hand to his stomach and left the place, and he died from the bursting of blood vessels in his stomach. Upon the post-mortem examination it was found that the stomach was not at all in a sound condition. Medical evidence was given on both sides as to the man's condition, and the Judge upon the evidence found that the death was caused by disease, and that the rupture of the blood vessels was probably caused by the man's ordinary work, though upon the occasion in question the work was a little more arduous than usual. The Judge came to the conclusion that the disease and not an accident caused the death. They could not interfere with that finding of fact. The present case in no way infringed upon any of the cases cited. The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS concurred. It was clear on the findings of the County Court Judge that the element of accident was entirely wanting. The injury arose in the ordinary course of the deceased man's work, though there might have been a little more exertion used by him in that work on the occasion in question than was usual. In "Pandorf v. Hamilton" (12 App. Cas., 518, at p. 524) Lord Halsbury said that he thought that the idea of something fortuitous and unexpected was involved in the word "accident." That element was wanting in the present case. In the cases which had been cited a fortuitous and unexpected element existed which was the proximate and ultimate cause of death.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS concurred.

LLOYD V. SUGG AND CO. (LIMITED).*

—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897—Accident.

This was an appeal from the decision of the Westminster County Court Judge (Judge Lumley Smith, Q.C.) in proceedings to assess compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. The respondent, George Lloyd, was a smith in the employment of the appellants at their engineering works at Westminster. The respondent was at the time of the accident holding a flatter on the anvil for another workman, called a hammerer, to strike the flat end of the flatter, when the hammerer by accident struck the rod or round part of the flatter and jarred the respondent's hand. In consequence the hand became swollen, and gout in the hand was brought on. The doctor who attended the respondent, and who was called as a witness by the appellants, said that he had attended the respondent previously to the accident for gout in the hand and elbow, that the respondent had gouty diathesis, and that he thought the swollen hand was caused by gout brought on by the jar. The doctor's certificate stated that the respondent was suffering from a weak hand caused partially by the injury. The County Court Judge awarded the respondent 15s. a week, stating that the respondent came within the Act.

Mr. SPENCER BOWER, for the appellants, contended that the injury to the hand was not caused by the accident. There was no evidence that the injury was solely caused by the accident. The gout was the cause of the swollen hand.

Mr. Duckworth, for the respondent, was not called upon. The COURT dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that he desired to say that, as these appeals were solely upon questions of law and not upon questions of fact, it would be a great assistance to the Court if County Court Judges would certify particularly what their findings of fact were. In the present case the County Court Judge had only reported at the end of his notes that he awarded the respondent 15s. a week, but the Court were told that he further said that the respondent came within the Act. The point now taken was that there was no evidence that the injury was solely caused by the accident. The evidence showed that the mis-hit by the hammerer jarred the respondent's hand. That mis-hit was an accident, and if it had broken the hand the case would have admittedly been within the Act. It was said that the injury to the hand was caused by the gout and not by the accident. The doctor's certificate stated that the respondent was suffering from a weak hand caused partially by the injury. Any one might have a weak hand. Was it to be said that in such a case as this only those with cast-iron hands came within the Act? The present case seemed to him to be a perfectly clear case. The injury to the hand was caused by an accident, and the Act applied.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS concurred. The case was a clear one. There was a jar to the workman's hand brought about by the hammerer hitting the rod and not the flat end of the flatter. The essential element of an accident causing injury existed. The Court must assume that the County Court Judge decided every question of fact necessary to support his decision in favour of the workman. It was urged in effect that the injury supervening upon the jar would not have been nearly so great had it not been for the gout. That seemed to him to be immaterial. There was the accident and the consequent injury, and the extent of the injury must depend upon the condition or the constitution of the person injured at the time of the accident. The principle always followed in cases where compensation had to be assessed for personal injuries caused by negligence, so far as related to the causes contributing to the disability, must be applied in cases under the Act of 1897. Take, for instance, the case of a delicate lady receiving a shock in a railway accident. The injury would be much greater to her than in the case of a lady in perfect health. In each case the Court had to deal with the then existing condition of the injured person to arrive at the ultimate result.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS agreed.

LYLE SHIPPING COMPANY V. CORPORATION OF CARDIFF, CHURCHILL AND SIM THIRD PARTIES.*

Shipping—Charter-party—Demurrage—Construction of charter-party—Ship to be discharged "with all despatch as customary"—Insufficient supply of railway trucks.

This was an action brought by the plaintiffs to recover from the defendants damages for the detention of the ship Cape Wrath during the discharge of a cargo of jarrah wood at Cardiff. The defendants were sued as endorsee of the bill of lading who had taken delivery of the cargo. The defendants, by a contract dated May 30, 1899, had bought a large quantity of jarrah wood from Churchill and Sim, the third parties, of which the Cape Wrath's cargo was an instalment: they claimed an indemnity from the third parties under a clause in the contract of sale, against the claims of the plaintiffs. The charter-party which was incorporated by the bill of lading contained the following clause:—"The ship to be discharged with all despatch as customary, weather permitting." There was, in fact, considerable delay in the discharge at Cardiff owing to an insufficient supply of railway trucks alongside the ship. The chief point of importance raised in the case was whether the defendants, who had contracted with the Great Western Railway Company for the supply of trucks for the discharge, were liable to the plaintiffs for the delay consequent upon the insufficient supply. The facts on which this point was decided appear sufficiently from the judgment. The following cases, in addition to those cited in the judgment, were discussed:—"Castle-gate Company v. Dempsey" ([1892] 1 Q.B., 854); "Good v. Isaacs" ([1892] 2 Q.B., 555); "Kruuse v. Drynan" (18 Sess. Cas., 4th series 1,110); Carver on Carriage by Sea, sections 619, 619a.

Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. D. C. Leck appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Rufus Isaacs, Q.C., and Mr. Bailhache for the defendants; Mr. Carver, Q.C., Mr. Scrutton, and Mr. Mackinnon for the third parties.

MR. JUSTICE BIGHAM said that the defendants were charged with a breach of their contract "to discharge the ship with all despatch as customary." The ship had loaded her cargo of jarrah wood at Fremantle. There was a considerable delay in loading, and there arose a large claim for demurrage upon that. She arrived at Cardiff on October 2, and the discharge began the next day. It did not finish until November 23—i.e., a lapse of 45 working days, and it was alleged that this delay was due to an insufficient supply, on the part of the defendants, of trucks to receive the cargo. He was satisfied that the defendants were not personally guilty of any neglect in the matter. By contracting with the Great Western Railway Company they had done their best to get trucks, and, so far as they were concerned, they had made the best use they could of the trucks so obtained. That there was, in fact, an insufficient supply of trucks alongside the ship was due to the great pressure of traffic at that time upon that railway company and all other railway companies. It was argued for the plaintiffs that, if the defendants by reason of this pressure of traffic could not get more wagons, that was a misfortune the result of which ought to fall upon the defendants rather than the plaintiffs. This involved the question of the true meaning of an undertaking to "discharge with all despatch as customary," and to arrive at that meaning a number of cases had been cited. In "Wright v. New Zealand Shipping Company" (4 Ex. D., 165) the obligation of the charterers was to discharge into lighters, and, though the charterers procured all the lighters they could, they were held liable for not supplying a sufficiency of lighters. That case had been explained by Lord Herschell in "Hick v. Raymond" ([1893] A.C., 22), on the ground that the charterers had not done their best. His Lordship did not agree with that explanation of Lord Herschell's. He thought that in "Wright v. New Zealand Company" the charterers did their best, but, having given an unqualified undertaking to provide lighters, they were bound to provide them. That was a sufficient ground for distinguishing "Wright v. New Zealand Company" from the later cases, such as "Postlethwaite v. Freeland" (5 App. Cas., 599). In those cases the words "as customary" were added, and those words made all the difference. They meant that attention must be paid to the rules of the port as to discharge, the practice of the port as to the appliances to be used, and also the practice as to the source from which such appliances are to be obtained. Applying those considerations to the present case, he found that the practice of the port of Cardiff was to discharge into railway wagons, and to procure such wagons from one railway company. The principle of "Postlethwaite v. Freeland" was directly applicable to the case. There was also a Scotch case—"Wyllie v. Harrison" (13 Sess. Cas., fourth series, p. 92)—which was almost exactly on all fours with the present case. Every word of the judgment of the Lord Justice Clerk would apply to this case; though it should be added that his Lordship appeared to consider, as several English Judges had done, that the addition of the words "as customary" did not distinguish the principle of "Postlethwaite v. Freeland" from that of "Wright v. New Zealand Company." In the present case the facts were that the defendants had done their best to obtain the customary appliances for discharge, in the customary manner, and, having done their best to obtain those appliances, they had done their best to make use of them. Upon this point there must be judgment for the defendants. Upon another point—viz., whether the plaintiffs could recover damages for four days' detention, during which no work was done, because they (the plaintiffs) were exercising a lien under the charter-party for demurrage incurred during loading at Fremantle, N.Z.—there would be judgment for the plaintiffs against defendants for £70, and for defendants against the third parties for the same amount, all parties paying their own costs.

SWAYNE V. COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE.*

Decision of the Divisional Court (15 The Times L.R., 133) affirmed.

This was an appeal by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue from the judgment of the Divisional Court (Mr. Justice Wills and Mr. Justice Bruce) upon a case stated under section 13 of the Stamp Act, 1891, on appeal from the Commissioners' decision as to stamp duty on an instrument; reported in 15 The Times L.R., 133; [1899] 1 Q.B., 335. The question was whether upon the sale of one or more houses out of a larger number, for the whole of which one rent was payable under the original lease, the capitalized value of the apportioned part of the rent was to be added to the premium to make up the ad valorem duty payable. The facts as stated in the judgment of the Court below were as follows:—In this case one Rowell, by an indenture of lease bearing date October 16, 1893, demised to one Mills a parcel of ground and three dwelling-houses then in course of erection thereon for a term of 99 years at the yearly rent of £3 16s. 6d., and by the said indenture Mills covenanted to complete the three houses and expend on the building of each of such houses the sum of £100 at the least, and he also entered into numerous other stringent covenants such as are often inserted in what are known as building leases. The three houses were erected and were numbered 6, 7, and 8, Bowden-hill-terrace. Rowell, by another indenture of lease bearing date March 10, 1894, demised to Mills a parcel of ground and two dwelling-houses then in course of erection thereon for a term of 99 years at the yearly rent of £2 11s. The covenants in this indenture were similar to the covenants in the indenture of October 16, 1893. The two houses were erected and were numbered 9 and 10, Bowden-hill-terrace. By an indenture bearing date December 27, 1897, made between Mills of the one part and Annie Penelope Swayne (the present respondent) of the other part, Mills, in consideration of the sum of £503 paid to him by the said Annie Penelope Swayne, assigned and conveyed unto the said A. P. Swayne—first, the two houses 7 and 8, Bowden-hill-terrace, being two of the three houses demised by the indenture of October 16, 1893, and, secondly, the two houses 9 and 10, Bowden-hill-terrace, being the two houses demised by the indenture of March 10, 1894, to hold the same unto the said

A. P. Swayne for the residue then unexpired of the said several terms of 99 years, subject as to the hereditaments first thereinbefore described to the apportioned yearly rent of £2 11s., part of the yearly rent of £3 16s. 6d. reserved by the indenture of October 16, 1893, and to the observance and performance of the covenants and conditions therein contained, and subject as to the hereditaments secondly thereinbefore described to the payment of the yearly rent of £2 11s. reserved by the indenture of March 10, 1894, and to the observance and performance of the covenants and conditions therein contained. A. P. Swayne covenanted with Mills to pay the several sums of £2 11s., and to observe and perform the covenants and conditions in the said leases to Mills respectively contained and to keep Mills indemnified, and Mills covenanted with A. P. Swayne to pay the apportioned rent of £15s. 6d., the residue of the rent reserved by the indenture of October 16, 1893. The question was what was the amount of stamp duty to which the indenture of December 27, 1897, was subject. The Commissioners were of opinion that the instrument was chargeable under the head "Conveyance on Sale" in Schedule I. to the Stamp Act, 1891. In accordance with their practice they did not assess duty upon the capitalized value of the yearly rent of £2 11s. payable in respect of the houses numbered 9 and 10, Bowden-hill-terrace. They were of opinion, however, that duty was chargeable upon the rent of the same amount payable in respect of the houses 7 and 8, Bowden-hill-terrace, as it was part of the consideration for the conveyance, and they assessed duty upon the said sum multiplied by 20 under section 56, subsection 2, of the Stamp Act, 1891. They also assessed duty upon the sum of £503, the premium payable under the instrument, which was stamped in accordance with their assessment. The questions for the opinion of the Court were (1) whether the indenture of December 27, 1897, was chargeable with the duty in accordance with the assessment of the Commissioners; (2) if not, with what duty the indenture was chargeable. The Divisional Court held that, for the purpose of fixing the ad valorem duty, the payment of rent by the assignee was not part of the consideration for the assignment, and that duty was chargeable upon the £503 only. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue appealed. By section 57 of the Stamp Act, 1891, "Where any property is conveyed to any person in consideration, wholly or in part, of any debt due to him, or subject either certainly or contingently to the payment or transfer of any money or stock, whether being or constituting a charge or incumbrance upon the property or not, the debt, money, or stock is to be deemed the whole or part, as the case may be, of the consideration in respect whereof the conveyance is chargeable with ad valorem duty."

The Solicitor-General (Sir R. B. Finlay, Q.C.) and Mr. Danckwerts appeared for the Commissioners.

Mr. Vaughan Hawkins, for the respondent, was not called upon.

The Court dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that in his opinion the judgment appealed from was perfectly correct. The rent of 9 and 10, Bowden-hill-terrace was £2 11s., and the rent of 6, 7, and 8, Bowden-hill-terrace was £3 16s. 6d. By the indenture of December 27, 1897, two of these latter houses, Nos. 7 and 8, were assigned to the respondent subject to the yearly rent of £2 11s., and Nos. 9 and 10 were also assigned to her subject to the payment of £2 11s. rent. The £2 11s. rent in respect of Nos. 7 and 8 was a proper apportionment of the £3 16s. 6d. rent. What was the stamp duty payable? As to Nos. 9 and 10 the Commissioners, according to their practice, did not assess the duty upon the capitalized value of the yearly rent of £2 11s. payable in respect thereof. For the reasons given by Mr.

*Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Justice Bruce in the Court below he agreed with that view. Then as to the apportioned rent of £2 11s. payable in respect of Nos. 7 and 8, once it was seen that the liability to pay rent was inherent in the thing demised, he could not see the difference between the case of Nos. 9 and 10 and the case of Nos. 7 and 8, where the rent was apportioned by the parties. He agreed entirely with the reasons given by Mr. Justice Bruce in the Court below.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS said that he entirely agreed for the reasons so well stated in the Court below, which he could not improve upon.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS agreed.

KNIGHTS DEEP (LIMITED) V. COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE.*

Revenue—Stamp duty—Debentures—Amount secured—"Marketable security"—Stamp Act, 1891, Sched. I.

A £100 debenture redeemable, at the company's option, on a future date at £103, held to be a security for the former sum only within the Stamp Act, 1891, Sched. I.

Decision of the Divisional Court (15 The Times L.R., 121) reversed.

This was an appeal from the judgment of the Divisional Court Mr. Justice Wills and Mr. Justice Bruce) on a case stated by the Commissioner of Inland Revenue under section 13 of the Stamp Act, 1891, as to the stamp to be placed on a debenture: reported in 13 The Times L.R., 121; [1899] 1 Q.B., 343. The debenture contained these particulars:—Share capital £350,000, divided into 350,000 shares of £1 each. Issue of 40,000 debentures of £100 each, carrying interest at the rate of £3 10s. per cent. per annum. The debenture contained a promise by the Knights Deep (Limited) to pay to the Simmer and Jack Proprietary Mines (Limited), or other the registered holder for the time being, subject to the conditions endorsed thereon, the sum of £100, and to pay interest thereon at the rate of £3 10s. per cent. per annum. The debenture was one of a series for securing £400,000. By Clause 3 of the conditions debentures of the nominal value of £36,600 would be redeemed by the company on July 1, 1902, and on each succeeding July 1 up to and including July 1, 1917, when the balance then outstanding would be redeemed. The important clause was Clause 17, which was as follows:—"The company may at any time after July 1, 1900, redeem this debenture at £103 on giving six calendar months' previous notice. . . . Upon the expiration of such notice the said sum of £103 shall become payable as if the same was the amount of the principal moneys hereby secured and shall thereupon cease to carry interest. Provided always that the company shall not be at liberty to give such notice unless concurrently it shall give due notice to redeem in like manner all the then outstanding debentures of the said series." The appellants were a foreign company, and the debenture was made and issued by them in the United Kingdom and was capable of being sold in a stock market in the United Kingdom. The debenture was chargeable under Schedule I, Division B, of the Stamp Act, 1891, as a "marketable security . . . (B) being a security not transferable by delivery. . . . For or in respect of the money thereby secured: the same ad valorem duty according to the nature of the security as upon a mortgage." The Commissioners, being of opinion that the money secured was the sum of £103, assessed the document as liable to a duty of 3s. 9d., being the duty payable on a mortgage of that amount. The appellants contended that the money secured was £100 only, in which case the duty would be 2s. 6d. The Divisional Court held that the ad valorem duty was chargeable upon the full sum of £103, as being the money secured by the debenture. The company appealed.

MR. JOSEPH WALTON, Q.C., and MR. SCRUTTON, for the appellants, contended that the "money secured" by the debenture was £100 and no more. Until July, 1900, no more could possibly become payable. The premium of £3 which the company would have to pay if they exercised the option to redeem the debentures at £103 was a price paid for the privilege of redeeming. The dictum of Lord Justice (then Mr. Justice) Vaughan Williams in "Rowell v. Inland Revenue Commissioners" ([1897] 2 Q.B., 194, at p. 198) completely covered the present case. They also referred to "Barker v. Smark" (7 M. and W., 590).

THE SOLICITOR-GENERAL (Sir R. B. Finlay, Q.C., and Mr. DANCKWERTS, for the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, contended that by the terms of this debenture, in the event of the notice to redeem at £103 being given, the debenture gave a charge for that sum. It was not a mere option to redeem at a premium where no charge was given for the full sum, as was the case contemplated by Lord Justice Vaughan Williams in "Rowell v. Inland Revenue Commissioners." Money secured on a contingency was chargeable. "Dixon v. Chas" (1 B. and Ad., 343); "Canning v. Raper" (1 E. and B., 164); "Maxwell's Case" (4 Court of Sess. Chas., 3rd series, 1121).

The COURT allowed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that the sole point was whether or not this debenture was, within the meaning of the Stamp Act, 1891, a security for £103 or for £100. Upon the face of the document the debenture was for £100 and no more. Then by Clause 17 of the conditions endorsed on the debenture the company had the option, if they chose, of paying off the debentures at any time after July 1, 1900—that was to say, two years at least before the time stipulated in the debentures. In his opinion the debenture secured the sum of £100, not £103, because the obligors need never, except of their own will and pleasure, give notice to redeem the debentures at £103. In his opinion the decision of the Divisional Court in "Rowell v. Inland Revenue Commissioners" was right. There a company had issued debentures of £100 each, each debenture containing an undertaking by the company to pay to the holder upon a specified date the sum of £100, together with a premium of £7 10s. thereon. The Court held that each debenture was a security for £107 10s. In the present case Mr. Justice Wills said in the Court below [1899] 1 Q.B., at p. 351 that "if there were no absolute covenant to pay the £3 in a certain event, but only a stipulation that if the company chose to pay the £3 they were to have the privilege of paying off the principal should they be called upon to do so, the case would be different." With all respect to the learned Judge, that passage exactly described the present case. The sum secured was therefore £100, and the duty chargeable was only 2s. 6d.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS concurred. Though they were differing from the result arrived at in the Court below, in his view they were really giving effect to the opinion of Mr. Justice Wills as expressed in the passage read from his judgment by Lord Justice A. L. Smith. Therefore he (the Lord Justice) claimed the authority of Mr. Justice Wills in support of the judgment they were now pronouncing, because when the case was stripped of the fringe in the nature of machinery there was merely a stipulation that if the company chose to pay the £3 they were to have the privilege of paying off the principal at a certain date. It was true that before the company could exercise the option of redeeming the debentures at £103 they must conform to certain formalities. But whether they conformed to those formalities or not was in their exclusive option. Simply stated, the £3 was a liquidated sum which the company undertook to pay if they thought it worth their while to pay off the debentures before the due date, and thereby to deprive the debenture-holders of the right to receive the interest thereon up to that date. A bond could not be said to be a security for something which was only payable at the option of the obligor.

DE BRAAM V. FORD.*

Bill of Sale—Validity—Form in schedule of Act —Stipulated time for payment.

A bill of sale stipulated that the principal sum secured should be repaid "on or before 1st Nov., 1899"; held that it was substantially in accordance with the statutory form, and was valid.

Decision of North, J. (ante, p. 39), reversed.

This was an appeal against a decision of Mr. Justice North (reported ante, p. 39). The question raised was upon the construction of section 9 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, which provides that "a bill of sale made or given by way of security for the payment of money by the grantor thereof shall be void, unless made in accordance with the form in the schedule to this Act annexed." The form given in the schedule contains (inter alia) the following clauses:—"And the said A. B. doth further agree and declare that he will duly pay to the said C. D. the principal sum aforesaid, together with the interest then due, by equal payments of £— on the — day of — [or whatever else may be the stipulated times or time of payment]. And the said A. B. doth also agree with the said C. D. that he will [here insert terms as to insurance, payment of rent, or otherwise, which the parties may agree to for the maintenance or defeasance of the security]." The plaintiff, Jean André de Braam, had borrowed money from the defendant, a money-lender, of Cork-street. The borrower and his wife gave to the lender a bill of sale of some furniture. It was thereby agreed that payment of the principal sum secured should be made "on or before the first day of November, 1899." The money secured was not paid, and the defendant was taking steps to realize. The plaintiff by this action claimed a declaration that the bill of sale was void, and an injunction to restrain the defendant from removing or seizing the furniture. The plaintiff applied for an interim injunction. Mr. Justice North was of opinion that an agreement to pay on or before a named day was an agreement to pay at an uncertain time, and consequently that the bill of sale was not in accordance with the statutory form and was void. He therefore granted an interlocutory injunction. The defendant appealed.

Mr. Herbert Reed, Q.C., and Mr. Thorn Drury were for the defendant; Mr. E. C. Macnaghten, Q.C., and Mr. Stewart Smith were for the plaintiff.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said that in this case the Court had to do that which they seldom did—viz., to attend to form, not to substance. They were driven to that by section 9 of the Act. It was plain enough that this bill of sale was not in the statutory form; the question was whether it was "in accordance" with that form. This was an old difficulty which had puzzled the Court before. What was meant by "in accordance" with? His Lordship could only take the meaning from what was said by the House of Lords in "Simmonds v. Woodward" ([1892] A.C., 100). There Lord Halsbury said, at p. 108, "If the bill of sale in substance performs the function which the statute intended to be performed by that form, it appears to me that it is complied with." It was obvious from the form that the time for the "payment" of the debt must be fixed. What was the meaning of "payment"? In his Lordship's opinion it meant the time at which payment was to become obligatory—the time at which the borrower must pay or he could be sued for the debt. The time at which the obligation to pay was to arise must be defined in the bill of sale. It had been decided in previous cases that if that time was not distinctly fixed—e. g., if the money was made payable on demand, the bill of sale would be void. The Court were now asked to stretch those decisions, and to say that, although a time for payment was fixed, yet the bill of sale was void because the grantor had stipulated that he might pay off the money sooner. This was a rather startling proposition. But look at the matter a little more closely. Suppose there had been a covenant to pay the money on a fixed day, with an added proviso that the grantor should have an option to pay it sooner. That would have been, as a "defeasance of the security," perfectly in accordance with the statutory form. Could it be said that, because the bill of sale was not precisely in that form, it was not in accordance with the statutory form? His Lordship could not go that length. The learned Judge had lost sight of the fact that the time of payment was the time when payment was to become obligatory. The appeal must be allowed. The costs in both Courts must be the defendant's costs of the action.

The PRESIDENT of the PROBATE DIVISION said that two views of the construction of section 9 were obviously possible and two views had in fact been taken. But in "Ex parte Stanford" (17 Q.B.D., 259) the majority of the full Court of Appeal adopted the more liberal construction. Lord Justice Bowen, who delivered the judgment of the majority, said (17 Q.B.D., at p. 270):—"A bill of sale is surely in accordance with the prescribed form if it is substantially in accordance with it—if it does not depart from the prescribed form in any material respect. But divergence only becomes substantial or material when it is calculated to give the bill of sale a legal consequence or effect, either greater or smaller, than that which would attach to it if drawn in the form which has been sanctioned, or if it departs from the form in a manner calculated to mislead those whom it is the object of the statute to protect." That view commended itself to his Lordship rather than the narrower view which was taken by Lord Justice Fry. The majority of the Court there held that the bill of sale must be in substance in accordance with the statutory form. Here the effect of the bill of sale was to impose on the grantor an obligation to pay the money on a fixed day; but an option was given to him to pay it earlier. Was that in substance in accordance with the statutory form? There must, no doubt, be a stipulated time for payment—a stipulated time at which the grantor was bound to pay. The stipulation in the present case was not at variance with the statutory form. When it came to the provision for defeasance of the security the statutory form was not so peremptory as in its earlier part. It left the terms and the language of the defeasance at the option of the parties. As to the payment of interest, though it was not so stated expressly in words, the effect of the deed was that, whenever the principal money was paid off, interest was to be paid up to the time of the payment of the principal.

LORD JUSTICE ROMER agreed. He would only add that you could not, under the guise of a defeasance, introduce a provision inconsistent with the prior part of the form. There was no such inconsistency in the present case.

IN RE OVERWEG'S ESTATE—HAAS V. DURANT.*

Stock Exchange—Carrying over—Broker—Authority—Death of customer—Determination of broker's authority.

This was an application by the plaintiff to be admitted as a creditor against the estate of the deceased in respect of certain Stock Exchange transactions under the following circumstances :—The plaintiff was a stock-broker and the deceased, Mr. Charles Overweg, was a client with whom he had had dealings for a number of years. Mr. Overweg died on March 24, 1898, having then open with the plaintiff accounts for certain stocks and shares, the most important of which was one for £10,000 Ecuador bonds. On hearing of Mr. Overweg's death the plaintiff endeavoured to obtain instructions as to what was to be done with the stocks open, but could not obtain any. The plaintiff thereupon carried over all the stocks for the Stock Exchange account for March 28, 1898, and he again carried them over for the first account in April. After this he received notice that a meeting of Mr. Overweg's creditors was to be held and that the estate was insolvent. The plaintiff then closed all the stocks except the Ecuador bonds, but was unable to get rid of them until April 29, 1898. This transaction resulted in a loss of £383 12s. 3d., and for this sum the plaintiff now claimed to be admitted as a creditor.

Mr. G. Cave appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Levett, Q.C., and Mr. Danckwerts appeared for the defendant.

MR. JUSTICE BYRNE, in delivering judgment, said, —The plaintiff, Julius Haas, acted as broker for Charles Overweg, who died on March 24, 1898. On that day he was under contract, as a result of a continuation transaction, to take up and pay for on March 30 (amongst other securities) 10,000 New Ecuador bonds. The next settling day after the death was March 28. Upon the death of Overweg any authority, express or implied, to Haas as his broker to effect a continuation, determined (see "Phillips v. Jones," 4 The Times L.R., 401), and Haas was entitled immediately upon the death to sell. In fact, on the following settling day, March 28, he carried over, that is to say, he effected a fresh continuation, by entering into a contract for sale at 21½ and a contract for repurchase on the next settlement at 21½, plus 6 per cent. contango. This is the ordinary method of carrying over, and it was argued that the sale ought not to be regarded as a true sale, but as a nominal sale only, not involving accountability on the part of the broker unless upon the footing of accepting the contract for repurchase also, and that the broker if liable at all ought only to be held answerable in damages for the loss which could be shown to have arisen by reason of the continuation and ultimate sale actually effected. But, as is shown by the case of "Bongiovanni v. Société Générale" (54 L.T., 320), a continuation really is in form and in law a sale and repurchase, or purchase and resale, as the case may be, and, notwithstanding the fact that there is some evidence to show that upon a sale simpliciter a smaller amount would perhaps have been realized, I do not think that the broker can be heard to say that the sale ought not as between himself and his principal to be treated as a sale, because he without authority at the same time entered into a contract to purchase again at the next settlement. Under rule 70 of the Stock Exchange rules, all continuations shall be effected at the making up price, or at the then existing market price, and in the present case, as appears by the affidavit of Mr. Haas, the transaction was effected at the making up price, which I apprehend may be taken to represent as nearly as may be the market value of the securities. If he had been so minded, Mr. Haas could have closed the account on March 28 by selling in the market, relying upon his right to indemnity against the estate of his principal in respect of any loss, but he preferred to sell in a different way. I have not to consider the question whether or not the legal personal representative could have elected to adopt the continuations actually effected and the ultimate sale at a later date, had it been to his interests to do so, inasmuch as he elects to stand by the contract for sale entered into on March 28, 1898. It appears to me, therefore, that the plaintiff fails in his contention and he must pay the costs, except that I do not think he ought to pay any extra costs occasioned by the change in the form of proceedings, which was originally inconvenient, and which was changed, I believe, at the instance of the Court, both parties consenting. Such costs must be very trifling.

JOHNS V. PINK.*

Practice—Execution—Elegit—Tenant by elegit—Nature of interest.

This was a motion for an injunction to restrain the defendant from distraining on eight houses in Wearside-road, Lewisham, and arose under the following circumstances :—By eight indentures of lease dated July 30, 1897, the eight houses in question were respectively demised to a Mrs. Cole for the term of 99 years from September 29, 1896. By an indenture dated July 31, 1897, Mrs. Cole demised the eight houses to the plaintiffs for the term of 99 years granted by the respective leases thereof, except the last three days thereof, by way of mortgage, to secure the repayment of £1,800 and interest; and she entered into a covenant with the plaintiffs for the payment of the rents and performance of the covenants reserved by and contained in the leases. By an indenture also dated July 31, 1897, the eight houses were conveyed to the defendant in fee simple, subject to and with the benefit of the eight leases to Mrs. Cole. At Christmas, 1898, two quarters' rent were due under each of the leases from Mary Louisa Cole, and the defendant brought an action against her in the Queen's Bench Division for these arrears, and on February 9, 1899, recovered judgment for £20 and £5 5s. costs. On the same day the defendant issued a writ of elegit against Mrs. Cole under the judgment. On February 17, 1899, an inquisition was held under the writ, and by an instrument under the seals of the sheriff and the jurors it was stated that the jurors found that Mrs. Cole was possessed, as of her own lands and tenements, of the eight houses, which the jurors found to be of the annual value of £200; and that the sheriff on the day of taking the inquisition had caused these lands and tenements to be delivered to the defendant at reasonable price and extent in accordance with the writ. The writ and instrument were handed by the sheriff to the defendant's solicitors, but had not been filed in Court, nor had the defendant proceeded further under the writ. At the date of the inquisition Mrs. Cole was in receipt of the rents and profits of the property; but on March 28, 1899, the plaintiffs appointed a receiver of these rents and profits, who duly entered into receipt thereof. On June 24, 1899, a further half-year's rent became due, and on June 28 the defendant levied a distress on all the eight houses for the recovery thereof. The present action was then brought and notice of motion given. It was agreed that the hearing of the motion should be treated as the trial of the action. The questions of law arising upon the facts above stated appear from his Lordship's judgment.

*Reported by R. B. SCHOMBERG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

*Reported by G. A. STREETEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. Jenkins, Q.C., and Mr. Johnston Edwards were for the plaintiffs; and Mr. Upjohn, Q.C., and Mr. B. J. Parker for the defendant.

MR. JUSTICE STIRLING said that the grounds on which the plaintiffs' case was rested were—(1) that the defendant had become an assign of the term vested in Mrs. Cole, and was, as between her and himself, bound to indemnify her against the rent, while she was, by express contract contained in her mortgage deed, bound to indemnify the plaintiffs, and that the Court, to avoid circuity of action, would enforce directly against the defendant at the instance of the plaintiffs the right which Mrs. Cole herself had; (2) that the defendant, being an assign of the term vested in Mrs. Cole, would be liable to the reversioner for the rent, and being himself reversioner could not enforce by distress the payment of the rent which he was himself liable to pay as assign of the lease. As regarded the first of these points, assuming that the defendant had become an assign of the term vested in Mrs. Cole, his Lordship was unable to see that under the circumstances of the case the defendant had as between himself and Mrs. Cole become liable to indemnify her against the rent due to the judgment creditor. The primary relation between Mrs. Cole and himself was that of debtor and creditor, and not of assignor and assignee. He might have made himself liable to the lessor for the rent, and he might be unable to satisfy his judgment debt without payment of that rent, and, if so, the payment would be allowed upon a proper account being taken between himself and the judgment debtor; but if he could escape without paying the rent his Lordship saw no reason as between him and the judgment debtor why he should not. The case relied on for the plaintiff was "Moule v. Garrett (L.R., 5 Ex., 132; 7 ib., 101), where it was held that an assignee of a lease is under an obligation to indemnify the original lessee, who has parted with all his interest, against the rent and covenants. The ground of the decision was thus stated by Channell, B.:—"It is only reasonable to hold . . . that the liability of the lessee is as a surety for the assignee, and that there is an implied promise on the part of the assignee to indemnify the lessee against liability for breach of covenant while he is assignee"; and by Willes, J.:—"Where a party is liable at law by immediate privity of contract, which contract also confers a benefit, and the obligation of the contract is common to him and the defendant, but the whole benefit of the contract is taken by the defendant, the former is entitled to be indemnified by the latter in respect of the performance of the obligation." In this case the whole interest of the lessee was not taken by the judgment creditor; it was only taken by him for a limited purpose and for a limited time—viz., until he could, and in order that he might, obtain satisfaction of his debt. There was no authority for treating the judgment creditor under such circumstances as a surety for the lessee, and it did not seem to his Lordship to be reasonable. The second point raised a much more difficult question—viz., what was the nature of the interest of a tenant by elegit in a term delivered to him in execution of the writ? Where the land delivered was of freehold tenure it seemed clear that the judgment creditor had only a chattel interest, whose duration was measured by the satisfaction of the debt (see Burton's Compendium, p. 868), and the judgment debtor had remaining vested in him an interest which in the case of "Dighton v. Grenville" (2 Vent., 281) was held to be a reversion. It was contended for the defendant that this doctrine ought to apply equally to the respective interests of the judgment creditor and debtor where the land delivered was of leasehold tenure. The answer given on behalf of the plaintiffs was that there were authorities which showed this not to be so. In "Spencer's Case" (5 Rep., 16, see p. 17a) the law was thus laid down:—"If a man demises or grants land to a woman for years, and the lessor covenants with the lessee to repair the houses during the term, the woman marries and dies, the husband shall have an action of covenant as well on the covenant in law on these words (demise or grant) as on the express covenant. The same law is of tenant by statute merchant or statute staple or elegit of a term." That implied that the tenant by elegit had the whole term vested in him (see "Platt on Leases," 419). Again in "Carter v. Hughes" (2 H. and N., 714) Baron Martin said:—"In this case the execution debtor had only a term in the land, and upon the transfer of that the whole is spent, and what remains in him is not a reversion, but a right to the possession of the term after satisfaction of the first writ." Remembering that upon an alienation of a term by will or deed successive interests took effect, not by way of particular estate and remainder, but by way of executory interest (see Manning's Case, 8 Rep., 946; Lampet's Case, 10 Rep., 46; and "Wright v. Cartwright," 1 Burr., 282), his Lordship thought it might well be that the whole term was taken by a judgment creditor, but subject to a legal title in the nature of an executory interest in the judgment debtor, which, like other such interests, could not be defeated by the act of the first taker. This would explain, on the one hand, the authorities cited, and, on the other, why (as was admitted to be the law) the term did not merge in a reversion vested in the judgment creditor. Assuming that to be so, his Lordship had to consider, after all, what was delivered to the defendant. By the Statute 1 and 2 Vict., c. 110, s. 11, the sheriff was authorized to deliver execution of lands of which the judgment debtor "is seized or possessed." An estate in remainder or reversion expectant on an estate of freehold could not be delivered in execution—"Re Smith" (9 Ch. App., 369); "Re Harrison and Bottomley" ([1899] 1 Ch., 464). Under the law as it stood prior to the passing of the Act 1 and 2 Vict., c. 110, a moiety of the lands of the judgment debtor only could be extended; and it was held that if two writs were issued at the suit of different creditors, and a moiety of the freehold land of the debtor was extended under the first writ, the sheriff could not deliver a moiety of the entirety under the second writ, but only a moiety of the remaining moiety—"Hunt v. Cogan" (Cro.

Eliz. 483). It thus appeared that what was called in "Dighton v. Grenville" the reversion of the judgment debtor in the first moiety could not be delivered. Since 1 and 2 Vict., c. 110, it had been held in "Carter v. Hughes" (2 H. and N., 714) that where a judgment creditor issued three writs of elegit on successive judgments, and the sheriff delivered to him possession of land under the first writ, he had no power to extend the same land under the second and third writs. In the present case the inquisition found that Mrs. Cole was "possessed" of certain land of the annual value of £200. In point of fact she was so possessed; for though she had made a mortgage of the lands by way of sub-demise, the mortgagees had not taken possession at the date of the inquisition, and she was in receipt of the rents and profits, and was in that way entitled to the land for an interest which was valuable so long as it lasted, but which might be determined at any moment by the mortgagees. It appeared to his Lordship that the land must be taken to have been delivered to the defendant to the extent of that interest, and not in respect of the mere dry reversion expectant on the determination of the sub-demise, as to which the doctrine of "Re Smith" appeared to apply. The mortgagees had entered into possession; the determinable interest had been put an end to, and the right of the defendant as tenant by elegit had either been extinguished or was suspended. In either case it seemed to his Lordship that any liability on the part of the defendant to pay the rent reserved by the original lease had come to an end, and consequently he was entitled to distrain. The motion, therefore, failed, and the action would be dismissed with costs.

Having taken that view on the merits of the case, it was unnecessary for his Lordship to enter upon the consideration of a question which had been much argued—namely, whether or not the interest vested in the defendant until the inquisition had been filed in Court. But having regard to what had happened, his Lordship thought it right, having made some inquiries, to say a few words about it. The writ was expressly directed to the sheriff in these words:—"And in what manner you shall have executed this our writ make appear to us in our Court aforesaid immediately after the execution thereof under your seal and the seals of those by whose oath you shall make the said extent and appraisement, and have there then this writ." The proper and regular practice was that the sheriff should return the writ and have the inquisition and writ filed in the central office, and the only way in which the possession of the writ and inquisition by the solicitor to the defendant could be explained was, so far as his Lordship could see, that he received it as agent for the sheriff with a view to filing. That practice had, his Lordship understood, sprung up very recently, and the explanation of it appeared to be that upon filing a charge or stamp duty of 2s. 6d. became payable, which as the law stood was thrown upon the sheriff. With a view of escaping that obligation, and in the hope that the plaintiff would see his way to discharge the duty to the Exchequer, it had become the practice of the sheriff to hand over the writ to the plaintiff. It was very essential that the document which his Lordship had before him should be filed in Court, and if the solicitors to the defendant were willing to undertake to discharge the duty of the sheriff and file it his Lordship had nothing more to say. But, if not, he thought it must remain in the custody of the Court, and he proposed to call upon the sheriff to show why the document which ought to be in his custody was not either in his possession or on the file of the Court.

The defendant's solicitors gave the required undertaking.

MULLER AND CO.'S MARGARINE (LIMITED) v. COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE.*

Revenue—Stamp duty—Sale of foreign business—Goodwill—Property locally situate out of the United Kingdom—Exemption—Stamp Act, 1891, sec. 59.

Decision of the Divisional Court (15 The Times L.R., 399) reversed.

This was an appeal from the judgment (15 The Times L.R., 399) of a Divisional Court (Mr. Justice Day and Mr. Justice Lawrence), on a case stated by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue pursuant to the 13th section of the Stamp Act, 1891 (54 and 55 Vict., c. 39). On November 13, 1897, an instrument was presented on behalf of Muller and Co.'s Margarine (Limited), the appellants, to the Commissioners under section 12 of the Stamp Act, 1891, for the opinion of the Commissioners as to the stamp duty with which the instrument was chargeable. The instrument, which was made in England by the parties thereto other than Muller, Newman, and Wigley, purports to be an agreement under seal whereby the parties of the first four parts purport to sell to the appellants their respective interests in (inter alia) the following matters:—1. The goodwill of the business of Muller and Co., with the exclusive right to use the name of Muller and Co. as part of the name of the company, and to represent the company as carrying on the said business in continuation of the vendor. 2. The freehold premises mentioned in the schedule to the agreement. 3. Certain patents. 4. Plant, machinery. 5. Pending contracts. 6. Books of account, documents, papers. The agreement contained a covenant (clause 11) on the part of W. L. Muller not at any time thereafter to be engaged in any similar trade within 50 miles of the freehold premises except as in the agreement excepted. Muller and Co. at and for a long time prior to the date of sale carried on a wholesale business as manufacturers of margarine and other butter substitutes at Gildehaus in Germany. The apportioned price of the properties sold applicable to the subject-matters first and fifthly above described was £77,418. The Commissioners, being of opinion that the instrument was made in England and that that which was sold under the name of goodwill was the exclusive right to use the name of Muller and Co. as part of the name of the purchasing company to represent the company as carrying on the said business in continuation of the vendor as above-mentioned, and also the covenant (clause 11) above referred to, held that the first-described matters, as also the matters fifthly described, were property within the meaning of section 59 of the Stamp Act, 1891, that neither of such matters fell within any of the exceptions contained in that section, and that they were consequently liable to ad valorem conveyance duty. They assessed the duty accordingly at the rate of 10s. per cent. upon the said sum of £77,418—namely, £387 5s.—and also with a fixed duty of 10s. in respect of the other matters not chargeable with ad valorem duty. The appellants contended that no part of the goodwill was chargeable with ad valorem duty. The agreement was one made on October 4, 1897, between W. L. Muller, of Oldenzaal, Holland, called the vendor, of the first part; L. Newman, of Notting-hill, of the second part; J. Wigley, of Stevenage, of the third part; the General Purposes Syndicate (No. 2) (Limited) of the fourth part; and Muller and Co.'s Margarine (Limited) of the fifth part. It recited that Newman had acquired from the vendor the right to purchase the business and hold the same in trust for Wigley, and that Newman had agreed to make over the rights to the syndicate for certain debentures, and that the company had been incorporated with the object, amongst others, of acquiring the business. It was agreed as follows:—That the vendor, by the direction of Newman and Wigley and the syndicate respectively, should sell and the syndicate should sell and the company should purchase the goodwill and the business, &c. The signatures of Muller, Wigley, and Newman were affixed to the document abroad. The points for the Crown were that the real contract was one for the sale by the Syndicate No. 2 to the company, and that Muller, Newman, and Wigley merely concurred therein, and it was therefore an English contract. In any event the contract was one for the sale of an interest in the goodwill and pending contracts, which were property of some kind, but not property locally situate out of the United Kingdom. It was not therefore exempt under section 59 of the Stamp Act, 1891, which provides that any contract or agreement made in England or Ireland, under seal, or under hand, only . . . for the sale of any equitable estate or interest in any property whatsoever, or the sale of any estate or interest in any property except lands, tenements, hereditaments, or heritages, or property locally situate out of the United Kingdom, or goods, wares, or merchandise . . . shall be charged with the same ad valorem duty to be paid by the purchaser as if it were an actual conveyance on sale of the estate, interest, or property contracted or agreed to be sold. The Divisional Court gave judgment for the Crown.

Mr. A. T. Lawrence, Q.C., and Mr. Compton-Smith appeared for the appellants; Mr. Danckwerts (the Solicitor-General with him) for the Crown.

The Court allowed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that three points had been raised in this case. The first point, raised by the appellants, was that this contract was not chargeable with duty under section 59 of the Stamp Act, 1891, inasmuch as it was a contract which was not made in England. It was an agreement for sale between W. L. Muller and a limited company and certain other parties whom he might call intermediate parties. W. L. Muller was the real vendor, and the company were the real vendees. The contract was signed by the vendor and two of the intermediaries at Amsterdam. It was not signed by the vendee company or by the other intermediary—viz., the syndicate—until it was brought to England for the purpose of being so signed. In his opinion section 59 of the Stamp Act, 1891, ought not to be construed as contended for by the appellants. He thought that where a contract was signed abroad by one party, and was then sent over to this country to be signed by another party to be bound thereby, the contract was not made within the meaning of this section until it was so signed by the second party in this country. This contract therefore was made in England. So far he thought the appellants were wrong, and the Crown was right. The second point was one raised by the Crown, and was this—that the contract was chargeable under the section as being a contract for the sale of an equitable estate or interest in property. This was based on the assumption that the syndicate was the vendor. In his opinion Muller was the vendor, and therefore he thought that this point did not avail the Crown. He next came to the third point, which was raised by the appellants, and was this—that this contract for the sale of the goodwill of the vendor's business came within the exception contained in the section, as being a contract for the sale of property locally situate out of the United Kingdom. He was of opinion that this goodwill was something inherent to the business which was carried on in certain premises in Germany, and that therefore it might rightly be said to be property locally situate out of the United Kingdom. He referred on this point to "The Smelting Company of Australia v. the Commissioners of Inland Revenue," ([1897] 1 Q.B., 175). The Crown, therefore, was not entitled to duty, and the appeal must be allowed.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS was of the same opinion. He thought that this instrument was not a complete document such as was intended to be dealt with by this section until it was sealed by the company in England. He also agreed that this was not the case of a sale of an equitable interest in property. On the other point the question arose whether a goodwill could be said to be locally situate anywhere. He referred to "The Smelting Company of Australia v. the Commissioners of Inland Revenue," and "The West London Syndicate (Limited) v. the Commissioners of Inland Revenue" ([1898], 2 Q.B., 507), and came to the conclusion that where a goodwill was annexed to particular premises, as seemed to be the case here, it could be said to be locally situate where the premises were.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS said he agreed. With regard to the first point, however, he did not assent to the argument put forward by counsel for the Crown, that this deed could have no obligatory effect on any one except the persons who executed it in Amsterdam until it was executed by the other parties in England. That might be so, but the question depended on the proper inference to be drawn from the circumstances. But he agreed that, under section 59, the question was, not when an obligation first existed, but when there first existed a document which came within the section. He thought that no such document existed until it was executed in England. On the other point he did not think the case of the Smelting Company of Australia was an authority for saying that nothing could be locally situate anywhere unless it was a physical tangible thing. Such a proposition would exclude an easement. He thought that a right annexed to something which had a local situation might itself be said also to have a local situation.

IN RE MCMAHON—FULLER V. MC MAHON.*

Bankruptcy—Proof—Shares in company—Shares not fully paid—Calls.

Held, that a company (not in liquidation) was entitled to prove against the estate of a deceased insolvent shareholder in respect of the estimated future liability on partly-paid shares standing in his name.

This case raised the question whether a company (not in liquidation) was entitled to prove against the estate of a deceased insolvent shareholder in respect of the estimated future liability upon partly paid shares standing in his name. The question arose in a creditor's action for the administration of the estate of Mr. F. Y. McMahon, who died insolvent on July 6, 1897. At the time of his death he was the registered holder of 785 ordinary shares of £5 each in the Western Mortgage and Investment Company, on which £1 10s. per share only had been paid up. Three calls of 5s. each had since become due and payable, and there remained a liability of £2 15s. on each share. The company sought to prove in this action for the unpaid calls, and also for the estimated future liability upon the shares. The claim was admitted by the Master's certificate as regarded the unpaid calls, but was rejected as regarded the future liability. A summons was taken out by the company to vary the certificate in this respect. It appeared that the main object of the company was to invest money on mortgage of lands in the United States of America. The company had raised large sums by the creation and issue of debentures and debenture stock, and had invested the money so raised on such mortgages. These investments had not been fortunate, and for some time past the income thence derived had been insufficient to meet the debenture interest. In order to place matters on a better financial basis, the directors had made a series of calls of 5s. each at considerable intervals, and had applied the proceeds in paying off debentures and purchasing debenture stock at a discount; and it was hoped that, when three or four more calls had been made in this way, the debenture debt would be sufficiently reduced to permit of the interest then being paid out of the income of the company. At present the shares were unsaleable. For the purposes of proof, the value of the lien to which the company was entitled under the articles of association had been estimated at zero. The summons was heard on November 29 last when his Lordship, at the conclusion of the arguments, reserved his judgment.

Mr. Whinney appeared for the company in support of the summons; Mr. Upjohn, Q.C., and Mr. Lugden for the administrator of the deceased intestate; and Mr. Tallents for the plaintiff in the action.

MR. JUSTICE STIRLING, in giving judgment, after stating the facts, said,—By section 10 of the Judicature Act, 1875, the rules as to debts and liabilities provable which are in force under the law of bankruptcy with respect to the estates of persons adjudged bankrupt regulate the admissibility of the claim. The material bankruptcy rules are to be found in the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, section 37, subsections 3, 4, 6, 8. (His Lordship read the subsections.) The words of subsection 8 are extremely wide. They are derived from section 31 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1863, under which it was held in "Hardy v. Fothergill" (13 App. Cas., 351) that a claim by leasees against an assignee of a lease under a covenant for indemnity by the assignee against breaches of covenants in the lease was provable in the bankruptcy of the assignee. The present claim falls within the terms of section 37 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883; and in "Lindley on Companies" (5 Ed., p. 556), it is said, "Under this Act, when a shareholder becomes bankrupt, all calls in arrear are provable as debts, and his liability to future calls may be estimated and proved as well when the company is being wound up as when it is not." This statement of the law, although not binding on me, is nevertheless a weighty authority in support of the claim. Various objections were however taken, based on the provisions of the statutes which govern joint stock companies. Proof in bankruptcy, it was said, is equivalent to payment; and this proposition was conceded by the learned counsel for the applicants. It was then contended that, this being so, the result of proof in bankruptcy would be that the shares would become fully paid up, and that this would be contrary to section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867. That enactment, however, does not prohibit every act on the part of a company which may give rise to an obligation to treat the shares as if they were fully paid up. Thus it was held in "Burkinshaw v. Nicolls" (3 App. Cas., 1,004) that a company by issuing a certificate that the shares to which it relates are fully paid up may preclude itself as against a holder for value from insisting on payment in cash. Lord Cairns says (p. 1,016),—"It appears to me that it" (i.e., section 25) "leaves altogether untouched the question of the payment of the money upon the share, which payment it declares shall, no doubt, be an attribute or condition of every share in the company. But how that is to be, or what is to be the evidence of that payment, it leaves altogether untouched." It was also said that difficulties would or might arise in adjusting the rights between the holders of these shares and other shareholders who had paid up in cash. This is possible. Similar difficulties may also arise in working out rights upon the exercise of the power of forfeiture conferred by articles of association in the form of Table A to the Act of 1862. The existence of such difficulties is not sufficient to authorize the Court to decline to recognize a statutory right, if on the fair construction of the statute it is seen that the Legislature intended that the right should exist. Lastly, it was said that by section 75 of the Companies Act, 1862, express provision is made for proof against the estate of a bankrupt contributory of a company which is being wound up in respect of liability to future calls, while there is no such provision as regards a bankrupt holder of shares in a going company. At the time when the Companies Act, 1862, was passed the right of proof in bankruptcy depended on the Bankruptcy Acts of 1849 and 1861, in neither of which are to be found any enactments so extensive as those of section 31 of the Bankruptcy Act of 1869 and section 37 of the Bankruptcy Act of 1883. As to these it is remarked by Lord Selborne in "Hardy v. Fothergill" (13 App. Cas., 360) that "they are not confined (as those in the former Acts were) to certain specified kinds of contingent debts and liabilities, but they are expressed in general and comprehensive terms, so as . . . to indicate, prima facie at all events, that it was the object of the Legislature to discharge the bankrupt from every possible liability." Section 72 of the Companies Act, 1862, may, I think, be regarded as a step by the Legislature towards the attainment of this object rather than as affording an inference that going companies should not enjoy a right of proof within the terms of section 37 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. Section 55 of this Act enables a trustee in bankruptcy to disclaim onerous property of various kinds, including shares or stock in companies; and it is provided that such disclaimer shall operate to determine (amongst other things) the liability of the bankrupt and his property in respect of the property disclaimed. This section is not made applicable to the administration of the insolvent estates of deceased persons, but may, I think, be legitimately taken into consideration in determining whether the Legislature meant that a bankrupt should be released from liabilities of the description which I have to consider. It certainly shows that such liabilities were within the contemplation of the Legislature in passing the Act of 1883, and, in my judgment, the Legislature did intend to enable a bankrupt to get released from them. That being so, it follows that the claim ought to be admitted.

Decision of the Divisional Court (15 The Times L.R., 376) affirmed.

This was an appeal from the judgment of a Divisional Court (Mr. Justice Darling and Mr. Justice Channell) on a special case, reported in 15 The Times L.R., at p. 376. The case was stated by the Commissioners for the General Purposes of the Income-tax Acts for the City of London after meetings held on August 6, 1896, and May 6, 1897, when the Equitable Life Assurance Society of the United States appealed against three assessments of £80,000 made upon them under Schedule D of the Act 16 and 17 Vict., c. 34, for the years ended April 5, 1895, 1896, and 1897. The facts were thus stated:—The company was established by charter under the insurance laws of the State of New York. The principal office for the transaction of business is located in the city of New York. By the said charter it is provided as follows:—Article 3.—“The capital of the said company shall be \$100,000 in cash divided into 1,000 shares of \$100 each, which shall be personal property transferable only on the books of the company in conformity with its by-laws. The holders of the said capital stock may receive a semi-annual dividend on the stock so held by them not to exceed $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. of the same, such dividends to be paid at the time and in the manner designated by the directors of the said company. The earnings and receipts of the said company over and above the dividends, losses, and expenses shall be accumulated.” By Article 4—“board of directors”—it is provided:—“The corporate powers of the said company shall be vested in a board of directors, and shall be exercised by them and by such officers and agents as they may appoint. The board of directors shall consist of 52 persons, a majority of whom shall be citizens of the State of New York, each of whom shall be a proprietor of at least five shares of such capital stock.” It was further provided as to the election of directors that every stockholder should be entitled to one vote for every share of stock held by him, and the board of directors might, by a vote of three-fourths of the directors, provide that each life policyholder who should be insured in not less than \$5,000 should be entitled to one vote. But this power has not been exercised. By Article 5 the directors were empowered to elect annually a president and vice-president and to appoint a secretary and other officers and to determine the rates of premium and the amounts to be insured on any one life, and the terms of such insurances. Article 6 is as follows:—“The insurance business of the company shall be conducted upon the mutual plan. . . . The officers of the company within 60 days from the expiration of the first five years from December 31, 1859, and of every subsequent period of five years, shall cause a balance to be struck of the affairs of the company, which shall exhibit its assets and liabilities both present and contingent, and also the net surplus after deducting a sufficient amount to cover all outstanding risks and other obligations. Each policyholder shall be credited with an equitable share of the said surplus, and such equitable share after being ascertained shall be applied to the purchase of an additional amount of insurance (payable at death or with the policy itself) expressing the reversionary value of such equitable share at such interest as the directors may designate, or, if any policyholder so direct, such equitable share of surplus shall be applied to the purchase of an annuity to be applied in the reduction of his or her future premiums. In case of death the amount standing to the credit of the party insured at the last preceding striking of balance shall be paid over to the person entitled to receive the same, and the proportion of surplus equitably belonging to him or her at the next subsequent striking of balance shall also be paid when the same shall have been ascertained and declared.” It was also provided that the officers of the company every five years were to cause a general balance statement of the affairs of the company to be made, which should show the amount received during the preceding five years for premiums, interest, and annuities, and the amounts paid for losses, expenses, and otherwise, and the balance remaining in the treasury, together with the manner in which the same is invested. A share capital of \$100,000 is required to be subscribed by every insurance company by the laws of the State of New York (being chapter 463 of the year 1853), and the capital is always invested in United States Government bonds and deposited with the Controller of the State of New York. A branch or department of the said company for Great Britain and Ireland has been established, and carries on business at No. 6, Prince's-street, in the City of London, under the management of a London board of directors, with a chairman, secretary, general manager, and trustees. It was admitted that the board of directors alone by their officers manage the affairs of the company. They declare the amount that shall be divided amongst the policyholders, who have no power to interfere in the management, and the amount to be set aside for the reserve. The undivided surplus over and above the company's liabilities amounted to £7,787,458 for the year 1894, £8,442,502 for 1895, and £8,995,245 for 1896. Policies are also granted by the company to persons without right of participation in the profits of the company. It was not contended, on behalf of the company, that they were exempt from income-tax in respect of this source of profit. The net premiums and interest after provision for liabilities, including death claims, &c., are applied to pay expenses, as determined by the directors in their discretion, and to provide a reserve as required by the regulations of the Insurance Department of the State of New York, then a dividend not exceeding 7 per cent. is paid to the shareholders on their capital, then the balance, as the directors may determine, is invested to provide for a division amongst the participating policyholders of the company by way of bonus on or increase to the amount insured, according to such principles as may from time to time be adopted by the society (through the directors) for such distribution. The contentions on the part of the Inland Revenue were that the company and its assets were not the property of the policyholders, and that they had neither control, power, liability, nor right except such as the shareholders by their directors chose to give to them; that the policyholders were not members of the company, but were third persons who contracted with the company. That the accumulated funds of the company were not the property of the policyholders, but were accumulated profits, and that the company could not properly claim to be a mutual insurance company; that the provision of article 6 of the charter that the insurance business of the company should be conducted upon the mutual plan could only relate to the division of such portion of the profits as the directors might determine; that the division of a portion of the profits over and above the fixed dividend payable to the shareholders did not alone make the company a mutual insurance company; and that the net surplus so far as the same was derived from premiums received in the United Kingdom was a profit or gain of the company liable to be assessed to income-tax under Schedule D to the Act (16 and 17 Vict., c. 34). The company cited the case of “New York Life Insurance Company v. Styles” (14 App. Cas., 381), and thereupon contended that premiums paid to the company were contributed as an estimated amount required to cover the risks for the year and the necessary expenses, and that any surplus or balance was not profit or gain liable to assessment, but was merely an excess of contribution over expenditure, which they contended would be ultimately returned to the contributors. The Commissioners of Taxes were of opinion that the company was not a mutual insurance company within the meaning of the case above cited, and was liable to be assessed to income-tax on profits or gains made in the United Kingdom, and they confirmed the assessments. The Divisional Court gave judgment for the Crown, upholding the assessments. The insurance company appealed.

Sir Robert Reid, Q.C., Mr. Foote, Q.C., and Mr. C. H. Neish appeared for the appellants; Mr. Cripps, Q.C., and Mr. Danckwerts for the Crown.

The COURT, without calling upon counsel for the Crown, dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that in his opinion the judgment of the Divisional Court was right. The question was whether three sums of £80,000 made by the Equitable Life Assurance Society of the United States in this country were chargeable with income-tax under Schedule D. The Divisional Court had held that they were chargeable, and the society appealed. A similar case had been before the House of Lords twice. In "Last v. London Assurance Corporation" (10 App. Cas., 438) the House of Lords decided in favour of the Crown. In "New York Life Insurance Company v. Styles" (14 App. Cas., 381) they decided in favour of the insurance company. It was now contended on the part of the appellants that this case came within the decision in Styles's case. The surveyor of taxes, on the other hand, contended that it was governed by Last's case. Now what was decided in Last's case? There a life insurance company issued participating policies at an increased premium, according to the terms of which at the end of each quinquennial period the gross profits of such policies were thus dealt with—two-thirds were returned by way of bonus or abatement of premiums to the holders of such policies then in force: the remaining third went to the company, who bore the whole expenses of the business, the portion remaining after payment of expenses constituting the only profit available for division among the shareholders. The House of Lords held that the two-thirds returned to the policy holders were annual profits or gains and assessable to income-tax. Lord Bramwell dissented, and in giving judgment in Styles's case that learned Lord gave an account of the decision in Last's case. He said:—"I understand the principle of that decision to be that there was a company making profits, meaning to make profits not from its own members, but from those it dealt with; that, though it returned two-thirds of those profits to those it dealt with, they were not less profits; and that, therefore, income-tax was payable on them." In the present case the insurance society was a company with directors and shareholders and shares, just as in Last's case. It was argued that here the sum received by the shareholders in the way of dividend was very small compared with the sum which was paid over to the participating policy holders. But the sum paid to the participating policy holders at the end of every five years came out of the profits and gains made by the company during the five years, and the relative smallness of the sum received by the shareholders did not seem to him to affect the question. He could not distinguish between this case and Last's case. But then it was said that in Styles's case, which came before the House of Lords subsequently, Last's case was differentiated. What was the distinction which the House of Lords drew between those two cases? Clearly the distinction was this—that in Styles's case the life insurance company had no shares and no shareholders, and that the only members were participating policy-holders who carried on a system of mutual insurance pure and simple as partners inter se. And the House of Lords held that the surplus of premiums over expenditure which was returned to the policy-holder as bonus was not profit or gain assessable to income-tax. In his opinion the present case did not come within Styles's case, but was governed by Last's case. The appeal therefore failed.

THE LONDON AND NORTHERN BANK (LIMITED) v.
GEORGE NEWNES (LIMITED).*

Libel—Trade libel—Statement that a bank was in liquidation—Injunction granted.

This was an ex parte motion for an interim injunction to restrain publication of a trade libel. The paragraph complained of as a libel was published in the number of the Money Maker, a weekly serial, dated December 9 but issued on Wednesday last, under the heading "Lists of Contributors," as follows:—"Dr. D. T. Jones, of Sheffield, has had a narrow escape from being saddled with a liability of £10,000 in the London and Northern Bank, now in liquidation. He applied for 1,000 £10 shares, and sent £500 on account, but subsequently wrote to cancel his application. The Post Office stamp showed that a letter of allotment from the company, which was alleged to have crossed his letter, was not despatched until after his notice to cancel had been delivered. It was a question of only an hour or so, but Mr. Justice Cozens-Hardy held that the withdrawal notice was in time, and therefore adjudged the applicant his £500, with interest and costs." The application was supported by affidavits by the deputy-chairman and the general manager of the plaintiff company containing the following identical paragraph:—"The said bank was formed last year, and acquired the business formerly carried on for eight years by the Leeds Joint Stock Bank (Limited). It is untrue that the plaintiff bank is in liquidation. No proceedings or steps whatever have been taken or contemplated with the view to the liquidation of the plaintiff bank. Nor does any ground whatever exist on which such proceedings could be taken against the bank. The paragraph in question had reference to a claim by the plaintiff bank to enforce an agreement alleged to have been entered into by Dr. D. T. Jones therein referred to to take shares in the said bank. The said Dr. Jones had on the public issue of the shares of the plaintiff bank put in an application for the said shares which he afterwards purported to withdraw. The question in the litigation between the said Dr. Jones and the plaintiff bank was simply whether the notice of withdrawal had been given before or after the allotment letter had been posted, and the directors of the plaintiff bank were advised that it was their duty to have this question judicially determined. It was decided in favour of the said Dr. Jones."

Mr. Lawson Walton, Q.C., and Mr. J. Eldon Bankes were for the plaintiffs in support of the motion.

MR. JUSTICE NORTH thought it was a case in which he ought to grant an injunction. The general rule, as to cases in which an interlocutory injunction ought to be granted to restrain libel, was laid down by Lord Coleridge in delivering the judgment of five of the Judges in the case of "Bonnard v. Perryman" ([1891]

*Reported by D. FITCHER, Esq., Barrister-at Law.

1 Ch., 285) (7 The Times L.R., 453):—"Upon the whole, we think, with great deference to Mr. Justice North, that it is wiser in this case, as it generally and in all but exceptional cases must be, to abstain from interference until the trial and determination of the plea of justification." That case was a strong one, and he had always had difficulty in seeing that, if that was not a proper case for an injunction, any case was likely to arise to justify the interlocutory interference of the Court. He did, however, think this case so strong as to be exceptional. The paragraph in question states that the plaintiffs are now in liquidation. It was clear that that statement was unfounded. Under the circumstances his Lordship thought the case so exceptional that he ought to grant the injunction. He thought the case bore some analogy to cases where the Court had restrained the advertisement of a winding-up petition.

HENNESSEY V. MCCABE.*

Master and Servant—Master's liability to servant—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897—Factory and Workshop Act, 1895.

A man was on board a ship lying in dock, and was engaged in loading the ship with cargo from a lighter by means of a steam winch attached to the ship.

Held, that this was not an employment to which the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, applied.

This was an appeal from an award of the Judge of the Bow County Court under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. The applicant was a stevedore's labourer, and he claimed compensation from his employer, a stevedore, for accidental injuries sustained by him in the course of his employment. At the time of the accident the applicant was on board a ship which was lying in dock in the port of London, and was engaged in loading the ship with cargo from a lighter by means of a steam winch which was attached to the ship. The lighter was lying alongside the ship, the ship being between the lighter and the quay. The County Court Judge made an award in favour of the applicant. The employer appealed, and the only question raised on the appeal was whether the employment on which the applicant was engaged at the time of the accident was an employment to which the Act applied.

Mr. RUGGE, Q.C., and Mr. ROSKILL appeared for the employer, and contended that this was not an employment to which the Act applied. By section 7, subsection 1, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, "This Act shall apply only to employment by the undertakers as hereinafter defined, on or in or about," among other things, "a factory." By subsection 2, "factory" includes any dock, wharf, quay, warehouse, machinery, or plant to which any provision of the Factory Acts is applied by the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895. By section 23 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895, it was enacted that certain provisions of the Factory Acts, relating to the fencing of machinery, notice of accidents, powers of inspectors, and dangerous employments, should have effect "as if every dock, wharf, quay, and warehouse, and, so far as relates to the process of loading or unloading therefrom or thereto, all machinery and plant used in that process, and any premises on which machinery worked by steam, water, or other mechanical power is temporarily used for the purpose of the construction of a building or any structural work in connexion with a building, were included in the word factory . . . and the person having the actual use or occupation of a dock, wharf, quay, or warehouse, or of any premises within the same or forming part thereof, and the person so using any such machinery, shall be deemed to be the occupier of a factory." The word "factory" thus had an artificial meaning given to it for the purpose of the Workmen's Compensation Act, and under certain circumstances machinery might be a factory, and the person who used the machinery the occupier of a factory. But this was the case only where the machinery satisfied one or other of two conditions. It must be either machinery for loading or unloading from or to a dock, wharf, quay, or warehouse, or machinery used temporarily for the purpose of building. "McNicholas v. Dawson" ([1899] 1 Q.B., 773) was a case of machinery temporarily used for the purpose of the construction of a building. That case did not in any way touch the present. The only way in which this case could be brought within the Act would be by showing that this steam winch was machinery which was being used in the process of loading to or from a dock. The facts, however, showed that the cargo here was not being loaded to or from a dock, but was being loaded from a lighter into a ship. The County Court Judge said that he based his decision on "Woodham v. Atlantic Transport Company" ([1899] 1 Q.B., 15), but that case did not really govern this case. There cargo was being unloaded from a ship by means of a crane which was standing on a quay, and the Court held that the case was within the Act because machinery was being used in the process of unloading to a quay. In the present case there was no loading or unloading to or from a dock or quay, and therefore the case was not brought within the Act. They referred also to "Flowers v. Chambers" ([1899] 2 Q.B., 142), in which it was held that employment on board a ship lying in a dock was not employment on, in, or about a dock; and to "Hall v. Snowden" ([1899] 2 Q.B., 136) and "Durrie v. Warren and Co." (15 The Times L.R., 365; W.C.C., 78).

Mr. MONTAGUE LUSH, for the applicant, said he admitted that the case depended on the question whether this steam winch was machinery and plant used in the process of loading or unloading from or to a dock, wharf, quay, or warehouse within the meaning of section 23 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895. He contended that it was machinery so used, and that the County Court Judge was right. The cargo in this case was being loaded from the dock. He was not suggesting that the lighter out of which the cargo was taken was a part of the dock, for this Court had already negatived that proposition; but he contended that loading the cargo from the lighter into the ship was loading from the dock. It was the ordinary way of loading a cargo from a dock to make use of lighters. The lighters, though not part of the dock, were part of the plant used for the operation of loading. If cargo was brought down to a quay in a cart and loaded from the cart into a ship, it would be none the less loaded from the quay because it was taken from the cart on the quay. The cart would not be the quay, but the loading would be a loading from the quay. If the argument on the other side was right, the word "dock" might as well be struck out of the section; for, according to their contention, there could not be a loading from a dock which was not a loading from a quay or wharf.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said the case had been well argued on both sides. The question was, whether a steam winch on board a ship lying in a dock used for the purpose of taking in cargo from a lighter was a factory within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act. It was necessary to consider the incorporation into the Workmen's Compensation Act of enactments determining what constituted a factory. No case which they had previously decided covered the present. But in "Flowers v. Chambers" they held that a ship lying in a dock was not a dock, and in "Durrie v. Warren and Co." they went a long way in the direction in which they were going to-day. His Lordship read section 7, subsections 1 and 2, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, and section 23 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895. The question was whether the steam winch in this case was machinery or plant used in the process of loading or unloading from or to any dock, wharf, quay, or warehouse, within the meaning of section 23 of the Act of 1895. It seemed to him that the steam winch was used for the purpose of loading cargo from a lighter which was lying alongside a ship into the ship, and not for the purpose of loading to or from any dock, wharf, quay, or warehouse. He thought it would be straining the section beyond all reasonable bounds to hold that loading from a lighter into a ship on which a steam winch was used was loading from a dock, wharf, quay, or warehouse. The case, therefore, did not come within the Act, and the appeal must be allowed.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS agreed. He felt some difficulty in the case, and it seemed to him that Mr. Lush was logical and probably right in his interpretation of the word "dock" as embracing both the land bounding the water and the water itself. But he thought that the expressions "loading from a dock" or "unloading to a dock" must be taken to have the meaning which nine out of ten persons would attach to them—viz., as describing a process which involved some use of the land bounding the water. In his opinion the machinery used in this case did not constitute a factory. That question depended on the true construction of section 23 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895; and the effect of that section was to make the word "factory" include machinery only in certain circumstances, which, as it seemed to him, did not cover the circumstances existing in the present case.

THE MERSEY DOCKS AND HARBOUR BOARD V. THE ASSESSMENT COMMITTEE OF BIRKENHEAD UNION.*

Rating—Rateable value—Assessment—Lairages for cattle and sheep—Evidence as to annual receipts and expenditure.

This was an appeal from a judgment of a Divisional Court, consisting of Mr. Justice Lawrance and Mr. Justice Channell, on a special case stated by the Recorder of Birkenhead on an appeal brought by the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board to the quarter sessions of Birkenhead against a rate made by the rating authority for the township of Birkenhead. The appeal to the Recorder was from a poor-rate made on May 16, 1896, in respect of lairages at Woodside and Wallasey owned and occupied by the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board. The appellants were assessed at £24,056 gross estimated rental, and at £21,651 rate-able value. The lairages consisted of buildings of brick and wood roofed over and used for the reception and slaughter of cattle and sheep brought from abroad and for the cooling and preservation of the carcasses. In the course of the hearing of the appeal, the respondents tendered in evidence certain accounts made up from the books of the appellants, showing the receipts and expenditure of the appellants in the conduct of the business of the lairages for the three years ending July 1, 1896, and the averages thereof. The appellants objected to the admission of any evidence as to the amount of the receipts and expenditure, but the Recorder held such evidence admissible, and admitted the evidence tendered by the respondents accordingly. The Recorder found that the said premises were the only place in the neighbourhood at which foreign animals could be landed except under penalties as provided by the Diseases of Animals Act, 1894, but there were lairages for foreign animals at Deptford, Manchester, Hull, Cardiff, Bristol, Glasgow, and other places. The chief controversy between the parties turned upon the principle applicable to the assessment of a tenement used for carrying on the business of a lairage. The lairages were erected and worked by the appellants under the provisions of their statutory powers, and not as a local authority under the Diseases of Animals Act, 1894. No local authority had been appointed under that Act in respect of the Port of Liverpool. The appellants contended that the assessment should be based upon the structural value of the buildings plus the value of the land, as in the case of an ordinary warehouse. The respondents contended that the assessment should be based upon the actual average receipts and expenditure in the conduct of the business of a lairage. The Recorder was of opinion that in the exceptional circumstances of the case it was not possible to ascertain what a tenant would give for the occupation of the tenement by merely considering the structural value of the buildings and the value of the land, or otherwise than by investigation of the actual average annual receipts and expenditure involved in carrying on the business of a lairage. The Recorder did not assess the rate upon the profits of the tenant, but he used them, together with other evidence, to test the values given by the appellants and respondents respectively. Having taken into consideration all the evidence before him as to the actual receipts and expenditure of the occupiers who carried on the business, the nature of the business, and the chances of its permanence, the structural value of the buildings, the value of the land, and all the surrounding circumstances, he came to the conclusion that the gross value given by the respondents was too low, but he felt that he had no power on the appeal to put it up. He therefore accepted the value as the nearest to the true gross value he could arrive at, and proceeded to determine the amount of the deductions to be made therefrom in order to arrive at the net annual value by a consideration of the evidence before him, most of which was given by the appellants. As both parties desired to obtain the opinion of the High Court upon the true principle of assessment applicable, the Recorder stated this case and found the following facts:—(1) The tenements subject to assessment were capable of separate beneficial occupation apart from their connexion with the rest of the appellants' property. (2) Their value was enhanced by their proximity to and connexion with the docks and rails belonging to the appellants. (3) There were tenants other than the appellants available for the occupation of the tenements for the purpose of carrying on the business of a lairage. (4) There were no similar tenements in the neighbourhood with which a comparison could be made. If the assessment ought to be based on the mere structural value of the buildings plus the value of the land and without reference to receipts and expenditure he found that the gross estimated rental was £17,109 and £11,383 rateable value. If the principle of assessment contended for by the respondents was correct the gross estimated rental appearing upon the rate book was not too high, and the respondents admitted that it could not be increased. Consequently he adopted those figures and found the true gross estimated rental at £24,056 and £16,036 rateable value. The result was that as the net value was reduced, the appeal to the Recorder was allowed, and the rate was ordered to be made upon the rateable value of £16,036 instead of £21,651. The questions for the opinion of the Court were:—(1) Whether the accounts referred to above were properly admitted. (2) Whether the principle adopted by the Recorder was correct. If the answers to both questions were in the affirmative, then the gross and rateable values as found by the Recorder were to stand. If the answer to either question was in the negative and the appellants' contention was correct, then the assessment was to be reduced to £17,109 gross estimated rental and £11,383 rateable value. The Divisional Court affirmed the decision of the Recorder and gave judgment for the respondents. The appellants appealed to the Court of Appeal.

Mr. Marshall, Q.C., Mr. Horridge, and Mr. Hugo Marshall appeared for the appellants; Mr. Pickford, Q.C., Mr. A. A. Tobin, and Mr. R. M. Montgomery for the respondents.

The COURT, having taken time to consider, delivered judgment dismissing the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH read the following judgment:—When the facts found in this case by the learned Recorder of Birkenhead are understood, in my opinion the answers to be given to the questions asked of us involve no real difficulty. The first question is whether the published accounts of the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board in relation to their receipts and expenditure in conducting the lairages of which they are occupiers were rightly received in evidence upon the hearing of the appeal at quarter sessions brought by the appellants, the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, against an assessment of their lairages to the poor-rate; and the second is whether the principle adopted by the Recorder in arriving at the rateable value of the lairages as appears upon the special case is correct. The learned Recorder states that he did not assess the rate upon the profits of the tenant, but that he used them, together with other evidence, to test the value given by the appellants and respondents respectively. The material facts found by the Recorder are these:—First, that the lairages consist of lands and buildings in the occupation of the appellants within the ambit of the rating authority. Secondly, that the lairages are the only places in the neighbourhood at which foreign cattle can be landed except under penalties, as provided by the Diseases of Animals Act, 1894. Thirdly, that the lairages were erected and are worked by the appellants under statutory powers which enable them to exact charges for the lairages they provide for imported animals. Fourthly, that there are no similar hereditaments in the neighbourhood with which the lairages can be compared in order to ascertain what rent a tenant from year to year would be likely to give for the lairages, and that they fall within the category of cases which in rating law are known as exceptional cases. Fifthly, that it is not possible to ascertain what rent a tenant from year to year would give for the occupation of the lairages by merely considering the structural value of the buildings and the value of the land upon which the buildings stand. And, lastly, that to ascertain what rent such a tenant would give, the actual average annual receipts and expenditure obtained and incurred in carrying on the work of the lairages must be investigated. Now, first of all, it is manifest that the rental value of these lairages can not be ascertained by adopting the ordinary method of ascertaining what rent the hypothetical tenant from year to year would be likely to give for the hereditament about to be assessed—viz., by comparing that hereditament with other similar hereditaments in the neighbourhood, and ascertaining what rent the other hereditaments command, and thus arriving by comparison at an approximation as to what rent a tenant from year to year would be likely to give for the hereditament in question. As this method, which is, as I have said, the ordinary method for ascertaining rateable value, cannot be adopted, some other method has to be resorted to. What, then, in such a case is the next method usually brought into play? It is to take the structural value of the buildings and the value of the land upon which they stand, and to calculate what would be the interest upon the capital sum which would have to be expended if the occupier had become the purchaser and not the tenant. For instance, if the cost of the buildings, plus the value of the land, was, say, £10,000, the interest thereon, say, at 4 per cent., being £400 a year, the assumption is made that the hypothetical tenant, being desirous of occupying the premises, not purchasing, but becoming a yearly tenant, might be willing to pay as rent a sum in some degree represented by the interest upon the money he would have had to expend, had he become a purchaser instead of a tenant. This is a method which is adopted when the comparison of the hereditament with other similar hereditaments is impracticable. But suppose, as in the present case, in addition to the rent which a tenant might ordinarily be likely to give, there is a capacity in the hereditament itself of making a profit not personal to the tenant, but which is attached to the hereditament, why is not this capacity to be considered as an element when seeking to ascertain what the hypothetical tenant would be likely to give by way of rent? Surely a proposing tenant would take this additional element into consideration when calculating what rent he would give for the hereditament he was about to take; and why, then, is this not also to be taken into consideration by the tribunal which has to ascertain, as best it can, what rent the tenant, as a tenant from year to year, would be likely to give? There is, as it seems to me, no reason whatever why this capacity attached to the hereditament itself should not form an element in the consideration, and there is good authority, as I will show in a moment, that this can be taken into consideration. I will take two of the cases to which Mr. Pickford has called our attention, which sufficiently show when a capacity of making profit cannot and when it can be taken into account. In the case of "The King v. the Trustees of the Duke of Bridgewater" in the year 1829 (9 B. and C., p. 68), the trustees were by statute empowered to take tolls upon the tonnage of goods passing along the Bridgewater Canal, and they in addition carried on the trade of carriers thereon, receiving freight for the goods so carried. The Court held that the tolls were to be taken into consideration when arriving at the amount at which the occupation of the trustees was to be assessed, but not the profits made by them in the carrying business, because, as Bailey, J., in delivering the judgment of the Court, said, "I lay out of consideration the fact of the trustees being carriers, because their occupation only is to be considered. The profits of carrying goods are the profits of their trade. The tonnage is the profit of the land occupied by them." And, therefore, this tonnage profit, being attached to the land, had to be considered when arriving at the rateable value of the hereditaments—i.e., the canal. Again, in the year 1842, in the case of "Reg. v. The London and South-Western Railway Company" (1 Q.B., 558), it was held that the defendant company was liable to be rated for its land improved in value by the profits accruing from the railway, which in this case was held to include both the tolls and their carrying trade, because, as Lord Denman, C.J., pointed out, when delivering the judgment of the Court, at p. 580, the defendants were "occupying buildings and lands on an entire line of railway and carrying on a trade, not merely therein and thereon, but thereby." This, as it appears to me, applies to the present case upon this ground. I think the Recorder was right. I now come to two cases which fall within the definition of exceptional cases, of which the present case is one. In the year 1875, "Reg. v. Verrall" (1 Q.B.D., 9) was decided. It was a case of rating a racecourse, an undoubted exceptional case, and it was held by Sir Alexander Cockburn, C.J., and Mr. Justice Field that in ascertaining its rateable value the accounts showing the receipts and expenditure in respect of the racecourse were legitimate evidence, and were clearly elements for the consideration of the justices when arriving at the value of the occupation of the racecourse. So, again, in the case in 1880 of "Clark v. Overseers of Fisherton-Anger" (6 Q.B.D., 139), Mr. Justice Field and Mr. Justice Bowen held that, in ascertaining the rateable value of refreshment rooms upon a railway station, there being no means for a comparison, the receipts and expenditure during the past year ought to be received in evidence as an element in ascertaining the rateable value. In the case of "Dodds v. Assessment Committee of South Shields Union" ([1895] 2 Q.B., 133) this Court approved of the last two cases, and it is clear from the report that Lord Esher must have been alluding to a case other than "Clark v. Overseers of Fisherton-Anger," when he said he did not understand it. This Court, in "Cartwright v. Sculcoates Union" ([1899] 1 Q.B., 667), said nothing as to the accounts of receipts and expenditure not being received in evidence in a case like the present, and in my opinion that case has no application to a case where a profit is attached to the hereditament itself. For the reasons above I am of opinion that in this case the accounts of the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board were rightly received in evidence by the learned Recorder, and that he was right when he took evidence of the structural value of the buildings and land and also admitted in evidence the receipts and expenditure of the lairages for the past year, each, in my judgment, being elements fit for his consideration when ascertaining as best he could what rent the hypothetical tenant from year to year would be likely to give for the lairages. He did not take the profits as the basis whereon to assess the rateable value and then add thereto the structural value, but he took evidence of the profits merely to test the values given by the appellants and respondents respectively. The point made by Mr. Horridge upon a passage in Lord Herschell's judgment in the case of "London County Council v. Churchwardens of Erith" ([1893] A.C., at p. 592), in my opinion has not applicability here, because the Recorder has found that there were tenants other than the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board available for the occupation of the lairages. For these reasons I think that the judgment of my brothers Lawrance and Channell must be affirmed, and this appeal dismissed with costs.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL V. DOBREE AND ANOTHER.*

Finance Act, 1894.

A policy of insurance brought into settlement by a husband is liable on his death to the payment of estate duty under the Finance Act, 1894.

This was an information laid by the Attorney-General against Mr. Harry Hankey Dobree and Mr. John Leonard Tomlin, the defendants. The question was whether or not the proceeds of a policy of insurance brought into settlement were property which was liable on the death of the husband to the payment of estate duty under the Finance Act, 1894. In September, 1866, Mr. Falconer John Atlee, upon his marriage with Mary Dobree MacColl, effected a policy of insurance on his own life for £1,501 10s., payable at his death to his wife subject to a yearly premium of £50, payable by him during his life. In September, 1867, he assigned the policy to trustees for the purposes of an indenture of settlement of September 20, 1867, whereby, in pursuance of an agreement made previous to the marriage, Mr. Atlee assigned the policy upon the trusts of the settlement. Mr. Atlee covenanted to keep up the policy and pay the premiums during his life and did in fact do so. Under the settlement the policy was payable to Mrs. Atlee during her life. There was a joint power of appointment in favour of the children of the marriage, which was exercised in favour of Mr. George Gordon Falconer Atlee, subject to Mrs. Atlee's life interest. Mr. Atlee died on October 2, 1894, leaving Mrs. Atlee surviving him. The moneys payable under the policy were duly received by the defendants as trustees of the settlement. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue claimed estate duty upon these moneys, but the defendants refused to pay, on the ground that no such duty was payable. It was contended on behalf of the Crown that estate duty became payable in respect of the moneys received under the policy as property passing on the death of Mr. Atlee by virtue of section 1 and 2 (1) (d) of the Finance Act, 1894. The latter section provides that property passing on the death of the deceased shall be deemed to include "any annuity or other interest purchased or provided by the deceased, either by himself alone or in concert or by arrangement with any other person, to the extent of the beneficial interest accruing or arising by survivorship or otherwise on the death of the deceased." It was also contended that the moneys came within section 2 (1) (e), which includes within the scope of the Act "property which would be required on the death of the deceased to be included in an account under section 38 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, as amended by section 11 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889, if those sections were herein enacted and extended to real property as well as personal property and the words 'voluntary' and 'voluntarily' and a reference to a 'volunteer' were omitted therefrom." On behalf of the defendants it was contended that the money did not come within section 2 (1) (d), because on the death of Mr. Atlee it was not the benefit or interest Mr. Atlee had in the policy which passed—that had passed before—but merely the sum of money paid by the insurance company. It was further contended that this sum came within the exception in section 3 of the Act, which provides that "estate duty shall not be payable in respect of property passing on the death of the deceased by reason only of a bona fide purchase from the person under whose disposition the property passes," and it was argued that the transaction with the insurance company was equivalent to the purchase of a sum of money payable on the death of the policy holder, the purchase-money of which was paid by instalments. "The Lord Advocate v. Fleming" [1897] A.C., 145), was cited.

The Attorney-General, the Solicitor-General, and Mr. Vaughan Hawkins appeared for the Crown; and Mr. Haldane, Q.C., and Mr. Danckwerts for the defendants.

The COURT gave judgment for the Crown.

MR. JUSTICE DARLING referred to section 15 of the Act, which provides that "estate duty shall not be payable in respect of a single annuity not exceeding £25 purchased or provided by the deceased, either by himself alone or in concert or arrangement with any other person, for the life of himself and of some other person and the survivor of them, or to arise on his own death in favour of some other person." He said that this section threw a light upon the meaning of section 2 (1) (d), the only difference between the present case and the case contemplated by section 15 being that the one was the case of a lump sum and the other of an annuity. It was clear that section 2 (1) (d) was intended to include a case like the present. He did not think that the moneys came within the exception in section 3. The case contemplated by that section was where a person had bought property from another and had paid the price, but the property was only to pass upon the death of the vendor. In that case the purchaser would clearly derive no benefit at the death of the vendor. He would only be getting what he had paid for.

MR. JUSTICE CHANNELL said that he agreed with the judgment of his learned brother, on the ground that the duty claimed was given by section 2 (1) (d), and on the ground that it was not prevented from becoming due by virtue of section 3.

WENTWORTH AND OTHERS V. WENTWORTH AND OTHERS.*
Privy Council Appeals—New South Wales—Will —Construction—Discretion as to conversion of estate—Tenants for life.

This was an appeal from a decree of the Supreme Court of New South Wales of June 11, 1897.

Mr. Warmington, Q.C., and Mr. Theobald, Q.C., were counsel for the appellants; Mr. Swinfen Eady, Q.C., Mr. O. Leigh Clare, Dr. George Serrell, and Mr. Edgar J. Elgood for the respondents.

LORD MACNAGHTEN, in delivering their Lordships' judgment, said William Charles Wentworth, of Vaucluse, near Sydney, whose will had given rise to the questions which had been argued on the appeal, was a gentleman of considerable property. He died on March 20, 1872. His will was dated October 19, 1870. At the date of his will and at his death his wife was alive, and he had two sons and five daughters living. Three of the daughters were unmarried. His will, shortly stated, was to this effect:—After certain devises and bequests he gave the residue of his property, real and personal, to trustees—of whom his wife and his eldest son, Fitzwilliam Wentworth, were two—upon trust for conversion. He empowered his trustees to postpone the conversion of any part of his real or personal estates for such period not exceeding 21 years from his death as to them should seem expedient, and he directed that until such conversion, and until the proceeds should be invested as therein directed, the income arising from his estate from time to time remaining unsold and unconverted should during such period of 21 years be applied in paying his debts and the rent-charges, yearly sums, and other payments thereinbefore directed to be paid out of his residuary estates or out of the annual proceeds thereof, or so much thereof as the proceeds of any converted residuary estates or the income thereof should be insufficient to pay, and that subject thereto the surplus, if any, of the annual proceeds of his unsold and unconverted estates during the said period of 21 years, and all accumulations thereof, should go in augmentation of the principal or capital of his residuary estates, and be applied and disposed of as part thereof. The will contained directions for raising three sums of £25,000 each for the benefit of his three unmarried daughters. The ultimate residue of his estate was to be divided between such of his seven children as should be living at his death in equal shares. The shares of the daughters were settled upon trusts which were in effect for the daughter for life, with remainder for her husband for life, with remainder for her children who being males should attain 21, or being females should attain that age or marry. The share of the testator's second son, D'Arcy Bland Wentworth, was settled upon trusts under which he is entitled to a protected life interest, with remainder over for the benefit of his children. There was an ultimate gift upon failure of the trusts of any of the settled shares for the testator's children living at the time of such failure, with a direction that any share accruing to D'Arcy Bland Wentworth should belong to him absolutely, and any share accruing to a daughter should be held upon the same trusts as her original share. The testator declared that his trustees should have a discretionary power generally as to the sale, calling in, and conversion of any real and personal estate whatsoever forming part of his residuary estate, and the times and manner of selling and converting the same for the purposes of his will. Among the powers conferred upon the trustees was a power authorising them to grant a lease or leases (with or without the surface) of the coals or other minerals lying under any of his estates comprised in the residuary devise, with all proper and necessary powers, licences, easements, privileges, and authorities for getting and working the same for any term not exceeding 60 years. The period of 21 years from the testator's death expired on March 20, 1893. The conversion of his estate was not then completed. Part of the residuary real estate consisted of land in Northumberland, New South Wales, which was known to contain valuable seams of coal, though the coal was not worked or let or agreed to be let in his lifetime. The trustees had retained that property unsold up to the present time. But in 1876 the then trustees granted a lease of the coal which they were authorized to let, or the greater part of it, with certain surface rights for 40 years from January 1, 1876. Under that lease as modified by a subsequent agreement the coal had been extensively worked and the trustees had received large sums in respect of rents and royalties. For some years past their receipts had exceeded £7,000 a year. The present suit was instituted in November, 1895, by the respondent Fitzwilliam Wentworth, then the sole surviving trustee, for the purpose of determining certain questions which had arisen as to the respective rights of the persons interested as tenants for life and as remaindermen in the shares of the testator's residuary estate settled by his will. The present appeal had been brought by D'Arcy Bland Wentworth and his encumbrancers in the interest of the tenants for life. They challenged the judgment of the Chief Judge in Equity on two grounds. In the first place they said that the Chief Judge was wrong in holding that during the period of 21 years from the testator's death the trustees were bound to accumulate the income arising from the investment of the rents and royalties received under the mining lease of 1876. In the second place they contended that as from the expiration of the period of 21 years the tenants for life became and were entitled to a full share of the rents and royalties accruing under the mining lease, or at any rate to something more than what the Chief Judge had held them entitled to. The opinion of the Chief Judge was that so long as the property remained unconverted the rents and royalties attributable to the settled shares ought to be invested, and that the tenants for life were only entitled to the income arising from such investment. As regarded the first point, which was only faintly argued on the first hearing and not pressed by Mr. Warmington on the rehearing, their Lordships agreed with the Chief Judge in Equity. They were of opinion that according to the true construction of the will the trustees were bound to accumulate the rents and royalties received under the mining lease by investing such rents and royalties and the income resulting from such investment during the period of 21 years from the date of the testator's death. On the second question their Lordships took a different view from that which was taken by the Chief Judge in Equity. The period of conversion was left to the discretion of the trustees subject to the proviso that it was not to exceed the limit of 21 years from the testator's death. The trustees in the exercise of their discretion postponed it for the full period of 21 years. But at the expiration of that period the whole of the estate, according to the directions of the will, ought to have been converted and invested and ready for division. It might be that owing to circumstances it would not have been practicable to have converted the whole estate within the prescribed period except at an undue sacrifice. In that case, if the administration had been in the hands of the Court, the Court, no doubt, would have taken care that the property was not unduly sacrificed. But at the same time it would have been the duty of the Court, as far as practicable, to place the tenants for life in the same position in which they would have been if the directions of the will had been complied with. It did not seem fair or reasonable that the tenants for life should suffer because the circumstances of the case were such as to justify the trustees in departing from the strict letter of their instructions or because, without any such justification, the trustees had neglected the duty imposed upon them by the will. In this country, in the case of income-producing property directed by will to be converted, but retained for a time unconverted for the benefit of the estate, it had been the practice of the Court to put a value on the property, and to allow the tenant for life out of the income actually produced a sum equal to 4 per cent. on such value. That was the rule laid down by Vice-Chancellor Parker in "Meyer v. Simonsen" (5 De G. and S., 723), and followed by Lord Cairns in "Brown v. Gollatly" (L.R., 2 Ch., 751). Their Lordships thought that the principle of those cases ought to be applied to the present, but they did not think that it would be expedient to hamper the Court by laying down any fixed rule as to the rate of interest to be allowed to the tenants for life on the estimated value of the capital of the property. Their Lordships, therefore, thought that the decree of June 11, 1897, ought to be varied by omitting the declaration that "the trustees are under no obligation to immediately sell the lands still unsold belonging to the testator's estate," and the declaration that such rents and royalties as had accrued from the lands since March 20, 1893, formed part of the capital of the residuary estate and ought to be distributed or invested accordingly, and by inserting in lieu of the last-mentioned declaration a declaration that until the testator's residuary real estate was sold and converted in accordance with the directions of the will the tenants for life of the settled shares were entitled as from March 20, 1893, to receive out of the rents and royalties accrued and accruing from the lands such an annual sum as in the opinion of the Court would under all the circumstances of the case be a fair equivalent for the annual income that would have been received by them if the lands had been sold on March 20, 1893, and the proceeds of such sale had been invested in accordance with the directions of the testator's will, and that there ought to be a reference to the Master in Equity to ascertain the amount payable in accordance with such direction, and that subject thereto the residue of such rents and royalties formed part of the capital of the residuary estate, and ought to be distributed and invested accordingly. It would, of course, be competent for the Court if it thought it necessary to require security by insurance or otherwise in order to safeguard the interests of the persons entitled in remainder. Their Lordships would, therefore, humbly advise her Majesty that the decree ought to be varied accordingly. The costs of all parties as between solicitor and client would be paid out of the estate.

Dec. 13.

BOOSEY V. WRIGHT.*

Held, no infringement.

In this case the plaintiffs appealed from a decision of Mr. Justice Stirling (reported in 15 The Times L.R., 322). There was also a cross-appeal by the defendants upon a subsidiary point. The case raised an interesting and novel question of musical copyright. The plaintiffs, who were the well-known musical publishers, claimed an injunction to restrain the defendants from infringing their copyright in three songs—"My Lady's Bower," "The Better Land," and "The Holy City." The defendants were the agents for sale in this country of a mechanical musical instrument called the Æolian which was played by means of wind admitted to pipes or reeds through perforations in strips or rolls of paper which were inserted in the instrument and were unrolled by its action. The plaintiffs' case was that these perforated rolls which were sold by the defendants were, in fact, records of the musical compositions in question by means of which the music could be reproduced with the aid of the instrument, and that they constituted infringements of the plaintiffs' copyright in such compositions. Some of the perforated rolls contained in the margin directions to the performers as to time and expression—e.g., piano, crescendo, &c., which directions were copied from the plaintiffs' songs, and the plaintiffs complained of these also as being infringements of their copyright. Mr. Justice Stirling held that the paper rolls, so far as they contained perforations, were parts of the instrument, and were not copies of sheets of music within the Copyright Act, 1842; but that the addition of the directions as to time and expression was an infringement of the plaintiffs' copyright. He therefore refused the injunction as to the perforations, but granted it as to the directions. The plaintiffs appealed against the former part of this judgment, and the defendants against the latter part.

Mr. Butcher, Q.C., and Mr. Scrutton appeared for the plaintiffs; and Mr. Moulton, Q.C., Mr. T. Terrell, Q.C., and Mr. Eustace Smith for the defendants.

The appeals were argued on December 4 and 5, when judgment was reserved.

The COURT dismissed the plaintiffs' appeal and allowed the defendants' appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS read the following judgment in which the PRESIDENT of the PROBATE DIVISION concurred:—The plaintiffs are entitled to copyright in three sheets of music. What does this mean? It means that they have the exclusive right of printing or otherwise multiplying copies of those sheets of music—i.e., of the bars, notes, and other printed words and signs on those sheets. But the plaintiffs have no exclusive right to the production of the sounds indicated by or on those sheets of music; nor to the performance in private of the music indicated by such sheets; nor to any mechanism for the production of such sounds or music. The plaintiffs' rights are not infringed except by an unauthorized copy of their sheets of music. We need not trouble ourselves about authority; no question turning on the meaning of that expression has to be considered in this case. The only question we have to consider is whether the defendants have copied the plaintiffs' sheets of music. The defendants have taken those sheets of music and have prepared from them sheets of paper with perforations in them, and these perforated sheets, when put into and used with properly constructed machines or instruments, will produce or enable the machines or instruments to produce the music indicated on the plaintiffs' sheets. But is this the kind of copying which is prohibited by the Copyright Act; or rather is the perforated sheet made as above mentioned a copy of the sheet of music from which it is made? Is it a copy at all? Is it a copy within the Copyright Act? A sheet of music is treated in the Copyright Act as if it were a book or sheet of letterpress. Any mode of copying such a thing, whether by printing, writing, photography or by some other method not yet invented would no doubt be copying. So, perhaps, might a perforated sheet of paper to be sung or played from in the same way as sheets of music are sung or played from. But to play an instrument from a sheet of music which appeals to the eye is one thing; to play an instrument with a perforated sheet which itself forms part of the mechanism which produces the music is quite another thing. I have consulted Johnson's, Richardson's, and Murray's dictionaries to ascertain the meanings attributed to the word copy; and I do not myself think that the perforated sheet can be said to be a copy of the sheet of music unless the word "copy" is used in a very loose and inaccurate sense. Be this as it may, I cannot think or bring myself to decide that the perforated sheet is a copy of a sheet of music within the meaning of the Copyright Act. The fundamental ideas underlying them are different and the uses to be made of them are fundamentally different. Music appeals to the ear, but a sheet of music appeals to the eye, and the observation of Mr. Justice Bayley in "West v. Francis" (5 B. and Ald., p. 743) is applicable not only to engravings but to all kinds of books, and the Copyright Act treats a sheet of music as it treats a book. He said "A copy is that which comes so near to the original as to give to every person seeing it the idea created by the original." I do not say that the defendants' perforated rolls cannot possibly be regarded as sheets of music. They may possibly be so regarded by specially skilled persons who have learned to read the perforations. Conceding for the sake of argument that a person might be trained to play or even to sing from the perforated sheets, it is clear that they are not made to be so used, nor are they ever so used in fact; and we ought in my opinion to deal with the case on broad business lines and not on unpractical though theoretically possible assumptions. If these perforated rolls were new, it appears to me that their invention might be patented; and this could not in my opinion be said of any copy of any book. It may be true that the manufacture and sale of the perforated sheets diminish the sale of the plaintiffs' sheets of music. But it does not follow that the plaintiffs' copyright has been infringed; and I am of opinion that it has not. I regard the defendants' perforated sheets as part of a mechanical contrivance for producing musical notes; and I cannot think that manufacturers of musical instruments infringe any person's copyright by so constructing their machines and appliances to be used with them as to produce musical notes indicated on a sheet of music. On this broad and very important question, which so far as I know has never been raised before in this country, I am of opinion that the decision of Mr. Justice Stirling is correct. There is, however, another but comparatively subordinate question on which I am unable to agree with him. He has restrained the defendants from copying the directions on the plaintiffs' sheets of music to the person using them. The defendants' appeal from this part of the judgment ought in my opinion to succeed. The directions in the plaintiffs' sheets of music are no doubt protected by their copyright so long as they are used in connexion with their musical scores. But apart from those scores the plaintiffs have no copyright in such directions. The directions are not in themselves a sheet of music, nor are they a sheet of letterpress separately published. Even if they were they would be mere words, not sentences forming a literary composition in which copyright could be acquired. Upon this point the case is governed by "Hollinrake v. Truswell" ([1894] 3 Ch., 420), and the injunction granted by Mr. Justice Stirling to restrain the use of these directions must be discharged. The net result is that the plaintiffs' action wholly fails. Their appeal must be dismissed and the defendants' appeal allowed. The order appealed from must be varied by striking out the injunction, and judgment must be entered for the defendants with costs here and below.

LORD JUSTICE ROMER read a separate judgment to the same effect. He said that the rights under the Copyright Act of an author of a musical piece were (1) to prevent others from copying the published music regarded as a book; and (2) to prevent the music itself being performed in public without the author's permission. But any one might perform the music in private. The Act, in his judgment, never contemplated that the cylinder of a musical box, taking that as one of the best known mechanical instruments, could be regarded as a copy of the printed music, even though an accomplished musician might be able by inspection of the cylinder to gather from it the notes of the music. In the present case the sheets which were said to be copies of the plaintiffs' published sheets of music were issued only for the purpose of being used as parts of a mechanical musical instrument to produce musical sounds. In no practical or substantial view could the defendants' sheets be regarded as copies within the meaning of the Act of the plaintiffs' sheets of music regarded as books. The plaintiffs' sheets and the defendants' sheets were issued and used for substantially different objects. He also agreed with the Master of the Rolls, though with some doubt, that the defendants' appeal ought to be allowed.

TAYLOR V. ANNAND.*

Patent—Infringement—Mechanism for facilitating rapid application of type to newspaper printing machines—Proper subject-matter for patent—Alleged anticipation—Patent held valid.

Judgment was delivered upon this appeal against a decision of Mr. Justice Cozens-Hardy, reported in The Times of March 30 last. Judgment was reserved on the 4th inst. The action was brought by the assignees of letters patent (No. 5,470 of 1886) granted to John Henry Burton and others for "improvements in arrangements and mechanism to facilitate the rapid application of type representing late news or matter to, and the printing of the same by, newspaper printing machines. The plaintiffs sought an injunction and consequential relief in respect of an alleged infringement of the patent by the defendants. The plaintiffs' invention, although not at first of much pecuniary value, became at a later period largely used, but almost, if not quite, universally with a modification introduced in 1888 by a subsequent patent, which was not, however, the subject of consideration in the present action. The object of the invention was to meet a want felt by the publishers of newspapers, and especially of evening newspapers, of a rapid means of inserting late news coming to hand after the stereotypes have been fixed on the main printing cylinders. In the earlier editions of evening papers there is a blank space left for late news, and the plaintiffs' invention provided a method of filling up this blank space. The nature of the invention is stated in the judgment of Lord Justice Romer. Mr. Justice Cozens-Hardy dismissed the action. He was of opinion that the alleged invention had been anticipated by prior specifications, and that it did not form proper subject-matter for a patent. The plaintiffs appealed.

Mr. Astbury, Q.C., and Mr. J. C. Graham were for the plaintiffs; Mr. Moulton, Q.C., and Mr. A. J. Walter were for the defendants.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE ROMER read the following judgment of the Court. The invention disclosed in the patent of 1886, which is the subject of this appeal, is one limited in its scope, but of considerable practical importance. It relates to the most modern form of newspaper printing machines, known as the Endless Webb letterpress printing machines. These machines were the outcome of the discovery how to rapidly make and print with small cylindrical stereotypes. They had numerous advantages over prior printing machines, but had, prior to the invention in question, a defect which was a substantial one to newspapers, and especially to evening newspapers, which have to publish rapidly the latest news arriving. To insert late news the only available method was to cut away a sufficient portion of the stereo, and replace it by short ordinary type. But this took time, and, owing to the small size of the main printing cylinder, and the rapidity of its motion when printing, there was a difficulty in holding the ordinary type in a box so as to print properly, and in fastening the box to the cylinder, and only a small box and a small amount of type could be used, so that, before the invention, only a small portion of news could be inserted in any one place, and the practical method of insertion was as follows:—A box, called a "fudge box," was used for the type. It was of necessity small, and held the type badly from a printing point of view, inasmuch as the surface of the type was not properly concentric with the cylinder, and only a few lines could print properly. Moreover, the method by which the box was fastened to the cylinder was clumsy and slow, for the box had to be fixed by its insertion into a corresponding small shallow hole in the stereo, which hole had either to be cut out for the purpose when wanted, or to be previously shaped when the stereo was made. The defects of this method of printing late news were apparent for some years, but prior to the invention no remedy for them had been discovered. The invention may be shortly described as consisting of the employment of a short movable printing drum, revolving on an axis parallel with the axis of the stereo cylinder, and capable of having quickly inserted and holding firmly on its surface boxes of ordinary movable type, whose face should be concentric with the drum. This drum was so adjustable and geared that any column of the paper left unprinted on by the main stereo cylinder could be printed on by the type on the face of the drum. It was necessary for the complete success of the invention that the box should be one into which type could be quickly and firmly fixed, and so that when fixed the type should have its face concentric with the drum. The patentees invented and by their specification described a special mode of packing a box with type to answer the above requirements. The above invention was undoubtedly an ingenious and useful one, and was made additionally useful by a subsequent improvement, by which the boxes round the drum could be so arranged as to make the surface of the printing types in them continuous. With that improvement we are not directly concerned in this action, and only mention it because of a suggestion made on behalf of the defendants that it was the improvement alone which made the invention useful. In our opinion that suggestion is unfounded. The defendants contend that the invention was anticipated, and, failing that, they then contend that, having regard to the state of knowledge at the time the improvement described by the patentees was made, there was not sufficient invention on the part of the patentees to justify a patent for the improvement, or, in other words, that there was no proper subject-matter for the patent. With regard to the alleged anticipation, the defendants only rely on certain prior specifications. They do not venture to allege anything beyond what may be called "paper anticipations." We have considered the specifications relied upon before us by the defendants' counsel, and, in our opinion, none of them constitutes an anticipation of the invention. We need only mention one or two. Take Applegarth's of 1858. That was before the stereo machines, the subject of the plaintiffs' 1886 patent, came into use, and Applegarth was not considering or dealing with such machines. The special problem which was solved by the patent of 1886 was not before Applegarth. He was not considering or dealing with the difficulty of quickly printing stop news in a modern printing machine. What Applegarth was primarily thinking of was printing in colours, though he does point out that his machine could be used for printing other matter. He, no doubt, pointed out that you could do the printing then ordinarily done by a large cylinder by employing smaller auxiliary cylinders to do part of the work. But he nowhere points out or suggests the use of a small movable drum, or any means for rapidly fixing or holding securely ordinary type on his auxiliary cylinder with curved face to the type so as to print correctly. His improvement as applied to the modern stereo machine would have been of no practical use whatever. And, however valuable may have been his general idea of the use in printing off small auxiliary cylinders, it seems quite clear that in no true sense could his specification be called an anticipation of the 1886 patent. In the next place Duncan and Wilson's specification of 1879 should be mentioned. That is instructive, because it was after the modern stereo machine had come into use, and it shows an ingenious attempt to solve the difficulty which was only successfully solved by the patent of 1886. Duncan and Wilson's method was a failure. They employed an auxiliary cylinder, and pointed out that a full cylinder need not be employed, but they did not employ or refer to a movable carrier or drum like that of 1886, and only suggested the use of type arranged so as to form a flat surface, but acted upon by a spring or cam so as to come out when desired and print. Their method was in no way an anticipation of the plaintiffs' patent, but is of importance as showing what invention was required to arrive at the patent of 1886. Lastly, we may refer to Mewburn's specification of 1885. That really carried matters no further than Applegarth's of 1858, except that it suggested for holding types the use of grooves running along the whole length of the auxiliary cylinder. It in no way suggested the use of the small movable drum or any practical way of holding type with a cylindrical face to be fitted in the grooves, and the machine shown in Mewburn's specification, without alteration so as to make it like the plaintiffs', would have been useless for practical work, and consequently it appears not to have come into use. We now pass on to consider the next contention of the defendants as to there being no proper subject-matter for the plaintiffs' patent. It appears to us impossible in the circumstances of this case to say that there was no invention properly so called required to arrive at the improvement patented, or that the plaintiffs' patent was in substance one merely for the application of a known machine or tool to a new want. Prior to the invention there was no known machine which would do in any practical or efficient way the special work done by the improved machine described in the patent of 1886. And, in our opinion, to arrive at that improvement there was required on the part of its discoverers great ingenuity and invention in the true sense of the word. Now that the way to effect the improvement is known it is easy to belittle it. It can, of course, readily enough be pointed out that the principle of using a small auxiliary cylinder was known before; that a drum is only a small cylinder; that a movable drum was not in itself a new discovery; and so forth. This process of undermining an invention is well known, and, if allowed to prevail, would destroy many valuable and undoubtedly valid patents. But the process is radically wrong. The way to ascertain whether a novel and useful improvement in machinery required invention in the true sense is to consider how matters stood just before the improvement was discovered. In the present case, looking at the state of public knowledge at the time of the improvement in question, it appears to us impossible to say that to arrive at it no real invention was required, or nothing more than a happy idea of using for the purpose some tool already at hand. But we need not further dwell upon the point. Sufficient commentary is afforded by the facts that for years the defects in the stereo-machines to which we have previously called attention remained unremedied, and that when Duncan and Wilson tried to remedy it they could only suggest means which differed considerably from those adopted by the patent of 1886, and which failed. There still remain for consideration some minor questions, chiefly depending on the special claims made by the specification. As we have already pointed out, the inventors as part of their invention designed a special means of speedily and efficiently fastening in a box type which should have, when fixed, a true cylindrical surface. This special way of fastening forms the subject of the first claim, while the second claim is for the combination of the special way of fastening and the movable drum. Both these claims are undoubtedly good, for practically the defendants cannot deny that, limited as it is to a special means of fastening, the first claim is valid. But the defendants denied that they are using that special means, and say, therefore, that they have not infringed claims 1 and 2. Mr. Justice Cozens-Hardy has held that the defendants have not infringed claims 1 and 2, and we are not prepared to differ from him in this. The plaintiffs, though not admitting that these claims have not been infringed, have not strenuously argued the point, for they say that it is practically unimportant to them whether the defendants have or have not infringed the first two claims, if they are held to have infringed the third claim, and it was on this third claim that the plaintiffs chiefly relied. This brings us to a consideration of the third claim. On the construction of this claim we agree with the plaintiffs, and with the view taken by the learned Judge, that it is not restricted to a combination involving the use of the special means of fastening the subject of claim. The claim is for a combination of the special drum with (stating it shortly) the ordinary stereo-machine, but "substantially as and for the purpose" described in the specification, and illustrated by the drawings. This covers the main invention to which we have above referred, and though the patentees rightly enough have not confined their invention to the special fastening, they clearly indicated in their specification and drawings that their drum is to be one capable of carrying, and in use carrying, a box holding properly packed type capable of printing on the spaces in the papers left for the purpose unprinted on by the main cylinder. Having shown by their specification and drawings one efficient means of holding the type in a box, the patentees have done what was necessary, and they then, by claim 3, point out in effect that their invention can be used (as it obviously can) with any other efficient type-holding box, and they claim accordingly. The Court below came to the conclusion that, because claim 3 was not limited to the special means of fastening in the box, it was too wide, and that the main invention had been anticipated, or was not the proper subject matter of a patent. For the reasons already stated we cannot agree with this view. The learned Judge appears to us to have placed too much reliance on the evidence of Mr. Beaumont (the defendants' only witness), a gentleman who apparently had no practical acquaintance with the modern printing machines, and seems not to have realized the difficulties in the way of the inventors, or appreciated the evidence given on behalf of the plaintiffs. The last point we have to consider is one taken by Mr. Moulton and most ingeniously and ably argued by him. It was not taken in the Court below, nor was the attention of the witnesses called to it. It is said (truly) that claim 3 refers to the drum marked (b) in the drawings, and that in the drawings and specifications no type-holding box is shown or suggested, except one which has a dovetailed base to be inserted into a corresponding dovetail opening on the surface of the drum and so held. It is said that, as speed in the insertion of late news was of the essence of the patented invention, the dovetail was important. From this it is argued that claim 3 is limited to the dovetail, and it is then said that the defendants have not used the dovetail, and that consequently there has been no infringement. Even assuming that this point is now open to the defendants, it appears to us unsound. When the nature of the invention is considered it is clear that the particular method of fastening the box on the drum was comparatively unimportant, and formed no part of what has been called the pith and marrow of the invention. It must be remembered that claim 1 has nothing to do with the shape of the box itself, but is concerned only with the means of fastening type inside the box. And, when it is seen what the defendants have done, it is obvious that they have substantially taken and used the main invention the subject of claim 3, making only a colourable alteration in the way the box is fastened to the drum. In fact, even if the dovetail had formed an essential part of the invention, it is by no means clear that the defendants ought not to be held to have infringed. When their box is in position and held firm on the drum it is really held by a species of dovetail. But we need not decide that. It is sufficient for us to say that, in our opinion, the defendants have infringed claim 3, by substantially taking and using the invention thereby claimed. In the result, the order of Mr. Justice Cozens-Hardy must be discharged. It must be declared that the plaintiffs' patent is valid, and, if asked for, a certificate that its validity came into question in this action must be given. Then it must be declared that the defendants have infringed claim 3, and the usual injunction and order for an account must be granted. The defendants must pay the general costs of the action here and below. The plaintiffs will, of course, as part of their costs get the costs of the issues on which they have succeeded. On the other hand, the defendants will get the costs of the issues as to infringement of claims 1 and 2, with a set off of costs.

The defendants' counsel suggested that there would be an appeal to the House of Lords, and asked that there might be a stay of proceedings under the judgment pending the appeal, especially as the patent would expire in four months.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said that there was no ground for granting a stay of proceedings.

GRANT V. THE GOLD EXPLORATION AND DEVELOPMENT SYNDICATE (LIMITED.)*

Principal and Agent—Secret commission—Bribe to agent of vendee—Liability of vendor.

This was an appeal by the defendants from the judgment of Mr. Justice Bigham; reported in The Times of January 24 last. The action was brought to recover a balance due to the plaintiff in respect of a sale of a gold mine to the defendants. The defence consisted of a counter-claim for £500, being the alleged balance of a commission which the plaintiff had promised to pay to a Mr. Govan, one of the directors of the defendant syndicate. The only question in the case was whether the defendants were entitled to succeed on the counter-claim. The facts, as found by the learned Judge in the Court below, were as follows:—In August, 1896, Govan, being then a director of the defendant syndicate, went to British Columbia for the purpose of buying mining properties on the syndicate's behalf. He there met the plaintiff, who had for sale a property of the kind wanted. He told the plaintiff that he might be able to float a company which should buy the property, but that if he did so he should require a commission. Thereupon the plaintiff gave Govan a commission note by which he agreed to pay to Govan 10 per cent. on all sums, whether cash or shares, received by him on the flotation of the company. At the time the plaintiff gave this note to Govan he did not know that Govan was acting for any principal. He gave it in perfect honesty and good faith. Subsequently the plaintiff came to England, and it was agreed between him and Govan that the price to be paid to him for the mine should be £25,000 in cash and £115,000 in fully-paid £1 shares of the new company. After the price had been fixed, the plaintiff ascertained that Govan was making the purchase as agent for the defendant syndicate, who were to form and float the company, and a little later, in January, 1897, a contract was concluded between the plaintiff and the syndicate by which the plaintiff sold the mine to the syndicate at the price fixed by Govan. The company was floated, and 115,000 shares were duly allotted to the plaintiff. Ten per cent. of the shares, amounting to 11,500 shares, were put into the name of a nominee at the request of the plaintiff and were accepted by Govan as payment of that part of his commission. The syndicate then paid the plaintiff £10,000 cash, leaving a balance due of £15,000. The plaintiff, in March, 1897, saw Govan about it, who said he would get the syndicate to pay £5,000 in cash, and the balance, £10,000, by a four months' promissory note. Govan stipulated, however, with the plaintiff that if he procured this settlement with the syndicate his (Govan's) cash commission should be paid at once, without waiting for the £10,000 promissory note to mature and be paid. Both the plaintiff and Govan regarded the cash commission as not payable until the plaintiff had in fact received his £25,000. The plaintiff agreed to this, on the terms that the cash commission should be reduced to £2,000, thus, in consideration of promising a present cash payment, getting the cash commission reduced by £500. The syndicate paid the plaintiff a further £5,000 and gave him the promissory note for £10,000, and the plaintiff paid Govan the £2,000. Half of the amount of the £10,000 promissory note was paid by the defendant syndicate when the note matured, and a new note for the remaining £5,000 with interest was given. It was on this latter note that the plaintiff now sued. The facts as to the agreement to pay Govan commission subsequently came to the knowledge of the syndicate, and a committee appointed to consider the matter reported that Govan should repay the £2,000 and return the 11,500 shares to the syndicate. Govan agreed to do this, and it was resolved that the repayment of the £2,000 and the transfer of the 11,500 shares to the syndicate be accepted in full satisfaction of the syndicate's claim. Subsequently the syndicate came to the conclusion that they were entitled to get from the plaintiff a further sum of £500, being the amount by which the commission payable to Govan had been reduced, and the syndicate claimed to deduct the £500 from the balance due on the promissory note. Their contention was that when the contract of sale was entered into the plaintiff had notice that Govan was the defendants' agent, and therefore knew, or ought to have known, that the defendants, and not Govan, were entitled to the benefits accruing under the commission note; and it was said that the plaintiff had no right to reduce the commission from £2,500 to £2,000. It was further said that the selling price of the mine had been increased by the amount of the commission. The learned Judge said that the plaintiff, when he ascertained what Govan's true position was, should have insisted upon paying the commission to the defendants. Probably, also, the plaintiff ought not to have made the arrangement for the reduction of the commission by £500, at all events not without the consent of the defendants. But the defendants had lost their remedy by their conduct after they had discovered the real facts of the case. Knowing all the facts, they had elected to treat their rights as defined by the second agreement, and they thereby got the benefit of an immediate instead of a deferred settlement of the commission. They could not now say they were not bound by all the terms of the second agreement, one of which was that the commission should be reduced by £500. There would be judgment for the plaintiff on the claim and counterclaim.

Mr. Rufus Isaacs, Q.C., and Mr. T. W. Chitty appeared for the defendants; Mr. Duke, Q.C., and Mr. Kerly appeared for the plaintiff.

The COURT, having taken time to consider, allowed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH read the following judgment:—The question in this case is, as to what is the position of a vendor of property, who pays a secret commission to a person whom he knows to be the agent of the vendee, and the facts are as follows:—By an agreement dated January 8, 1897, the plaintiff sold a gold mine in British Columbia, of which he was then possessed, to the defendant syndicate, and he sues the syndicate upon a promissory note for £5,000 given to him by them in part payment of the purchase-money. As to the sum of £500 the defendants counterclaim, and assert that upon the facts which they subsequently discovered they are entitled to recover this sum from the plaintiff, and it is agreed by the learned counsel on each side that this case is to be decided upon the admission that the plaintiff has received this sum of £500 from the defendants. I now revert to the facts antecedent to the agreement of January 8, 1897. In the month of August, 1896, the plaintiff, who, as before stated, was possessed of a gold mine in British Columbia, was desirous of selling it, and he there met a Mr. Govan. By an agreement in writing dated September 26, 1896, and made between the plaintiff and Govan, the plaintiff gave an option on his mineral claims to Govan for a period of six months, and in this agreement it was stated that the option was granted to Govan to enable him to deal with the properties with the object of forming one or more limited liability companies on the London market, and Govan agreed to use his best endeavours with regard to the successful flotation of such company or companies on terms to be thereafter discussed and settled between the plaintiff and him, the plaintiff agreeing to hand Govan on any such successful flotation 10 per cent. on all the sums received in cash or shares accruing to the plaintiff. It will be seen that by this agreement the plaintiff agreed to pay to Govan one-tenth of what purchase-money he might be able to obtain from the company which through his instrumentality was to be brought into existence to become the purchasers of the plaintiff's mine, and I agree with Mr. Justice Bigham that, when a vendor sells property subject to the payment by him of a commission, the commission is added to the price asked by the vendor; in other words, the purchase-money by reason of the commission to be paid by the vendor is loaded with the amount of commission so to be paid. At the time when this agreement of September 26, 1896, was entered into the plaintiff did not know that Govan was agent and managing director, as in fact he was, of the defendant syndicate, though he did know that Govan was connected with the companies. The learned Judge has found that at this time the plaintiff was acting with perfect honesty and good faith, but this by no means exhausts the case; for after the plaintiff came to this country, until which time the negotiations for sale were not completed, a new set of facts arose, which give rise to the defendants' counterclaim. In the month of December, 1896, the plaintiff came to England at the instance of Govan in relation to the sale of his gold mine. Upon his arrival he went to see Govan, who had a room in the office of the defendant syndicate in Ryder-street. The plaintiff was constantly there, and he admitted in cross-examination that before the contract of purchase and sale of his property was entered into between him and the defendants upon January 8, 1897, he knew that Govan was a director of the defendant syndicate, and that he was, as such director, negotiating with him (the plaintiff) for the purchase of his property on behalf of the syndicate. The plaintiff made an effort in his evidence to get rid of this fatal admission, which was undoubtedly true, by suggesting he had sold the property to Govan before he knew of the above facts, but when pressed in cross-examination this suggestion was found to be without foundation, and in my judgment was clearly not the truth. The price fixed by the contract of January 8, 1897, was £140,000, of which £25,000 was to be paid in cash at certain named times, and the balance by a transfer to the plaintiff or his nominees of 115,000 fully paid-up shares of £1 each in a company about to be promoted by the syndicate. It appears to me plain that the meaning of what took place between the plaintiff and Govan was that one-tenth of the tenths of the purchase money was to go to Govan as commission, and Govan was to get up a company to buy the plaintiff's mine, and that the price which was to be paid to the plaintiff for the purchase of his mine was to embrace and cover Govan's cash commission of £2,500. At the time when the defendant syndicate contracted to purchase the plaintiff's mine—viz., on January 8, 1897—as a matter of fact the defendants had no knowledge of the arrangement made between their managing director, Govan, and the plaintiff as to the payment of this commission of £2,500 to him, nor did they discover it until the next year—viz., in March, 1898—under the circumstances hereafter mentioned. Upon March 17, 1897, upon which date payment of £15,000, part of the purchase money, had not become due, it was agreed between the plaintiff and Govan that, if Govan would get the defendant syndicate to pay to the plaintiff £5,000 in cash at once and £10,000 in promissory notes, he would give Govan £2,000 in cash down instead of £2,500 payable to Govan under the agreement of September 26, 1896, and which had not then become payable, and for which Govan would then have had to wait. The plaintiff admitted that at the time he made the agreement of March 17, 1897, for Govan to get him £5,000 in cash at once and £10,000 in promissory notes from the defendants, and for him to pay Govan £2,000 in cash, he (the plaintiff) knew that Govan was a director of the defendant syndicate and was acting for them. Govan succeeded in doing what was desired, and upon March 18, 1897, £2,000 in cash, and upon March 25, 1897, £3,000 in cash, making £5,000 in all, was paid to the plaintiff. The way in which the plaintiff then paid Govan his commission of £2,000 in cash down is very significant, and well worthy of attention, considering the arguments addressed to us by the plaintiff's counsel. The plaintiff under cross-examination admitted that he wrote out a cheque (this was on March 17, 1897) for £1,000, and went with this cheque to a bank where the plaintiff had an account, accompanied by Govan, that Govan took with him a bag, and that the plaintiff asked the cashier to give him bank-notes in exchange for the cheque, which the cashier did, and that the plaintiff thereupon handed £1,000 in notes to Govan. Upon March 25, 1897, the plaintiff drew another cheque for £1,000 to complete the bargain between him and Govan, and the same thing was repeated as regards this cheque as with the former, and Govan was handed by the plaintiff this £1,000 also in notes. It was in this way that the plaintiff paid the £2,000 commission to Govan. It is also a fact of peculiar significance that, when the defendants had floated the new company, and 115,000 of its shares were allotted to the plaintiff in part payment of the purchase money of his mine, 10 per cent. of those shares—i.e., 11,500—were placed in the name of a Mr. Allingham at the request of the plaintiff, and this allotment was accepted by Govan as payments by the plaintiff to him of his (Govan's) commission which was to consist of shares. The plaintiff when challenged as to these transactions was unable to give any intelligible reason either for the payment of the £2,000 in the notes to Govan and not by cheque, or for the allotment of the shares in the name of Allingham. It has been well said that secrecy is a badge of fraud, and these transactions in my opinion constitute good evidence that the plaintiff knew well that Govan was receiving this commission from him without the knowledge or assent of the defendants. What then is the case proved? It is that a vendor is paying a secret commission to a person whom he knows to be the agent of the purchaser, in order to induce that agent to get the purchaser to pay the vendor a price for his property enhanced by the amount of the commission, of which fact the purchaser had no notice and the vendor knew that he had no notice. The evidence shows that the plaintiff subsequently quarrelled with Govan, and that the plaintiff through others gave information to the directors of the defendant syndicate of what had taken place as regards the agreements of September 26, 1896, and March 17, 1897, and the payment of commission to Govan. I do not understand that the plaintiff informed the directors of the way in which he had paid the commission to Govan. The directors of the syndicate then called upon Govan to explain what he had done and to return the £2,000 which he had received from the plaintiff, and he thereupon paid to the syndicate the £2,000, and they also insisted that the £500 which formed part of the purchase money and which the plaintiff had received should be returned to them by him, and they refused to meet the promissory note sued on so far as £500 was concerned, and set up the counter-claim in this action alleging that the 10 per cent. commission was a secret profit or bribe by the plaintiff to Govan, their agent, and that they had unknowingly paid to the plaintiff the amount of the contracted commission (£2,500) in the purchase money of the mine. Apart from the point upon which my Brother Bigham decided against the defendants, it appears to me that the defendants are in the right in the position they took up, and indeed had it not been for this point, about which hereafter, the learned Judge would have decided in the defendants' favour, for the whole tenor of his judgment shows that he would have done so. In my judgment the contract of purchase of January 8, 1897, was a corrupt bargain, as was also the contract of March 17, 1897, and the evidence shows that, when each of those contracts was entered into, the plaintiff well knew that the defendant syndicate had no knowledge of the commission contracted to be paid to Govan by the plaintiff, nor that the purchase money they agreed to pay to the plaintiff was enhanced by the amount of that commission. It was said by the plaintiff's counsel that the case in the House of Lords of "Cavendish Bentinck v. Fenn" (12 App. Cas., 652) decided that where a person charges fraud, the onus is upon him to prove it, and to establish his charge in a case like the present he must establish that the person charged had not communicated the act complained of to the injured person, and unless he proves this the charge is not made out, for it is possible that he may have made the communication, in which case there would be no fraud, and "further he must prove that the person making the charge has, in fact, been injured by concealment. Assuming that in the present case this onus of proof is upon the defendants, though I am by no means certain that it is, I say that the defendants have satisfied this onus, and shown out of the plaintiff's own mouth that he knew that Govan had not disclosed to the defendants the fact that he was receiving commission from the plaintiff, and that they have also proved that they have been injured by the amount by which the purchase money had been increased to pay the contracted commission. For the same reason I need not discuss the case before my brother Romer of the "Lands Allotment Company v. Broad" (13 The Reports, 699). The case in this Court of the "Mayor of Salford v. Lever" ([1891] 1 Q.B., 168) is a clear authority that where an agent who has been bribed to do so induces his principal to enter into a contract with a person who has paid the bribe, and the contract is disadvantageous to the principal, the principal has two distinct and cumulative remedies—he may recover from the agent the amount of the bribe which he has received, and he may also recover from the agent and the person who has paid the bribe, jointly or severally, damages for any loss which he has sustained by reason of entering into the contract, and it is immaterial whether the principal sues the agent or the third person first. This is the head note of this case, and accurately describes what was decided thereon. A great deal of argument was addressed to us whether an action for money had and received would lie at the suit of the defendants against the plaintiff in this case. Lord Esher in the above case said it signified not what it may be called, whether damages or money had and received, and Lord Justice Lindley said:—"It is obvious that in some forms of action the corporation have a right to recover the shilling (i.e., the £2,500 in this case). Under the old practice, I think they could have recovered it by an action for money had and received, and probably they could have recovered it in more ways than one." It is not necessary upon the facts of this case to decide whether money had and received would lie, for I am of opinion that the £2,500 can be recovered from the plaintiff in action for damages for deceit, though I am by no means prepared to hold that an action for money had and received would not lie. Apart from what I am now coming to and upon which Mr. Justice Bigham decided adversely to the defendants, I am of opinion that the defendant syndicate have a good counter-claim against the plaintiff to recover the sum of £500. The point upon which Mr. Justice Bigham decided against the defendants was that in April, 1898, they settled with Govan after they had notice of the agreements of September, 1896, and March 17, 1897, and that they therefore knew that Govan had agreed with the plaintiff for a reduced commission of £2,000, and the learned Judge held that the defendants thus elected to adopt the agreement of March and take from Govan the £2,000 which he had received under it from the plaintiff, for if there had been no such agreement Govan would not by then have received any commission at all. But how does this afford any answer by the plaintiff to the good cause of action which the defendants then had against him? The plaintiff was no party to this settlement with Govan, which was made solely between the defendants and Govan. The agreement with Govan which is recorded in a resolution of March 23, 1898, was only a wiping out and settlement by agreement of the claims of the defendants against Govan, not against the plaintiff. The resolution was as follows:—"It is resolved that the repayment of the £2,000 offered by Mr. Govan be accepted with his assurance that he received the money in the full belief that he was justified in accepting it and without any dishonourable intention and thereby unwittingly made a mistake." With all submission to my brother Bigham, I cannot see how this settlement with Govan gets rid of or affords any answer to the cause of action which the defendants had against the plaintiff any more than the agreement which was set up in the "Salford case" by way of defence was held to afford an answer by the defendant Lever. For the reasons above I think judgment must be entered for the defendants upon their counter-claim, with costs of action here and below.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS and LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS read judgments, in which they also arrived at the conclusion that the appeal ought to be allowed.

Court of Appeal (A. L. Smith, Collins, } 1899.
and Vaughan Williams, L.J.J.) } Dec. 13.

THE QUEEN V. LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL.*

Metropolis—Sewers—London County Council—
Absolute obligation to make sewers—Metropolis Management Act, 1855, sec. 135—Local Government Act, 1888, sec. 40 (8).

This was an appeal from the judgment of a Divisional Court, consisting of Mr. Justice Grantham and Mr. Justice Kennedy, on a motion to make absolute a rule nisi obtained November 25, 1898, for a mandamus to the London County Council commanding them to consider and determine whether they thought any, and, if so, what, sewers and works, or diversions, or alterations of any existing sewers or works vested in them and referred to in section 135 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855 (18 and 19 Vic., c. 120), were necessary for the effectual sewerage and drainage of that part of the metropolis which was situate in the parish of Charlton, within the Lee district and near to the southern outfall main sewer, and, further, commanding them to make such sewers or works, if any, or such diversions or alterations as aforesaid as they might think necessary for the effectual sewerage or drainage of the said part of the metropolis, and, further, commanding them to cause the southern outfall main sewer to be kept so as not to be a nuisance, and for such purpose to construct and place either above or under ground such reservoirs, sluices, engines, and other works as might be necessary in accordance with the said section of the said Act and section 40 (8) of the Local Government Act, 1888 (51 and 52 Vic., c. 41). The proceedings before the Queen's Bench Division are reported in The Times of July 3. The affidavits on which the rule was obtained showed that the Lee district was constituted under the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, and other Acts, including the Plumstead and Hackney Act, 1893, whereby the district included, amongst other parishes, the parish of Charlton within the administrative County of London. They alleged that effectual and necessary works for the proper drainage of Charlton had not been provided by the London County Council. When the main (south outfall) sewer was constructed in 1861 by the Metropolitan Board of Works no provision was made for the sewerage or drainage of the lower part of Charlton and adjoining land in Woolwich and Greenwich and for other low-lying lands in Plumstead. The land in Charlton contained about 167 acres, and before the construction of the said main sewer about 216 dwelling houses were standing on this area and many more stood on the adjoining low-lying land in Woolwich and Greenwich. Since 1861 the number of houses lawfully erected had increased, and on the 167 acres in Charlton there were now over 420 small houses with a resident population of 2,000 people, besides 80 factories. The only sewers existing, or even possible, at the present levels of the Council's main sewerage system for draining such 167 acres were local sewers vested in the Lee Board of Works and running almost on a level and necessarily discharging into the Council's main sewer only about 2½ ft. from the bottom or invert thereof. To prevent flooding these local sewers had to be closed by entrance traps or peustocks when the main sewer of the London County Council was even less than half full. The local sewers were therefore for hours daily, and always in wet weather, mere elongated cesspools filled with the sewage and surface water of such low-lying lands and houses. It was alleged that the main southern outfall was defective and too small, and frequently led to the flooding of houses in Charlton. The Divisional Court were divided in opinion, Mr. Justice Grantham thinking that the rule should be made absolute, Mr. Justice Kennedy thinking that it should be discharged. Mr. Justice Kennedy having withdrawn his judgment in accordance with the usual practice, the judgment of the Court was that the writ of mandamus should issue. The London County Council appealed.

Mr. Cripps, Q.C., and Mr. Daldy appeared for the appellants; Mr. Lawson Walton, Q.C., and Mr. J. A. Hamilton for the respondents.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that prior to 1863 the Metropolitan Board of Works made two outfall main sewers, one on the northern side of the Thames, and one on the southern side, under the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, which contained provisions for stopping the sewage of London from being discharged into the Thames in the neighbourhood of the metropolis, and imposed on the Board the duty of constructing a new main drainage. The southern main sewer started from Wandsworth and extended along the right bank of the river, and debouched at Crossness Point. On the left hand side of this southern main sewer, between it and the river, lay the marshy land of North Charlton, which at the time when the main sewer was made was partly built upon. The making of the main sewer resulted in a most abominable nuisance to the district of Charlton. The affidavits showed that the houses were often flooded with sewage, and that sewage often lay under the floors of the rooms. Complaints as to this disgraceful condition of things had been made continually to the County Council ever since 1890. The County Council had appreciated the complaints, and had sent down experts to examine into the matter, but still the same sort of thing had been going on for years and years. Letters were written and memorials were sent in, and meeting of officials of the council had been held, but nothing had been done to remedy the state of affairs. Could anything have been done? The evidence showed that three things could have been done. The County Council might have put up a new pumping station, like those which they had in other places, or they might have established a duplicate system of drainage at Crossness, or they might have adopted a scheme of storm overflows. He could not see that the answers which the Council had made, as to expense or otherwise, afforded any excuse. In his opinion section 135 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, imposed upon the Board of Works the absolute obligation of making the sewers therein referred to, though it left the character of the sewers in the discretion of the Board. It further imposed on them a duty to keep all their sewers in such a way as not to be a nuisance or injurious to health. He thought the County Council had not performed the duty imposed on them of making the sewers required by the section, and that they had not taken all care and diligence to keep their sewers so as not to be a nuisance. He therefore thought the rule ought to be made absolute for a mandamus and that the appeal must be dismissed.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS said he was of the same opinion. He thought the County Council said in effect that they admitted their obligation to provide Charlton with drainage, but that they had provided such a scheme for the metropolis as a whole as they thought necessary, and that that scheme did not embrace the Charlton district at all, because they did not think it advisable to embrace it. Their affidavits showed that their scheme was never intended to provide for the marshy districts. They had not really taken the claims of Charlton into consideration at all. The Act imposed a duty upon them, and they had no discretion as to saying whether they would do their duty or not; the only discretion they had was as to method. He thought they had not made any reasonable answer to the case against them.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS agreed. He thought the County Council had a discretion as to the manner in which they should perform their statutory duty, but no discretion as to whether they should perform it or not. The affidavits showed that for reasons of policy they had determined not to perform a portion of their statutory duties. They could not now argue that they had done what they considered necessary, for the affidavits showed clearly what they considered necessary, and that they were not minded to do what they considered necessary. It was therefore right that the mandamus should issue.

MR. CRIPPS said he might now state that the County Council had determined to adopt a large scheme, which would provide proper drainage for the district in question.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said the mandamus would lie in the office for 12 months, subject to a right to the prosecutors to apply to the Court again at the end of six months.

RUABON STEAMSHIP COMPANY (LIMITED) V. LONDON ASSURANCE.*

Insurance—Marine—Repairs in dock—Dock dues—Survey for reclassification.

A vessel, insured under a marine policy against loss or damage by sea perils, having been docked to repair sea damage, was surveyed, on the owner's behalf, with a view to reclassification.

H.L. that the principle of "The Vancouver" (11 App. Cas., 573) did not apply, and the dock dues were not apportionable between the underwriters and the owner, but were to be borne by the former.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (14 The Times L.R., 320) reversed.

This appeal was twice argued, first on March 20 and 23 before a House constituted of the Lord Chancellor, Lord Watson, Lord Macnaghten, and Lord Morris; it was reargued by one counsel on either side on the first day of the present sitting, November 16, when judgment was reserved. The appeal involved only minute pecuniary considerations—the sum in controversy being only £2 5s.—but raised a principle of great moment to shipowners and underwriters. Mr.

Justice Mathew and the majority of the Court of Appeal held themselves concluded by the decision of the House of Lords, about 13 years ago, in the "Vancouver case" (reported in 2 The Times L.R., 857, 11 App. Cas., 573; 56 L.J., Q.B., 100). The appeal was from an order of the Court of Appeal made on March 30, 1898, dismissing with costs an appeal by the appellant company against a judgment given by Mr. Justice Mathew on August 6, 1897, in favour of the respondents in an action in which the appellants were plaintiffs and the respondents defendants. The appellants were owners of the steamship Ruabon, which they insured under various policies, including a policy effected with the respondents for £2,000, against loss or damage by perils of the sea. On November 30, 1895, while the policy was in force, the Ruabon, while on a voyage from Kustendji to England, stranded and suffered damage, for which it was admitted that the underwriters were liable. She was accordingly taken to Cardiff and put into dry dock for the purpose of having the necessary average repairs effected. After the repairs were completed, an average statement was prepared, according to which the respondents were liable to the appellants in the sum of £82 5s. From this, however, the respondents claimed to deduct £2 5s. for the following reasons:—While the ship was in dry dock, in the course of repairing the damage caused by the stranding, the appellants took the opportunity of calling in Lloyd's surveyor to look at the ship, and ascertain whether any repairs were necessary to enable this ship to pass her No. 1 Lloyd's classification. The surveyor certified that no classification repairs were necessary, and the ship accordingly passed her classification. The time at which it would be necessary for the ship to be classified had not at that date arrived, but by the rules of Lloyd's Register the time might be anticipated, and the owners were at liberty to call for a survey at the time when the ship was in the dry dock. The appellants, however, contended that they did not in fact take the ship into dry dock, and the dock expenses were not incurred for the purpose, or with the intention, of having the ship surveyed and classified, the appellants only having taken advantage of her being there to call in the surveyor to sight her bottom and see whether classification repairs would be necessary, and that the time during which the dock was used for effecting the underwriters' repairs was not in any way increased and no additional expenses were incurred by reason thereof. The respondents contended that as the ship in fact underwent her classification survey at the same time that the average repairs were effected the docking expenses ought to be divided between owners and underwriters. They accordingly deducted from the sum of £82 5s. (for which they were liable according to the average statement) the sum of £2 5s. as representing the proportion of that portion of the docking expenses which was attributed to the defendants by the average statement which the defendants contended ought to be borne by owners. No evidence was called at the trial, the action being tried on admissions made by the parties. The admissions were:—1. That the vessel in fact passed her No. 1 Classification Survey at Lloyd's Register of British and Foreign Shipping as required by the rules when she was in dock, the opportunity of her being in dock being taken to see if reclassification repairs were necessary. 2. That docking was necessary for the vessel to pass such survey. 3. That items amounting to £25 were proper charges for the work done. But the first admission was made subject to the following qualification or limitation:—"Not that she went into dock for that purpose, nor that any such repairs were done, nor that the time had arrived at which it was necessary for her to pass such survey." A like qualification was attached to the second and third admission. It was contended on behalf of the respondents that the case was governed by the "Vancouver Case," and that, inasmuch as the appellants had in fact used the dock for the purpose of survey and classification and derived a benefit therefrom, the above-mentioned expenses (which include the cost of entering and leaving the dock) ought to be shared equally between the appellants and the respondents. It was contended that otherwise the appellants would obtain more than an indemnity from the underwriters, which they were not entitled to do. Mr. Justice Mathew gave judgment for the respondents on the ground that the present case was not distinguishable from the "Vancouver Case." This decision was affirmed in the Court of Appeal by Lord Justice Chitty and Lord Justice Collins, Lord Justice A. L. Smith dissenting. The appellants contended that in the "Vancouver Case" the only expenses incurred in the present case—viz., those of getting the ship into and out of the dock—were not in issue and were not considered by the Law Peers in the "Vancouver Case." The case is reported below (14 The Times L.R., 330; [1898] 1 Q.B., 722; 67 L.J., Q.B., 548).

* Reported by J. B. in The Times, Eng. Business Law.

Mr. Cohen, Q.C. (Mr. Montague Lush with him), was for the appellants; Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C. (Mr. J. A. Hamilton with him), for the respondents.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—The sum sought to be recovered in this case is a very small one, but the principle discussed and decided is one of very far-reaching importance, and I am unable to concur in the judgment of the majority of the Court of Appeal. The agreed facts may be very shortly stated. The steamship Ruabon having been placed in dock for the purpose of repairs, for which the underwriters were liable, while she was in dock the owner took advantage of the opportunity to have the vessel surveyed. It is part of the agreed facts that the holding of the survey added not a farthing to the cost, or a moment to the period of time during which the execution of repairs proceeded, and the question raised is whether the owner of the vessel is responsible on any reason known to the law to bear part of the expense involved in the docking of the vessel and keeping her there while the repairs were being executed. I notice that in more than one of the judgments it is said that the owner of the vessel used the dock for his own purposes. I think there is a fallacy in the employment of that word "used." He went on to his own vessel and held a survey, and I think it is not true to say that the dock was used for his purposes at all. He took advantage of the opportunity which was afforded to him by another person (the insuring company) being under contract to do that themselves which gave him an opportunity of seeing the vessel, and which, if he had been minded to make a survey, he would have had to pay for himself. But unless the phrase "using of the dock" is explained it seems to me to be fallacious first to say that he used the dock and then to infer that as he used the dock he is called upon to pay for it. I propose to examine in detail the various cases, or rather the various classes of cases, where the right to contribution has been held to be part of our law. But it seems to me a very formidable proposition indeed to say that any Court has a right to enforce what may seem to be to them just, apart from common law or statute. The Courts, no doubt, will enforce the common law, and will apply it to new questions of fact which arise; but I cannot understand how it can be asserted that it is part of the common law that where one person gets some advantage from the act of another a right of contribution towards the expense from that act arises on behalf of the person who has done it. Many cases might be put where the generality of such a proposition would be plainly contrary to any received principle, and to my mind the question now in debate—admitted to be absolutely novel—would not be covered by any principle known to the law, except such a general proposition as I have indicated above. Now I am unable to affirm that that is the condition of the common law. The doctrine of "Average" has been repeatedly held to be a rule derived from the Maritime Law of Rhodes. In his judgment in "Strang v. Scott" (14 App. Cas., 601) Lord Watson said, "The rule of contribution in cases of jettison has its origin in the maritime law of Rhodes, of which the text as presented by Paulus (Dig. L. 14, tit. 2) is, 'Si levandæ navis gratia jactus meicium factus est, omnium contributione sarcitur, quod pro omnibus datum est.'" Lord Bramwell, it is true, in "Wright v. Marwood" (7 Q.B.D., 67) rested it upon an implied contract inter se to contribute by those interested. Lord Esher, on the other hand, in "Burton v. English" (12 Q.B.D., 220), spoke of it as a right arising not from any contract at all, but from the old Rhodian laws, which had been incorporated into the law of England as the law of the ocean. It is not necessary to go minutely into the arguments arising from the difference of opinion as to the origin of the law. It is, at all events, a known principle enforceable by the Courts resting either upon positive enactment adopted into our law or from an implied contract between the parties. So Lord Coke in "Sir William Harbert's Case" (2 Coke, Part III., p. 43) explains very clearly when dealing with "contribution." He says:—"Note, reader, when it is said before and often in our books that if one purchaser be only extended for the whole debt, that he shall have contribution; it is not thereby intended that the others shall give or allow to him anything by way of contribution, but it ought to be intended that the party, who is only extended for the whole, may by audita querela or scire facias, as the case requires, defeat the execution, and thereby he shall be restored to all the mean profits, and compel the conusee to sue execution of the whole land; so in this manner every one shall be contributory, hoc est, the land of every ter-tenant shall be equally extended." Lord Redesdale, in the case of "Stirling v. Forrester" (3 Bligh, 596), said that "the decision in 'Deering v. Lord Winchilsea' (1 Cox, 318; 2 Bos. and Puller, 270), proceeded on a principle of law which must exist in all countries—that where several persons are debtors all shall be equal. The doctrine is illustrated in that case by the practice in questions of 'average,' &c., where there is no express contract, but equity distributes the loss equally. On the prize of wines, it is immaterial whose wines are taken; all must contribute equally. So it is where goods are thrown overboard for the safety of the ship, the owners of the goods saved by that act must contribute proportionally to the loss. The duty of contribution extends to all persons who are within the scope of the equitable obligation." I know of no case in which anything like the present claim has been advanced. There is no debt here for which both the parties in question are bound to some third person. It cannot be denied that the underwriters here were themselves bound to incur all the liability they did incur, and that the shipowner was under no such liability. There is here no joint ownership which makes a liability upon all partaking of that ownership, and which liability each is under an obligation to some third person to fulfil. In another part of Lord Redesdale's observations in the case of "Stirling v. Forrester," his Lordship makes clear what he means by his commentary on the case of "Deering v. Lord Winchilsea." He says:—"The principle established in the case of 'Deering v. Lord Winchilsea' is universal—that the right and duty of contribution is founded on doctrines of equity; it does not depend upon contract. If several persons are indebted and one makes the payment, the creditor is bound in conscience, if not by contract, to give to the party paying the debt all his remedies against the other debtors. The cases of average in equity rest upon the same principle. It would be against equity for the creditors to exact or receive payment from one, and to permit, or by his conduct to cause, the other debtors to be exempt from payment. He is bound, seldom by contract, but always in conscience, as far as he is able, to put the party paying the debt upon the same footing with those who are equally bound. That was the principle of decision in Deering v. Lord Winchelsea, and in that case there was no evidence of contract as in this. So in the case of land descending to coparceners, subject to a debt, if the creditor proceeds against one of the coparceners, the others must contribute. If the creditor discharges one of the coparceners, he cannot proceed for the whole debt against the others; at the most they are only bound to pay their proportions." In all the cases that I have referred to, and in all the observations made by the learned Judges, the liability of each of the persons held to be bound to contribute is assumed to exist either by contract or by some obligation binding them all to equality of payment or sacrifice in respect of that common obligation. But this is the first time in which it has been sought to advance that principle where there is nothing in common between the two persons, except that one person has taken advantage of something that another person has done, there being no contract between them; there being no obligation by which each of them is bound; and the duty to contribute is alleged to arise only on some general principle of justice—that a man ought not to get an advantage unless he pays for it. So that if a man were to cut down a wood which obscured his neighbour's prospect and gave him a better view, he ought upon this principle to be compelled to contribute to cutting down the wood. Or if a man built a wall so as to shield his neighbour's house from undue wet or danger from violent tempests he ought to be entitled to contribution because he has got an advantage from what his neighbour did. I can find no authority for any principle which includes this case. The heads of "average," "principal and surety," "joint debtor," or "ownership of lands," all of which are liable in execution and only one of which has been made the subject of execution, are intelligible heads of the law and are included within well-known and ascertained principles. This case seems to me to go entirely beyond those ascertained principles, and for which it would appear there is no authority. No statute has authorized it; no principle of the common law comprehends it; and I am therefore unable to concur with the judgment of the majority of the Court of Appeal. But it remains to consider whether the case is not covered by authority. That supposed authority is to be found in what has been called the "Vancouver" case, "The Marine Insurance Company (Limited) v. The China Transpacific Company (Limited)," reported in 11 App. Cas., p. 578. I cannot think that that case establishes any such proposition as is insisted on here. In that case the sole question was whether a particular average loss sustained by the respondent exceeded 3 per cent. within the meaning of the warranty. It is necessary to observe somewhat minutely the facts of that case, in order to see whether there is anything in it which affects the question now in debate. The Vancouver, the vessel in question, was insured in a time policy which contained the warranty "free from average under 3 per cent." During a voyage covered by the policy she sustained certain damage not known at the time, but when, some time after, the owners, for their own purposes of cleaning and scraping her, put her into dock the damage was observed then and there, and the underwriters were of course liable to make good the particular average loss for which under the policy they were liable. The question having arisen in this form, and the owners having paid the whole of the dock dues while the vessel was being scraped and cleaned, and while simultaneously the obligation of the underwriters was being fulfilled by the repair of the damage, it was argued that the accidental circumstances of the owner having put his vessel into dock, and the underwriter having thereby escaped any liability to the dockowner for dock dues, the cost of repairs to him was thereby brought under the agreed amount of 3 per cent. What the Court had to determine was the liability under the policy in question, and with reference to that question which, be it observed, is to be measured by what the damage would cost to repair, the Court held that the dock dues were part of the cost, and that, under the circumstances, as the operations were simultaneously performed, the cost should be attributed (let the phrases be noted) in moieties to the operations of those two persons interested. Now the owner paid the dock dues, and if he had not done so the underwriter would undoubtedly have had to pay for dock dues, and if he had the amount paid would have been over 3 per cent. It came, in fact, to a calculation of the extent of the damage done, and that being measured by its cost of repair, it was held that the 3 per cent. was reached. What Lord Herschell meant is, I think, sufficiently explained by what he says in commenting on the case of "Pitman v. The Universal Marine Insurance Company" (9 Q.B.D., 192), as to the mode in which the particular average loss was to be arrived at in that case. He says all the Judges were, I think, agreed that where there is a partial loss in consequence of injury to a vessel by perils insured against, he is entitled as a general rule to recover the sum properly expended in executing the necessary repairs, less the usual allowances. Now the facts found in that case relied on were that the vessel was put into dry dock on January 4, 1876. It was discovered on the afternoon of the same day that her stern post was broken. It was found by the special case that if the vessel had required nothing but scraping and cleaning, the purpose for which alone she was put there by her owners, she might have been finished and discharged by the evening of the 6th, whereas for the purposes of her repair, for which the underwriters were responsible, she required the whole time from the 4th to the 11th of January, when in fact she was discharged. How a mode of thus calculating the particular average loss so as to satisfy the contract between the two parties to it can justify such a proposition as is here insisted on I am wholly unable either to understand or to agree to, and I think this judgment should be reversed.

LORD MACNAGHTEN read a short judgment to the same effect.

LORD MORRIS and LORD DAVEY concurred.

LORD BRAMPTON.—My Lords,—I entirely concur in the judgment which has been delivered by the Lord Chancellor. I take the general rule to be correctly stated by Lord Herschell in the Vancouver case, "that where there is a partial loss in consequence of injury to a vessel by perils insured against, and the ship is actually repaired by the shipowner, he is entitled to recover the sum properly expended in executing the necessary repairs less the usual allowances, as the measure of his loss. I take it also as admitted that, but for the matter I am about to mention, it would not be disputed that the respondents were liable under their policy to pay as an indemnity against the loss by perils of the sea which occurred, the full sum of £82 5s. claimed. This represents prima facie their responsibility. The respondents seek to reduce this amount by the sum of £2 5s. by reason of a survey of the ship which the plaintiffs, the owners, caused to be made by Lloyd's surveyor, during the period the vessel was under repair on the pontoon, which, for this purpose, I may call a dry dock. If they are right in making a reduction on this account, no question being raised as to the amount, the respondents are entitled to retain the judgment pronounced in their favour by the majority of the Court of Appeal. Since the decision of "the Vancouver case" (11 App. Cas., 573), by which, of course, we are bound, and which to me seems to be founded on good sense, it is not, in my opinion, open to question that where two operations are essentially necessary to be performed upon the hull of the ship in order to render her in a condition to justify a prudent owner in sending her again to sea, one of such operations being to effect repairs for the cost of which underwriters are responsible—the other to clean and scrape the ship necessitated by wear and tear, the cost of which must be borne by the owners themselves and neither of such operations could be performed unless the ship were drydocked, and both of which operations the owners and underwriters, or owners acting for themselves and also for the underwriters deem it expedient should be performed at one and the same time, or that one should immediately follow the other without any substantial interval under one continuous drydocking; in such cases the cost of docking and all dock dues during the period the vessel is in dock, must be shared in proportion, having regard to the period of joint or separate actual use of it. I do not, however, find anything in the "Vancouver case" which would justify such division of dock dues, unless in such cases as I have mentioned. The present is a very different case. The Ruabon was drydocked solely to enable the underwriters to effect the repairs for which they were liable and with no other object, and no other repair was, in fact, done or required to be done; on the ship; the survey of Lloyd's surveyor was in no way necessary for any purpose connected with the work performed on the vessel, but was only made to entitle the owners to reclassification at Lloyd's, and need not have been made at that moment, nor at any particular time, so long as it was made within the time limited by Lloyd's rules, which had then nine months to run. It is quite true that if it had not then been made it would have been necessary if she were afterwards surveyed to have incurred the expense of again drydocking her at the owners' expense, and to that extent the owners might have been benefited. I say might, because the owners might have sold the vessel in the meantime, or some other thing might have occurred to render such survey unnecessary. Assuming, however, that the expense of another drydocking was in this way saved and that to that extent the owners were benefited, I think that circumstances are immaterial, and does not warrant a claim for contribution towards the dock dues imperatively incurred on the underwriters' account in the discharge of their obligations. I think that such contribution can only be insisted upon in those cases where work is done to the vessel itself, by two or more persons, each separately and simultaneously engaged under different obligations in doing portions of it, drydocking being necessary for each. If the respondent's claim for contribution were allowed I see no reason why such a claim might not be made against an owner who, while his ship was in dry dock sold her, subject to immediate inspection and survey by his purchaser. A variety of other cases similar in character might be suggested. I think the owners, in causing the survey to be made in this case, were taking what (in p. 588) Lord Herschell termed "an incidental advantage" from the fact that a damage arising from a risk within the policy has necessitated repairs at the expense of the underwriter; and he puts by way of illustration the case of a vessel in ordinary course requiring scraping and painting at intervals of five years, and before the time for such operation has arrived meeting with a disaster by perils of the sea and docked for repairs for which underwriters were responsible; and the shipowner taking the opportunity of scraping and painting his ship. In repudiating the notion that the entire time occupied in that operation should be borne by the shipowner, he adds, "if they were to be borne by him at all." This observation of that noble and learned Lord makes it clear to me that he did not contemplate his judgment covering such a case as this, where nothing was in fact done on the ship and the survey did not in the smallest degree delay the completion or add one farthing to the expense of the repairs done for the underwriter. I think, therefore, this appeal should be allowed.

LORD ROBERTSON concurred.

The appeal was therefore allowed.

IN RE JOSEPH HARGREAVES (LIMITED).*

Company—Winding up—Jurisdiction of the Court
—Power to order production of documents—
Discretion—Companies Act, 1862, sec. 115.

In this case the liquidator desired production under section 115 of the Companies Act, 1862, by the Surveyor of Taxes of the Bradford First District of three balance-sheets of the company which, while it was a going concern, had been left with him for income-tax assessment purposes. He declined to produce the balance-sheets, and was supported in his objection by the Board of Inland Revenue, which passed a resolution as follows:—"In the opinion of the Board of Inland Revenue, who have duly considered the question, the production of the documents referred to in the summons . . . would be prejudicial and injurious to the public interests and service." A minute of this resolution was proved by the secretary to the Board.

Mr. P. WHEELER, for the liquidator, said that the liquidator represented the company which had furnished the balance-sheets, and no objection could be raised to the company itself seeing them. He also cited authorities to show that the objection ought to be made personally by the head of the objecting department.

Mr. DANCEWERTS, for the Board of Inland Revenue, contended that the objection was sufficiently taken by the minute.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT, in delivering judgment, said that the jurisdiction under section 115 was a special one, and by the terms of the section the Court had a discretion. If his Lordship had sufficient evidence that, in the opinion of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue the production of the documents would be injurious to the public interest, it would require very strong evidence to make him order production. Income-tax returns might contain very confidential matter, and persons making the returns should be able to be certain that the returns would be confidential. If it was shown that the production of documents which had got into the hands of an official might be necessary, there might be cases in which the Court could require the principal officer or head of the department to come into Court and prove that, in the opinion of those best calculated to judge, the production of the documents would be against public policy. See "Beatson v. Skene" (5 H. and N., 838). But "Hennessy v. Wright" (21 Q.B.D., 509) showed that the Court might allow other evidence to be adduced than that of the head of the department, and "Kain v. Farrer" (37 L.T., 469), which was discussed in that case, was not an authority against the Inland Revenue. The practice had been, except in exceptional cases, to accept the certificate of the Board, who could not very well come themselves. In point of form the objection was sufficiently taken, and no ground had been shown for overruling it. Even if his Lordship had the power to do so, he ought not, in his discretion, to overrule it. The application must be dismissed.

HEXTER V. PEARCE.*

Specific Performance—Agreement to grant lease—Agreement affecting an undivided moiety of lands—Decree of specific performance granted.

This was an action for specific performance which is reported only on the point set out below.

Mr. Warmington, Q.C., and Mr. Badcock, Q.C., appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Vernon Smith, Q.C., and Mr. Ward Coldridge for the defendants Mr. and Mrs. Pearce; Mr. T. L. Wilkinson for the other defendant.

The defendant Mr. P. W. Pearce is the owner in fee simple of an undivided moiety of certain lands, in all about 50 acres, near Teignbridge, in the county of Devon, and the defendant Mrs. Pearce is entitled to an annuity charged upon the said moiety. The plaintiffs, Messrs. Hexter and Humpherson, are pottery manufacturers carrying on business at Kingsteignton, in the same county. On May 11, 1896, the defendants, Mr. and Mrs. Pearce, agreed with the plaintiffs to grant them a lease of the clay and other minerals in or upon Mr. Pearce's moiety of the said lands as from the termination of the existing lease held by the other defendant Mr. W. H. W. Wilkinson. In September, 1898, Mr. and Mrs. Pearce refused to grant a lease to the plaintiffs, who now claimed specific performance of the agreement of May 11, 1896. In April, 1894, and in March, 1898, leases were granted to the defendant Wilkinson by all the persons in whom the said lands vested in undivided shares, giving him the right to raise merchantable potter's clay (with certain defined restrictions) from the said lands.

Mr. WARMINGTON, for the plaintiffs, said that there was no case which laid it down that specific performance could not be decreed of an agreement affecting an undivided moiety of lands, though, on the other hand, there was no reported case in which specific performance of such an agreement as the present had been decreed. "Burrow v. Scammell" (19 Ch. D., 175), however, was a somewhat similar case, and "Porter v. Lopes" (7 Ch. D., 358) might also be cited. The general rule was that unless specific performance was impracticable or would involve great hardship, it should be granted, and there was nothing in the present case to take it out of the general rule. The plaintiffs and Mr. Wilkinson could easily arrange a working agreement, and it must be presumed that they would act as reasonable men. Even if inconvenience should result, and he did not see why it should, that would not be sufficient to debar specific performance.

and Mrs. Pearce, argued that the Court should not grant specific performance of a contract when the result would be great inconvenience to the parties interested. The remedy in the present case should be damages. The result of specific performance would probably be a partition action and the appointment of a receiver, and the Court should hesitate before making a decree that might lead to further litigation. He relied on what was said in "Price v. Griffiths" (1 De G., McN., and G., 86).

Mr. WILKINSON followed on the same side. The evidence was to the effect that there were about three-and-a-half acres of merchantable clay left.

MR. JUSTICE FARWELL, in delivering judgment, said that the question was whether he should grant specific performance or merely award damages. Though the evidence had been somewhat conflicting, it was clear that it would not be impracticable for both the plaintiffs and the defendant Wilkinson to work the clay that was left under the land. Apart from the question of impracticability, either misconduct or great hardship was necessary in order to take away the right to specific performance. There was no direct authority on the point—"Price v. Griffiths" being clearly distinguishable—but it would be a strong thing to lay it down that specific performance could not be granted merely because the contract was concerned with an undivided moiety of lands. Whether the results of the contract would be inconvenient or not was a matter for the parties to consider when entering into it. He would, therefore, decree specific performance of the agreement.

BROWN V. THE COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE—GORDON V. THE SAME.*

Revenue—Stamp duty—Bond, whether issued or offered for subscription in the United Kingdom —Stamp Act, 1891, sec. 82 (1) (b) (i) and (ii).

The question in these two cases being similar they were heard together. They came before the Court in the form of cases stated by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue. In each case an instrument was presented to the Commissioners for their opinion as to the stamp duty with which it was chargeable. In the first case the instrument was a bond of the Norfolk and Western Railway, a company formed under the laws of the State of Virginia, U.S.A., for $1,000, payable to bearer, or, if registered, to the registered holder thereof. The Commissioners were of opinion that the instrument was a marketable security by, or on behalf of, a foreign company which was made or issued in the United Kingdom, or which, if not issued in the United Kingdom, had been offered for subscription and given or delivered to a subscriber in the United Kingdom within the meaning of section 82 (1) (b) (i) and (ii) of the Stamp Act, 1891, and they assessed duty on the bond at the rate applicable to marketable securities transferable by delivery—namely, 1s. for every £10 or fractional part of £10 of the money secured. The points at issue were (1) whether the bond was issued in the United Kingdom and, if not, (2) whether it was offered for subscription and given or delivered to a subscriber in the United Kingdom. The bond was one of a series of bonds given by the Norfolk and Western Railway in pursuance of a scheme for the reconstruction of the Norfolk and Western Railroad Company. The last-mentioned company had a large share capital and had issued a large number of bonds of various descriptions, upon which the interest was largely in arrears. A scheme for the reconstruction of the company under the name of the Norfolk and Western Railway was devised to be carried out by a committee in New York. Every bondholder whose security would be affected by the scheme was invited, by means of a circular, to become a party to the scheme, and to deposit his security with a depositary appointed for the purpose in each of the countries where the bondholders resided. Every bondholder who so deposited his security received in exchange a certificate of deposit. When a considerable number of the bondholders whose securities were affected had deposited their securities, a foreclosure decree was obtained against the old company, and its property was conveyed to the new company. Thereupon under the scheme the holders of certificates of deposit became entitled to receive bonds in the new company in proportion to their holdings in the old company. On various dates between December 2, 1896, and January 18, 1897, the new company executed and delivered to the Mercantile Trust Company bonds, of which the bond in question was one, to the value of $23,322,500. This was the total number of bonds (less $175 not delivered) which would have been exchangeable against certificates of deposit representing disturbed bonds of the old company had all the holders of such disturbed bonds assented to the scheme. The great majority of the bondholders assented to the scheme. The Mercantile Trust Company, having, in accordance with the scheme, duly certified the new bonds, delivered them in New York to the secretary of the committee formed to carry out the scheme of reconstruction. The secretary redelivered them in New York to the Mercantile Trust Company for distribution to the various holders of certificates of deposit. The Mercantile Trust Company accordingly forwarded to Messrs. Brown, Shipley, and Co., the depositary appointed to receive the old bonds in England, the number of new bonds to which holders of certificates of deposit given out by them were entitled. The bonds were subsequently handed to the holders of the certificates of deposit on presentation and in exchange for those instruments. Among the bonds sent to Messrs. Brown, Shipley, and Co. was the bond in question, which was handed by Messrs. Brown and Shipley to the appellant in exchange for a certificate of deposit. The old bonds were handed to the committee, who cancelled them. It was contended on behalf of the appellant that the delivery of the bond by the new company to the Mercantile Trust Company was an issue of the bond in New York; that when the bond was certified by the Mercantile Trust Company and delivered by them to the secretary of the committee in New York it became a complete and valid obligation of the new company and was "made" and issued in New York; that if not issued when delivered to the committee it was, at any rate, issued when redelivered by the committee to the Mercantile Trust Company; and that having been issued in New York it was not issued in the United Kingdom by Messrs. Brown, Shipley, and Co. handing it to the appellant. It was also contended that the bond was never offered for subscription within the United Kingdom. In the second case, "Gordon v. the Commissioners of Inland Revenue," the instrument was a bond for $1,000 of the Erie Railroad Company. It was one of a series of bonds of the value of $30,927,000 given under a scheme of reconstruction similar to that described in the other case. $29,632,893 of bonds only were required to satisfy the claims of the old bondholders. The additional $1,494,107 of bonds were intended to meet possible contingencies of more bonds being required than the above number. The bonds were delivered by the new company to the Farmers' Loan and Trust Company. When so delivered the bonds were duly executed, but the trustees' certificate necessary to complete them was not then signed. The bonds, having received the trustees' certificate, were then delivered in New York to the reconstruction committee in a fully complete form. The committee forwarded to Messrs. J. S. Morgan and Co., one of the depositaries in England, the number of new bonds to which the holders of trust receipts were entitled, and they were distributed by Messrs. J. S. Morgan and Co. as in the other case. The appellant's bond was one of the bonds thus distributed. The old bond for which the new bond was given passed to the reconstruction committee. Of the bonds not distributed, including those intended for bondholders who had not joined the scheme as well as the additional bonds reserved for contingencies, $20,000 worth were sold to produce cash, and the remainder were handed to the new company. The decision of the Commissioners was the same as in the last case. The contention of the appellant in this case, as in the last, was that the bonds were not issued in England because they had been already issued in New York when the Farmers' Trust and Loan Company delivered them to the reconstruction committee without appropriating them to any specific purpose. The contention of the Crown in both cases was that the deliveries of the bonds in New York were not issues of them within the meaning of the Act and that the real issue of the bonds took place in England, and in any case that they were offered for subscription and delivered to a subscriber in England.

Mr. Cohen, Q.C., Mr. Willes Chitty, and Mr. Kenneth Chalmers appeared for the appellant Brown; Sir Edward Clarke, Q.C., and Mr. Alfred Lyttelton for the appellant Gordon; and the Solicitor-General and Mr. Danckwerts for the Crown.

The COURT gave judgment in favour of the Crown.

MR. JUSTICE DARLING, dealing with the case of "Brown v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue," said that there was no issue of the bonds when they were handed by the Mercantile Trust Company to the secretary of the reconstruction committee, nor when they were handed back by the secretary to the Trust Company. All the secretary did was to turn them over and see if they were certified. In neither case did the bonds get into the hands of "some one who could make them available for his benefit," as it was held they must do by Lord Justice Rigby in "Baring v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue" ([1898] 1 Q.B., 78, at p. 91). The act on these occasions was no more than if the bonds had been given to the Postmaster of the United States with the name of the person to whom they were addressed in London written on them. The delivery of the bonds to the Mercantile Trust Company to be certified certainly did not amount to an issue. That was done in pursuance of the scheme. There was therefore no issue of the bond in question until it was handed to the appellant in this country. Dealing with the case of "Gordon v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue," his Lordship said that the scheme in this case was nearly the same as in the last, but in this case there came a time when the bonds were delivered in New York in a fully complete form, and it appeared also that $20,000 of them were sold by the reconstruction committee to produce cash. The committee clearly had wider powers of dealing with the bonds in this case. They practically had an unfettered discretion. He therefore had with hesitation come to the conclusion that they were issued in New York. But there was practically no difference, because having regard to the whole scheme of reconstruction he was of opinion that the bond in question came within section 82 (1) (b) (ii), because it was offered for subscription and delivered to a subscriber in England.

MR. JUSTICE CHANNELL concurred. He said that he saw no difference between the two bonds. There was a reconstruction scheme in each case to be carried out by the old bondholders exchanging their bonds for a new security, the best provision possible being made for those who were unwilling to become parties to the scheme. Circulars were issued to the old bondholders offering them the new issue in exchange for the old bonds, and, inasmuch as the new bonds were afterwards delivered, the second clause of section 82 (1) (b) was complied with. The case of "Chicago Terminal Elevator Company v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue" (75 L.T., 527), cited by Mr. Cohen, was distinguishable. That was sufficient for a judgment in favour of the Crown, but he was further of opinion that there was in neither of the cases an issue of the bonds in America. So far as the old bondholders were concerned the issue was in this country. The reconstruction scheme was necessarily carried out by forming a committee to carry it out. The old bondholders sold their bonds to this committee and in return received from them a contract to give new bonds, the committee having power to put an end to the scheme. In each case the committee were under an obligation not to deal with the bonds otherwise than for the purpose of carrying out the scheme. Looking at the scheme in each case as a whole he came to the conclusion that the handling of the bonds in America could not be called an issue of them within the section of the Act.

Q. B. Div. (Lord Russell of Kil-lowen, C.J.)

Dec. 14.

BOSTOCK V. THE RAMSEY URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL.*

Practice—Costs—Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893.

This Act does not interfere with the Court's discretion as to costs. Sec. 1 (b) merely provides that where a public authority is defendant, and obtains a judgment with costs, he is to have solicitor and client costs.

This was an action for malicious prosecution. At the trial, which was reported in The Times of the 7th ult., there was no question of fact to go to the jury, and the learned Judge gave judgment for the defendants, without costs. The question whether the learned Judge had power to deprive the defendants of costs was not raised at the time, but it was subsequently arranged that the point should be argued before the learned Judge.

Mr. Blake Odgers, Q.C., and Mr. P. Rose-Innes were counsel for the plaintiff; Mr. Lawson Walton, Q.C., and Mr. J. W. Cooper for the defendants.

Mr. BLAKE ODGERS said that the defendants had raised the question whether his Lordship had power to deprive them of costs in view of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, sect. 1 (b), which provides that when in an action against a public authority a judgment is obtained by the defendant it shall carry costs to be taxed as between solicitor and client. Counsel contended that this meant that if the judgment carried costs they were to be taxed as between solicitor and client. This section repealed section 264 of the Public Health Act, 1875, which had replaced a similar provision in the Public Health Act, 1848. The last-named Act provided that if in an action against a local authority judgment be given for the defendant he should be entitled to "full costs of suit." In "Avery v. Wood" ([1891] 3 Ch., 115)—a copyright case—it was held that these words only meant costs as between party and party. In "Itching Bridge Company v. Local Board of Health of Southampton" (27 L.J., Q.B., 128) it was held that the provision of the Public Health Act, 1848 (which had been replaced by section 264 of the Public Health Act, 1875), enacting that an action against a local authority "shall be tried in the county or place where the cause of action occurred, and not elsewhere," did not take away the discretion of the Court as to venue. In "Robinson v. The Mayor and Corporation of the Borough of Workington" ([1897] 1 Q.B., 619) the late Mr. Justice Cave gave judgment for the defendants without costs, but no point was taken, either before him or in the Court of Appeal, as to the power of the Judge to deprive a public authority of costs. In "North Metropolitan Tramways Company v. London County Council" ([1898] 2 Ch., 147) Mr. (now Lord) Justice Romer said that he did not think that the Act was intended to take away the discretion of the Court to deprive the public authority of its costs; but the present point was not raised in that case. In "Cree v. Vestry of St. Pancras" ([1899] 1 Q.B., 693) Mr. Justice Bruce held that his discretion had been taken away by the Act.

Mr. LAWSON WALTON said that the last-cited case was expressly in point. The discretionary power of the Court must be taken to have been contemplated by the Legislature in passing the Act of 1893. It was clear on principles of interpretation that if a statute contained positive language in reference to a matter in which under previous statutes a discretion existed that discretion must be held to have been taken away. In "Itching Bridge Company v. Local Board of Health of Southampton" the provision as to venue was treated as applicable to the parties, but not to the discretion of the Court. In the present case, however, the Act deprived the Court of discretionary power, and therefore the plaintiffs were not entitled to rely on decisions on an earlier Act.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE, in giving judgment, said that the question raised was one of general importance. Two points had to be considered—(1) whether there was no good cause for depriving the defendants of costs; and (2) whether he had any discretion in the matter. The action was one for malicious prosecution, the charge having arisen in the following way. The plaintiff was the principal proprietor of a travelling circus, which visited the town of Ramsey, and his representatives proceeded to place his wagons in a particular part of a public thoroughfare where, in the opinion of the representatives of the local authority, they would have been an obstruction of the highway. Instead of doing what common sense would have suggested if this was an inconvenience of serious moment, instead of calling a policeman or two policemen and requiring the removal of these vehicles, the defendants' representatives acquiesced in the circus being held. There was no ground for suggesting that the proprietors of the circus were trying to assert a right. But the defendants preferred an indictment against the plaintiff at the assizes for obstructing the highway, and Mr. Justice Wills concluded that there was no evidence on which he could properly be indicted, and the jury returned a verdict of not guilty. At the conclusion of the evidence in the present action his Lordship held that the plaintiff had not made out the absence of reasonable and probable cause, for the vehicles were an obstruction, and that there was no ground for suggesting malice, and therefore he gave judgment for the defendants. As to the question whether there was good cause for depriving the defendants of their costs, the only point that created any doubt in his mind was whether, although the conduct of the defendants might have been unreasonable in the action that they had taken, this was not a cause that ought to operate on the mind of the Judge. It seemed to him that the antecedent course of conduct did enter into the question whether there was good cause. If it was the wrong antecedent conduct of the authorities that led to the prosecution and brought about the apparent necessity for the plaintiff to vindicate himself against these charges, then, although it was not conduct in the litigation, the Judge might properly take it into consideration. Assuming that there was just cause, had his Lordship authority to deal with the question? The power of the Court to deal with costs was given by Order 65, Rule 1, which had the force of an Act, and which gave the Court a discretion, provided that in cases tried by a jury the costs should follow the event unless there was good cause to the contrary. In "Itching Bridge Company v. Local Board of Health of Southampton" it was held that the provisions as to venue did not take away the discretion of the Court, and the language of the Act of 1893 was not more emphatic than that of the Act of 1875. As to the reason of the thing, if a public authority brought litigation upon itself by unreasonable conduct, why should there not be a discretion as to costs just as in the case of a private individual? The one authority in favour of the defendants was "Cree v. The Vestry of St. Pancras," but as he did not find that the point was argued, and as it was a recent case, he did not feel bound to conform to it. The Act meant no more than this—that where judgment was obtained by the defendant with costs he was entitled to solicitor and client costs. It left untouched the salutary discretion of the Court to deprive the defendant of costs. He was not clear, however, that even where the defendant was to get costs it would not equally be in the discretion of the Judge to say that they were only to be taxed costs.

The judgment was accordingly allowed to stand for the defendants, without costs.

FOX V. "STAR" NEWSPAPER COMPANY.*

Practice—Non-suit—O. 26—Discontinuance.

The effect of O. 26 is to do away with the plaintiff's right to take a non-suit.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (14 The Times L.R., 280) affirmed.

This appeal was heard on June 16 and 19 last concurrently with an appeal of the same plaintiff against the Evening News (Limited). Their Lordships dismissed the appeal against the Evening News, and the case is reported in our issue of June 20. The action was for an alleged libel which appeared in the Star under the heading, "An Exciting Scene in Croydon County Court to-day." The substance and character of the libel appear in the report of the other appeal, and need not be stated, as the question on which their Lordships reserved judgment was of a purely technical character. The action came for trial on December 16, 1897, before the Lord Chief Justice and a special jury, immediately after the action against the Evening News. In the latter case the verdict was for the defendants. The jury was sworn in the action against the Star. The junior counsel for the appellant opened the pleadings and then the appellant's leading counsel stated that in view of the previous case he should offer no evidence. The Lord Chief Justice ruled that this was equivalent to a verdict for the defendants. The appellant, however, claimed to be non-suited, but the Lord Chief Justice refused the application, and the verdict was given for the defendants. An appeal to the Court of Appeal was dismissed. The case is reported below (14 The Times L.R., 280; [1898] 1 Q.B., 636; 67 L.J., Q.B., 454).

The appellant appeared in person; Mr. Blake Odgers, Q.C., Mr. Temple Franks, and Mr. Llewelyn Williams were for the respondents.

The LORD CHANCELLOR, in moving that the appeal be dismissed, said,—This was an action for libel. After the jury had been sworn and the pleadings opened, the plaintiff claimed to be non-suited; the Lord Chief Justice held that he was not entitled to be non-suited, and directed a verdict for the defendants. The sole question on this appeal is whether the old system by which a plaintiff at his own election could lose his writ, as it was said, and at his election bring another action for the same cause is still a system which exists in our law. I am very clearly of opinion that it does not. Our whole system has been changed, and I think the reason why the word "non-suit" itself is not now to be found in the rules is that it was determined that the power of a plaintiff at common law to claim a non-suit or the plaintiff in equity to dismiss his bill at his own option should no longer be permitted, and it is probable that the word "discontinuance" was supposed to apply to both forms of procedure both at common law and in equity. Accordingly by Order 26, rule 1, the only mode by which a plaintiff can submit to defeat is under that order unless he allows the proceedings to go on until the verdict is recorded against him. The word "discontinuance" no doubt had under a former system the more limited application, and the old system of non-suit is manifestly no longer capable of being reconciled with the new procedure either in form or substance. The substance is that when it once comes into Court, and when the plaintiff offers no support to his action, there must be a verdict for the defendant. This is the course pursued by the Lord Chief Justice. I think it was entirely right, and I move your Lordships that this appeal be dismissed with costs.

The other noble and learned Lords concurred.

MASKELYNE V. STOLLERY AND ANOTHER.*

Contract—Offer and acceptance—Parol contract —Offer of a reward—Dispute as to words used —Question for jury.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (15 The Times L.R., 79) affirmed.

This was the famous box-trick case, and the appellant was the well-known conjuror of the Egyptian-hall. Mr. Maskelyne was the defendant in the action in which the respondents claimed to have won the £500 reward offered by him for a correct imitation of his trick. The action was twice tried, first before Mr. Justice Willa and a special jury who were unable to agree, and, secondly, in November, 1898, before Mr. Justice Lawrence and a special jury. On the second occasion the verdict was given for the respondents. Lords Justices A. L. Smith, Rigby, and Collins dismissed the appellant's appeal on December 2, 1898. The story is fully told in Lord Macnaghten's judgment. The case is reported below (15 The Times L.R., 79). The appeal was heard last July, when their Lordships reserved judgment. Their Lordships dismissed the appeal by a majority of three to two.

Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., Mr. Herbert Reel, Q.C., and Mr. F. Street were for the appellant; Mr. Witt, Q.C., and Mr. R. E. Humphreys for the respondents.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—In this case the respondents, who were plaintiffs in the action, claimed from the appellant, Mr. Maskelyne, a reward of £500, which he offered publicly for a correct imitation of his box trick. Mr. Maskelyne is a public entertainer, unvaried probably in the invention and exhibition of mechanical tricks and illusions, and an expert, if anybody is an expert, in such matters. One of his performances is known as his box trick. It was one of his earliest inventions and has long been a favourite with the public. The secret of the trick has never yet been discovered. A box is brought upon the stage, differing apparently in nothing from an ordinary strong box of the same size. Mr. Maskelyne invites the spectators to come forward and examine it. When curiosity is satisfied Mr. Cook, who is Mr. Maskelyne's confederate or partner, gets into the box. It is shut and locked and the key is handed to one of the audience. It is then canvassed—the canvas is laced up through eyelet holes—and it is corded. Any one present is at liberty to cord it as he pleases, and the knots are sealed. Then the box is placed in a cabinet to screen it from the view of the audience. After a short interval the cabinet is thrown open. The box is found apparently in the same condition in which it was when it was placed in the cabinet—canvassed, laced up, and corded. The cords and the canvas covering are removed, the box is opened and found to be empty. The late occupant has disappeared altogether from box and cabinet. A mysterious performance of this kind leads, as Mr. Maskelyne says, to a host of imitations. "So-called imitations," he terms them, and he describes them as "rubbishy." "I should not mind," he said in his evidence, "if the copies were as good as the original. But," he added, "it does not pay imitators to make copies as good, and therefore it ruins the reputation of the original." So in order, as he says, "to get the interest of the audience," and also "to show the superiority of his 'trick over others,'" Mr. Maskelyne in introducing his box trick was in the habit of offering a reward of £500 to any one who could "discover the secret of his box trick, or produce a correct imitation of it." Although Mr. Maskelyne did not make a set speech when introducing his box trick, it was agreed that the offer was made in those very words. Now, the respondents did not and do not claim to have discovered the secret of Mr. Maskelyne's box trick, but they say they have produced a correct imitation of it. They made a box in size and appearance exactly like Mr. Maskelyne's box. They offered to bring it for Mr. Maskelyne's inspection. He told them in reply that he took no interest in such things, and that they had made a mistake "common among silly applicants for the reward." Then their solicitors wrote to Mr. Maskelyne asking him to give their clients an opportunity of demonstrating their trick. "Surely you must take me for a greenhorn," he replied. "I refuse to inspect your clients' apparatus. If I was to undertake to inspect all the tomfool imitations of my mysteries which are brought to my notice I should have little time for anything else." Though the appellant refused to look at the respondents' box they gave a number of performances in their lodgings. The respondent Evans got into their box and was locked up in it. It was treated just like Mr. Maskelyne's box. It was canvassed and corded and hidden from view by shutting the folding doors in the apartment in which the exhibition took place. After a short interval Mr. Evans signified that he was ready by shooting or knocking at the door. The folding doors were opened. The box was seen to be still canvassed and corded and apparently untouched. On being opened it was found to be empty. A number of witnesses were produced who had been present at these performances. They seemed to be persons of intelligence. Many of them were strangers to the respondents. They had seen the rival box tricks. They declared that there was apparently no difference whatever between them. They were exactly alike, "as like as two peas in a pod," according to one witness. "That," said the plaintiffs' counsel, "is a correct imitation of Mr. Maskelyne's box trick." "No," said the other side, "you cannot have a correct imitation of his box trick without a correct imitation of the mechanism of the trick. You must show that you have found out his secret. There is Mr. Maskelyne's box; let the plaintiffs point out its mechanism." But the plaintiffs would not look at Mr. Maskelyne's box, and on the other hand Mr. Maskelyne would not look at the plaintiffs' box. So the jury, who seem to have thought that they ought to have been admitted behind the scenes, were left to deal with the matter on the evidence before them and the speeches of counsel. After a summing up to which, as it seems to me, no objection can fairly be taken, though isolated passages may be open to criticism, the jury found for the plaintiffs and judgment was given accordingly. The Court of Appeal unanimously refused an application asking that judgment should be entered for the defendant or a new trial directed. The case now comes before your Lordships. The grounds of appeal are the same as those which were presented to the Court below. It was urged that the construction of the offer made by Mr. Maskelyne was for the Judge and not for the jury. In the first place, it is to be observed that the offer was not in writing. It was made by word of mouth, and, although the actual terms of the offer itself are not in dispute, it is impossible to arrive at the true meaning of the offer without taking into consideration everything that passed when the offer was made. It appears to me, therefore, that the question was properly left to the jury, for the reasons which are given fully by Lord Justices A. L. Smith and Collins. But I quite agree with Lord Justice A. L. Smith that it is too late for the appellant to raise the point now. The case was tried twice. It came first before Mr. Justice Wills and a special jury. The question left to the jury was what was the meaning of Mr. Maskelyne's offer. On that occasion the jury were unable to agree. The question was tried again before Mr. Justice Lawrence and another special jury. Again the question was what was the meaning of the offer. The jury found in favour of the contention put forward by the plaintiffs and against Mr. Maskelyne's view. But until the application to the Court of Appeal no suggestion was made that the question was one for the Judge and not for the jury. Indeed, until the verdict was given against him, the leading counsel for the defendant seems to have been just as willing to leave the matter to the jury as the counsel for the plaintiffs were. His contention was that you could not have a correct imitation of Mr. Maskelyne's box trick unless you correctly imitated the mechanism of Mr. Maskelyne's box, and he continually referred to the mechanism in the box as the trick. "How you can," said he, "have a correct imitation with a different trick is a matter for my Lord and the jury to consider." Not, your Lordships will observe, for the consideration of the Judge alone, but for the consideration of the jury as well. It seems to me that, even if the matter were open to doubt, it would be much too late to raise this contention now, having regard to the footing on which both trials were conducted. Then it was said that the parties were not ad idem. Mr. Maskelyne meant one thing by his offer;

the appellants in their acceptance took the offer to mean something else. But if the whole question was one for the jury to determine, surely it was for the jury to say what was the fair meaning of the offer addressed to persons of ordinary intelligence. Then, again, it was said that there was no case to go to the jury. But though I do not say that I should have agreed with the jury, I think there was a case for the jury to consider, and I think that reasonable men considering the matter fairly might have come to the conclusion at which the jury arrived. As Lord Justice Collins says, the jury might naturally ask why did Mr. Maskelyne put his offer in the alternative? If the offer was a reward for the discovery of the secret why did he talk about a correct imitation of his box trick? What did Mr. Maskelyne mean by saying that these imitations ruined the reputation of the original; and, above all, why did he say that he made the offer to show the superiority of his trick above others? One other point was raised. It was said that if the fair meaning of the second alternative of the offer was that the reward might be earned by a correct imitation of the performance of the box trick without imitating correctly the mechanism of Mr. Maskelyne's box, the performance was not complete without the cabinet in which Mr. Maskelyne always placed his box on the stage. That point is, I think, also completely disposed of by the judgment of the Court of Appeal. It seems to be clear upon the evidence that the cabinet was not an essential part of the box trick, and that the reward was offered for a correct imitation (whatever that may mean) of the box trick, without any reference to the cabinet trick, which seems to be a different and an independent trick altogether. On the whole, therefore, it appears to me that there is no ground for disturbing the verdict of the jury. There was no misdirection; the whole case was before the jury. Each party put his view clearly and forcibly, and the jury, as they were entitled to do, chose between them; whether your Lordships' choice would have been the same if your Lordships had been in the place of the jury is not a matter to be considered. I have, therefore, to move that the appeal be dismissed, with costs.

LORD MORRIS dissented, and was in favour of a new trial.

LORD SHAND delivered a judgment agreeing with that of LORD MACNAGHTEN, with whom also LORD DAVEY concurred.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL V. LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY.*

Crown—Prerogative—Right to remove action from County Court to Q.B.D., even after judgment.

This was an appeal from an order of a Divisional Court, consisting of Mr. Justice Ridley and Mr. Justice Darling, reported in The Times of November 11, 1899. Lord Stanley of Alderley was the owner of the surface of land on a mountain called Holyhead Mountain in Anglesey, under a grant in fee in 1840 from the Crown, by which the mines, minerals, and quarries within, upon, or under the land were reserved to the Crown, with full power to the Crown and its assigns to enter upon, work, use, and enjoy the same as fully and effectually to all interests and purposes as if the grant had not been made. The Crown granted a lease of the minerals to Messrs. Wild, who erected on the surface of the land a building for storing dynamite for the purpose of working the quarries of china stone. Lord Stanley of Alderley brought an action in the County Court against Messrs. Wild, claiming £1 damages for trespass by them in entering on the plaintiff's land for the purpose of erecting thereon a building for storing dynamite and other explosive substances, and also for an injunction as hereinafter set out. On July 11, 1899, the County Court Judge gave judgment in favour of Lord Stanley, finding that the erection of the building for storing dynamite was not reasonably necessary for the purpose of working the quarries, and he gave judgment for Lord Stanley for £1 damages, and granted an injunction restraining Messrs. Wild, their servants, agents, and workmen from using or trespassing on the land of the plaintiff at Holyhead Mountain for the purpose of and for erecting thereon a building for storing dynamite and other explosive substances and from committing waste on the land. Messrs. Wild gave notice of appeal to the Queen's Bench Division. On August 12, 1899, the Attorney-General filed an information against Lord Stanley asking that it might be declared that the Crown and its lessees, agents, and servants were entitled to enter upon, work, use, and enjoy china stone and all other mines, minerals, and quarries in, under, and upon the lands conveyed by the deed of 1840, and for that purpose to do and exercise all such acts, powers, and privileges upon or affecting the surface of the lands as might have been done or exercised by the Crown's authority if the surface had not been granted by the deed, and that the rights of the Crown might be declared, and that the Crown and its lessees might be quieted in the possession of the premises; and that the maintenance on the surface of the land and the use of a store for explosives for the purpose of working the quarries of china stone was, as against Lord Stanley, a lawful and proper exercise of the powers reserved to the Crown by the deed; and for an injunction to restrain Lord Stanley from doing any act or taking or continuing any legal proceeding for the purpose of interfering with the store for explosives or with any buildings maintained on the lands, or with acts done or to be done by any lessee or licensee of the Crown in exercise of the surface powers and privileges reserved by the deed, and that all proceedings for the purpose of enforcing the order of the County Court should be stayed. Upon application by the Crown the Divisional Court made an order directing the appeal in the County Court action to be transferred to the Revenue side of the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court, and that all further proceedings in the appeal should be stayed until after the hearing of the information. Lord Stanley appealed. It was contended on his behalf that the Crown was not entitled by virtue of its prerogative right to have proceedings stayed after final judgment. The right of the Crown to have proceedings in which it was interested stayed only applied to proceedings in which final judgment had not yet been obtained, and did not apply to an appeal. "Cawthorne v. Campbell" (1 Anstr., 205); "Attorney-General v. Barker" (L.R. 7, Ex. 177); "Attorney-General v. Constable" (4 Ex. D., 172); "Attorney-General v. St. Aubyn" (Wightw., 167); "Leonard v. Rogers" (cited in Wightw., at p. 204); "Yates v. Dryden" (Cro. Cas., 589); "Attorney-General v. Hallett" (15 M. and W., 97) were referred to.

Mr. Haldane, Q.C., and Mr. Bryn Roberts appeared for Lord Stanley; the Solicitor-General (Sir R. B. Finlay, Q.C.) and Mr. Vaughan Hawkins appeared for the Crown.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

*Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that the first question was whether it was within the prerogative of the Crown to have a cause in the County Court, whatever its position in that Court might be, removed to the Revenue side of the Queen's Bench Division, formerly the Revenue side of the Court of Exchequer. That point was not seriously contested. The first part of the order of the Divisional Court was therefore right. The order went on to direct that all further proceedings on the appeal from the County Court should be stayed until after the hearing of the information. It was objected that the application was made too late, as the Crown had no right to have the action stayed after judgment in it had been delivered. His Lordship could find no authority for such a limitation. Indeed, "Yates v. Dryden" was a direct authority against that view, because thereafter a writ of error was brought, that was, after judgment had been delivered the Attorney-General intervened, and the Court stayed the proceedings on the writ of error. That was a direct authority upon the second part of the order of the Divisional Court staying the appeal in the County Court action pending the hearing of the information. In "Attorney-General v. Barker," Lord Chief Baron Kelly said:—"I feel bound to hold that the Crown has at any time a right to insist upon its claim to land, or upon its right to the establishing of any customs belonging to a manor, by means of a suit instituted by the Crown itself, and is not bound to abide the event of any action or suit in which the Crown, through a subject, is made the real defendant, and can only appear as defendant." The authorities showed that it was part of the prerogative of the Crown to have the action removed and stayed, and that the Crown should become the actor in the litigation involving its rights, and that this could be done after judgment. As to the discretion of the Court apart from the prerogative of the Crown he desired to say nothing.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS agreed. When there was an action between two subjects of the Crown which raised a question of the title of the Crown or some other question in which the Crown was interested, the Crown had two rights, which were not necessarily connected; first, to have the action removed to the Revenue side of the Queen's Bench Division. That removal did not of itself put an end to the action. The form of the action was moulded or modified in such a way as might be necessary for the conduct of the trial when the action was removed. Secondly, the Crown had the right to apply to have the action stayed until the information which raised the same question of right was determined. The case of "Yates v. Dryden" showed that a stay might be obtained without the removal of the action, and "Leonard v. Rogers" showed that there was no objection to the Crown adopting both proceedings at the same time. His Lordship did not wish to say whether the Crown was entitled jure coronæ to an order to stay the action, excluding all question of the discretion of the Court. So far as the removal order was concerned the Crown was entitled to it as of right jure coronæ.

BARSHT V. TAGG.*

*Reported by F. EVANS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was an action by a purchaser for specific performance of a contract annexed to the conditions of sale in respect of three leasehold houses, known as 167, 168, and 169, Elwin-street, Hackney-road, Middlesex, sold by auction at the Mart, on July 7, 1898, the three houses comprising Lot 5 in the particulars of sale. The third condition of sale was as follows:—"Each purchaser is, at the close of the sale to him, to pay down a deposit of £10 per cent. on the amount of his purchase money, and to sign an agreement in the form subjoined to these conditions for the completion of his purchase according to these conditions, and to pay the remainder of his purchase money on the 11th day of August, 1898, at the office of the vendor's solicitor," at which time and place the purchases are to be completed, and a purchaser paying his purchase money is as from that day to be let into possession or receipt of rents and profits, and up to that date all rents, rates, taxes, and outgoings are (if necessary) to be apportioned, and such apportioned rents shall be paid on completion by such purchaser to the vendor. If, from any cause whatever, other than wilful default on the part of the vendor, the completion of the purchase is delayed beyond the before-mentioned day, the remainder of the purchase money is to bear interest at the rate of £6 per cent. per annum from that day to the day of the actual payment thereof, or, at the option of the vendor, he may receive the rents and profits up to the day of the actual completion of the purchase. The property shall, as from the day of sale, be at the sole risk of the purchaser, and the vendor shall not incur any liability by reason of its then or subsequently becoming or remaining untenanted, uninsured, or deteriorated." The plaintiff paid a deposit of 10 per cent. and a title was made out to his satisfaction and was accepted before August 11, but the plaintiff was not then in a position to complete, and did not complete, and the defendant had ever since remained in possession of the property. On November 9, 1898, notices were served, under the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, upon the defendant, as "owner" of the three houses forming Lot 5, that nuisances existed on the houses, the nature of the alleged nuisances being specified in the notices, which required the nuisances to be abated. The defendant, without waiting for any further proceedings to be taken by the public authority, caused the requisite work to be done to the houses and paid the cost of the work, amounting to £24 17s. 3d. As his Lordship pointed out, this sum was not a charge upon the rents, and would have been payable by the defendant even if all the houses had been empty, and the plaintiff would on completion get the houses improved by reason of the expenditure of this money. The plaintiff in February, 1899, was ready to complete, and offered to pay interest at 6 per cent. on the balance of the purchase-money from August 11 on receiving the rents and profits from that date, and in that case to repay the £24 17s. 3d., but he insisted that if the defendant retained the rents and profits since August 11 the defendant ought himself to pay this sum.

Mr. Buckmaster was for the plaintiff; and Mr. Eve, Q.C., and Mr. S. R. Earle were for the defendant, the vendor.

At the conclusion of the arguments his Lordship reserved judgment.

MR. JUSTICE COZENS-HARDY delivered judgment, and after stating the facts continued as follows:—"I think it is settled law that in the absence of any stipulation on the subject the vendor must bear all expenses and outgoings of property sold down to the time when a good title was first shown, so that the purchaser could prudently take possession, and also pay interest on his unpaid purchase money from that time, and as from that time all such expenses and outgoings must be borne by the purchaser; see "Carrodus v. Sharp" (20 Beav., 56). The sum in question is an "outgoing" to which this principle would be applied. See "Tubbs v. Wynne" (L.R. [1897], 1 Q.B., 74). As the title was accepted on or before August 11, I think that, in the absence of any stipulation, the plaintiff would have been entitled, on the one hand, to the rents and profits as from that date, and, on the other hand, would have been bound to repay the sum which the defendant has paid in respect of these outgoing. The question which I have to decide is whether to any and, if so, what extent the position of the parties is altered by the express stipulation contained in Condition 3. Now that condition distinctly provides that, if completion takes place on August 11, all rates, taxes, and outgoing are to be apportioned, and that the purchaser is to pay to the vendor an apportioned part of the current rents which have not yet been received but which in due course the purchaser will receive from the tenants. If, however, the purchaser is not ready to complete on that day, what is to happen? It is clear that the vendor must remain in possession until completion, and it seems to me that an option is given to the vendor. He may say, "You must pay me 6 per cent. interest, and I will account to you for the rents and profits since August 11"; or he may say, "I have in my pocket a certain sum which I have received from tenants since August 11. I will keep that sum and make no claim against you for interest." I do not think that, in that event, he can require the purchaser to make any payment in respect of the apportioned part of the current rents. He can only retain so much of the rents and profits as he has in fact received up to the actual completion. Is there anything in this condition to relieve the plaintiff from the obligation to discharge the outgoing? I think not. I cannot regard the second sentence of the condition as simply making the first sentence applicable to the actual date of completion whenever it may be. There are not in it any words about outgoing or apportionment, and I think it would be wrong to insert them by implication. I may observe that in Key and Elphinstone's Precedents the words "less outgoing" are expressly added. The result is that I think the plaintiff is not entitled to specific performance except on the footing of paying to the defendant, in addition to the balance of the purchase-money, the sum of £24 17s. 3d. I presume the plaintiff elects to complete on that footing. As this is the only question raised the plaintiff must pay the costs of the action less the costs of the day (December 7), when, through the defendant's neglect, the action had to stand over, and those costs of the day must be set off.

DE NICOLS V. CURLIER AND OTHERS.*

International Law—Husband and wife—French law as to community of goods—Change of domicile—Will.

A Frenchman and a Frenchwoman having married in France without entering into any contract altering the French law as to community of goods between husband and wife subsequently acquired a domicile in this country, the husband taking out letters of naturalization as a British subject.

Held, that "movable goods," such as money and securities, acquired by the husband during his domicile here were not affected by his will made here according to English law, so as to deprive his widow of the rights originally vested in her by the French law at her marriage.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (14 The Times L.R., 428) reversed.

This was an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal dated May 19, 1898, reversing an order of Mr. Justice Kekewich of February 3, 1898. The appellant, whose maiden name was Anne Célestine Lacoste, was born in France in 1831 and was the widow of Daniel Nicolas de Nicols, who died on February 28, 1897. The appellant was married to Mr. de Nicols, who was also a Frenchman, and whose name was then Thevenon, at the mayor's office of the third district of Paris on May 30, 1854. No contract of marriage or instrument expressing the conditions of the marriage was executed. The married couple came to England in 1863, and lived there until the husband's death. Mr. de Nicols became a naturalized subject of the Queen in 1865. Establishing themselves in business the appellant and her husband opened the Café Royal in Regent-street and amassed a large fortune. The husband made his will on March 22, 1895, in the English form. The question was whether the law of France in respect of the property of which the husband purported to dispose by his will was applicable so as to override the provisions of the will. The appellant contended that when the domicile became English there existed between her and her husband the sort of partnership known in French law as a community, and that she had a vested right in his share in it, and that a change of domicile did not in this respect affect her legal position. For the respondents it was argued that the principles of English law prevailed in regard to the movable property acquired during the coverture, and that the wife's rights were changed with the change of domicile. The case was argued on June 23 and 27 and on July 3, when their Lordships reserved judgment. The hearing before the Court of Appeal is reported 14 The Times L.R., 428; L.R., 1898, 2 Ch., 60; 67 L.J., Ch., 419.

The Lord Advocate (Mr. Graham Murray, Q.C.) Mr. Westlake, Q.C., Mr. Renshaw, Q.C., and Mr. Ingle Joyce were counsel for the appellant; Mr. Dicey, Q.C., and Mr. Whinney, Mr. Edgar Elgood, and Mr. F. H. Maugham for the respondents.

The LORD CHANCELLOR, in giving judgment, said.—It is not necessary to state with great minuteness how the question in the present appeal arises. It is enough to say that two French subjects were married according to the laws of France on May 30, 1854. No marriage contract or instrument in writing was executed by either of the parties. The parties lived together, and in the year 1863 they came to England, and in the year 1865 the husband obtained the status of a naturalized British subject. The whole dispute turns on the question whether the changed domicile and naturalization of the husband affected the wife's rights so as to give the husband the power to dispose of all the movable property by will instead of being restricted to the power of disposing of only one-half of it, as he undoubtedly would have been so restricted by the French law if the French law is decisive of the question. The parties, as I have said, were married according to French law, and the first thing to do is to see how the matter would be dealt with in respect of such a marriage by the French law. There is no real conflict between the learned persons who have given evidence on this question. One of them, indeed, besides giving evidence as to what the French law is, upon which he is an authority entitled to respect, has also gone on to express an opinion upon how that law should be treated in this country, upon which subject he is no authority at all, and indeed such a question is not the subject of evidence at all, but pure matter of English law for English Courts to decide. The law of France as applicable to the matter now in debate is deposed to by M. Paul Lax, a licentiate of law in the University of France, an advocate who has practised in the Court of Appeal in Paris, and his evidence upon the subject is not really questioned by the gentlemen on the other side. M. Lax says :—" 2. According to the law of France, and in particular Articles 1,393 and 1,401 of the Code, civil parties having intermarried without entering into a formal pre-nuptial contract are governed so far as their present and after acquired property is concerned by the legal system of community of goods as defined by Articles 1,401 to 1,496 in Title V. of the same Code, which title is headed 'Du Contrat de mariage et des droits respectifs de époux.' 3. The husband and wife having so intermarried without entering into a pre-nuptial contract in writing are placed by the sole fact of the marriage and stand exactly in the same position in all respects as if previously to their marriage they had in due form executed a written contract, and thereby adopted as special and expressed covenants all and every one of the provisions contained in Articles 1,401 to 1,496 above referred to. 4. Subject to the exceptions specified in the next following paragraph the community of goods includes (1) all personal property belonging to the husband and wife at the date of the marriage or having devolved upon either of them during coverture ; (2) all interest or income of whatever nature and source accrued or received during coverture ; (3) all real estate acquired during coverture (Article 1,401 Code Civil). 5. Real estate possessed by either spouse at the time of the marriage or that may during coverture devolve upon him or her by way of inheritance, gift inter vivos or will, exclusive of real property acquired during coverture by any other means whatever does not become common property, but remains the separate property of the spouse so possessing the same or upon whom the same has so devolved, and any real estate is deemed to be common property unless it is clearly proved that either husband or wife possessed the same previous to the marriage or became entitled to it during coverture by way of inheritance, gift inter vivos or will, as aforesaid (Articles 1,402 and 1,404 Code Civil). 6. The administration of the common property belongs to the husband alone, who may sell, deal with, and mortgage the same without the wife's concurrence (Article 1,421 Code Civil). The common property, real as well as personal, stands or is invested in the name of the husband alone. 7. In the case of a legal community of goods any trade or business carried on either by the husband alone or by the husband and wife jointly is necessarily carried on for the account and benefit or at the risk of the community of goods. The whole assets of the said community, also the husband's separate real estate, if any, and the husband himself personally in infinitum are liable for the debts of such trade or business, the wife not being liable for the same except to the extent of her share in the common property. The name of the husband alone appears in the firm or style of any trade or business carried on as aforesaid. 8. In case any real estate which remains the separate property of either spouse has been disposed of and the purchase consideration has not been reinvested in the name of the one to whom such real estate belonged but has been merged in the common property the spouse whose separate property the real estate so disposed of was is on the winding up of the community of goods preferentially entitled to receive out of the common property the amount of the purchase consideration referred to (Article 1470 Code Civil). 9. The community of goods when once constituted between husband and wife and whether created by an instrument in writing or by the operation of Articles 1,393 and 1,400 of the Code Civil cannot cease or be determined by mutual consent or by any cause or event whatever except the following—that is to say (1) decease, (2) divorce, (3) judicial separation, (4) separation of estates decreed by a competent Court of Justice." If this is the law by which the matter is to be governed, it cannot be denied that the appellants here must succeed, and it is a little difficult to understand upon what principle contracts and obligations already existing inter se should be affected by an act of one of the contracting parties, over which the other party to the contract has no control whatever. And, indeed, it is not denied that if, instead of the law creating these obligations upon the mere performance of the marriage, the parties had themselves by written instrument recited in terms the very contract the law makes for them, that in that case the change of domicile could not have affected such written contract. I am wholly unable to understand why the mere putting into writing the very same contract which the law created between them without any writing at all should bar the husband from altering the contract relations between himself and his wife, when if the law creates that contract relation then the husband is not barred from getting rid of the obligation which upon his marriage the law affixed to the transaction. A written contract is after all only the evidence of what the parties have agreed to, and it would seem to be of no superior force as evidencing the agreement of the parties than a known consequence of entering into the married status. I not only do not understand, but I should decline to assent to any such view, unless I am compelled by authoritative decision or statute to adopt a view which to my mind is so entirely unreasonable. And it does not appear to me that any Court before whom this question has come would disagree with me as to its being unreasonable. The Master of the Rolls himself says :—" It is not altogether satisfactory to hold that a change of domicile cannot affect an expert contract embodying the law of the matrimonial domicile, but that a change of domicile does affect the application of that law if not embodied in an express contract." My Lords, I should think that in order to be binding on your Lordships, a previous decision must be in principle, and as applicable to the same circumstances, identical, and it appears to me that the case by which the Master of the Rolls thought himself bound—"Lashley v. Hogg"—is quite distinguishable both in principle and circumstances. To omit other questions, the cardinal distinction between the French and the Scotch law is not, I think, without an important bearing upon the very question in debate, and I think it may be stated shortly thus :—If the wife by the marriage in Scotland acquired no proprietary rights whatever, but only what is called a hope of a certain distribution upon the husband's death, it is intelligible that that right of distribution, or by whatever name it is called, should be dependent upon the husband's domicile as following the ordinary rule that the law of a person's domicile regulates the succession of his movable property. But if by the marriage the wife acquires as part of that contract relation a real proprietary right, it would be quite unintelligible that the husband's act should dispose of what was not his, and herein, I think, is to be found the key to Lord Eldon's judgment. He says :—" The true point seems to be this, whether there is anything irrational in saying that as the husband during the whole of his life has the absolute disposition over the property, that, as to him, whom the policy of the law has given the direction of the family as to the place of its residence, that he who has therefore this species of command over his own actions, and over the actions and property which is his own, and which is to remain his own, or to become that of his family according to his will—why should it be thought an unreasonable thing, that, where there is no express contract, the implied contract shall be taken to be that the wife is to look to the law of the country where the husband dies for the right she is to enjoy in case the husband thinks proper to die intestate." It will be observed that the whole point of what Lord Eldon argues—that the whole of the property, apart from express contract, is absolutely and entirely the husband's, and that as by law he can dispose of it as he will it is not unreasonable that he should be at liberty to do something which by its legal effect will change what, I think, are inaccurately described as the rights of the wife, but are accurately described as what would have been the rights of the wife if no change had taken place, because in substance she has until the husband's death no rights at all. Doubtless it is true that, according to the authorities on Scotch law, the right of the wife is no right at all in its strict sense. When speaking of the jus mariti it is described as a legal assignation to the husband, and in commenting on this authority the late Mr. Fraser, while at the Scotch Bar, in his book on "The Law of Husband and Wife," 2nd edition, Vol. I., p. 677, says:—"At a very early period of our law, the distinction between the two rights was recognized. The right of administration was regarded as being nothing more than its name imports—a right of administering the property of the spouses, while the jus mariti was something separate and superior, its purpose being to transfer the property from one spouse to the other. The distinction is settled and taken in a number of cases, ranging from an early period to the present time, and has not been so clearly marked in some institutional works, solely from the desire of the writers to reconcile it with the notion of an absolute veritable communio." . . . "The distinction is thus stated in argument in the session papers of 'Gowan v. Pursell.' The jus mariti over the movables is a right during the existence of the marriage of absolute property. The husband may sell, or squander, or wastefully destroy the movables that fall under communion." How different the position of the wife is under the French law is sufficiently indicated in contrast to the above extract by section 1,443 of Code Civil, which enacts that:—"1,443. A separation of property can only be judicially sued for by the wife whose dowry is in danger, and when the disorder of the husband's affairs is such that there is reason to fear that his property will not be sufficient to satisfy the wife's rights and claims. Any voluntary separation is void." And if the propositions are put shortly—that the wife acquires no proprietary rights by marriage under the Scotch law at all, but under the French law acquires a real proprietary right, the distinction between the two systems is evident enough. The communio bonorum in Scotland is a mere fiction. In France it is a reality, and in England, as the Master of the Rolls says, the parties to the litigation now being discussed, Mr. and Mrs. Hog, were both English, married in England, where her unsettled property existing, and after acquired, became the property of Mr. Hog by the mere fact of the marriage, and gave Mrs. Hog no proprietary right whatever to the movable property in question. Once it is admitted that the marriage gives a proprietary right, and therein is the importance of the distinction Lord Eldon took between what was inaccurately argued in that case as a proprietary right conferred by the fact of marriage and a real proprietary right conferred by specific contract, the anomaly pointed out by the Master of the Rolls and sought to be explained becomes at once intelligible. It is only material as illustrating what was the prevailing train of thought in the minds of Lord Eldon and Lord Rosslyn. Both of them speak of the words "implied contract," by which I presume they implied from the relation of husband and wife, and not unnaturally they deduce the conclusion that if it is implied from that relation only the husband's change of domicile may bring with it the consequential change from such relation. Here, however, as I have endeavoured to point out, the French marriage confers not only an implied but an actual binding partnership proprietary relation fixed by the law upon the persons of the spouses, the binding nature of which it appears to me no act of either of the parties contracting marriage can affect or qualify. I can only account for the absolutely inaccurate use of the Scotch term jus relictae as arising from a reference to a dispute that appears to have existed in the Scotch authors as to whether those rights flowed from the communion, whereas, to quote again from Mr. Fraser's book, p. 671, where he says:—"It has been found, in accordance with the opinions of the French commentators, of Dirleton, and other lawyers of our own country, that the jus relictae and legitim are in all respects the same; that they are mere casual contingent rights during the subsistence of the marriage, existing then only in hope, and coming into proper rights merely at its dissolution, that they are not rights of division of a fund already held in common, but rights of debt against the husband's executors, constituting the widow and the children creditors, whose right comes into being by the husband's death, and secondary creditors too, for all other debts must be paid before theirs." It is therefore, as I understand, than when once Lord Eldon came to the conclusion that the husband and wife had become Scotch domiciled spouses the property not affected by a previous complete and irrevocable right would properly be distributed according to Scotch law. It follows, therefore, if I am right, that that case is not binding on your Lordships, and that we are at liberty to decide the question now in dispute in accordance with reason and common sense. I therefore move your Lordships that the order appealed from be reversed, the costs to be costs in the summons.

LORD MACNAGHTEN, after stating the facts, said:—"The question for your lordships' consideration is whether Mr. and Mrs. De Nicols continued subject to the system of community of goods after they became domiciled in England. On the one hand, it is contended that the change of domicile from French to English destroyed the community altogether, and therefore that the testator's will operated upon the whole of the property vested in him which, but for that change, would have been common. On the other hand, it is said that the community continued notwithstanding the change of domicile, and that Mr. De Nicols remained bound by the article of the Code Civil, which provides that a testamentary donation by the husband cannot exceed his share of the community. If the case were not embarrassed by the judgment of this House in "Lashley v. Hog" (Scotch Appeal Cases, 4 Paton, 581), which was discussed so fully at the Bar, it would not, I think, present much difficulty. Putting aside "Lashley v. Hog" for the moment, the only question would seem to be what was the effect, according to French law, of the marriage of Mr. and Mrs. De Nicols without a marriage contract? Upon that point there cannot, I think, be any room for doubt. It is proved by the evidence of M. Lax, the expert in French law called on behalf of the appellant, that, according to the law of France, a husband and wife intermarrying without having entered into an ante-nuptial contract in writing are placed by the sole fact of the marriage and stand precisely in the same position in all respects as if pre-viciously to their marriage they had in due form executed a written contract, and thereby adopted as special and express covenants all and every one of the provisions contained in Articles 1,401 to 1,496 in Title V. of the Code Civil, headed "of marriage contracts and the respective rights of spouses." In support of this conclusion M. Lax refers to the relevant articles of the Code and to a decision of the highest authority pronounced by the Cour de Cassation in January, 1854. The case as reported by Sirey presents the argument so clearly and so concisely that I may be pardoned for referring to it more in detail. The summary in Sirey's Reports is as follows:—"The conjugal association as to property once formed at the time of the marriage by the operation of the law of the domicile or nationality of the husband cannot be altered later on either by a change of nationality or by the acquisition of a new personal domicile subsequently to the marriage." The case was this—an Englishman and an Englishwoman—Mr. and Mrs. Boyer were married in England without any settlement. Afterwards they went to France and jointly acquired immovable property there. The husband became a French citizen. The wife died first. On her death duty was demanded and paid on one-half of the property as having devolved upon her children as her next-of-kin. An action was brought for return of the duty. The tribunal of Lille ordered repayment, holding that "the matrimonial compact in respect of property is as immutable as the marriage itself of which it is an accessory." The Revenue authorities appealed. The Cour de Cassation affirmed the decision. They founded their judgment upon their view of English law, which seems right enough, and upon the following considerations—that "the rule of the marriage of the spouses Boyer has followed them to France when they went there to settle and there acquired property," and that "the said rule has the same force as if a formal contract had been entered into between the said spouses for the regulation of their fortune." Although this reasoning may not seem quite in accordance with the opinion which Lord Eldon expressed in Lashley v. Hog "as to the effect of an English marriage without a settlement, it indicates, I think, the view which according to French law would be taken of the compact as to property constituted by a French marriage under the Code Civil without an ante-nuptial agreement. The expert who was called on behalf of the executors, does not attempt to contravene this conclusion of law. He endeavours to minimize its effect by treating it as a self-evident proposition—as in fact being nothing more than what the code declares. He adds, however, that, in his opinion, the effect of a change of domicile or nationality upon the community system was never considered by the framers of the code. That may be so. But if there was a valid compact between the spouses as to their property, whether it was constituted by the law of the land or by convention between the parties, it is difficult to see how that compact can be nullified or blotted out merely by a change of domicile. Why should the obligations of the marriage law under which the parties contracted matrimony, and which according to the law of the country where the marriage was celebrated are equivalent to an express contract, lose their force and effect when the parties become domiciled in another country? As M. Lax points out, change of domicile and naturalization in a foreign country are not among the events specified in the code as having the effect of dissolving or determining the community. Let us suppose a case the converse of the present one. Suppose an Englishman and an Englishwoman, having married in England without a settlement, go to France and become domiciled here. Suppose that at the time of the acquisition of the French domicile the husband has £10,000 of his own. Why should his ownership of that sum be impaired or qualified because he settles in France? There is nothing to be found in French law, nothing in the Code Civil to effect this alteration in his rights. Community of goods in France is constituted by a marriage in France according to French law, not by married people coming to France and settling there. And community must commence from the day of the marriage. It cannot commence from any other time. It appears to me, therefore, that the proposition for which the executors contend cannot be supported on principle. That, I think, was the view of the Court of Appeal. But they considered that the judgment of Lord Eldon in Lashley v. Hog "compelled them to decide in favour of the executors. Mr. and Mrs. Roger Hog, an Englishman and an Englishwoman, intermarried in England without a settlement. Mr. Hog made a fortune in England, settled in Scotland, and became domiciled there. After this change of domicile the wife died in the lifetime of the husband. Some years later the husband died a domiciled Scotchman. There was a good deal of litigation as to the administration of Mr. Hog's estate, and there were appeals to this House. In one of these appeals, among other things, this House determined that Mrs. Lashley, who was one of the children of the marriage, had "a claim in right of her mother, the wife of the said Mr. Roger Hog, who at the time of her death had his domicile in Scotland, to a share of the movable estate of her father at the time of her mother's death." No doubt, if the law had not been altered by the Act 18 Vict., c. 23, s. 6, that decision would be binding upon this House in a similar case. But when you are asked to apply the decision to a case where the circumstances are different it seems to me that the proper course is to ascertain, if you can, the principle of the decision and then to see if that principle is applicable to the circumstances of the case under consideration. This is the case of a French marriage with a settlement prescribed and constituted by the law of the land and followed by naturalization in a foreign country. Lashley v. Hog was the case of an English marriage without a settlement and a change of residence to another part of the United Kingdom. Now what was the principle on which Lord Eldon proceeded? After a long discussion Lord Eldon comes to the point by asking this question:—"Why should it be thought an unreasonable thing that where there is no express contract the implied contract should be taken to be that the wife is to look to the law of the country where the husband dies for the right she is to enjoy, in case the husband thinks proper to die intestate?" Then his Lordship goes on to say:—"This has been the principle which it seems to me has been adopted, as far as we can collect what has been the principle adopted in cases in those parts of the island with which we are best acquainted; and, not being aware that there has been any decision which will countervail this, thinking that it squares infinitely better with those principles upon which your Lordships have already decided in this case, it does appear to me, attending to the different sentiments to be found in the text writers upon the subject, that it is more consonant to our own laws, and more consonant to the general principle, to say that the implied contract is that the rights of the wife shall shift with the change of residence of the wife, that change of residence being accomplished by the will of the husband, whom, by the marriage contract in this instance, she is bound to obey." I may observe in passing that in that passage Lord Eldon was referring to the difference of practice in the administration of intestates' effects then prevailing in the different provinces of York and Canterbury, and also to a previous decision in the case of Lashley v. Hog "on the question. It is not, I think, very easy to see how the principle which Lord Eldon selects as the ground of his decision could in the case of an English marriage and the subsequent acquisition of a Scotch domicile be legitimately extended so as to deprive the husband of his own property, and transfer it in his lifetime to the next-of-kin of his wife. It seems to me that the result can only be reached by one or other of two alternatives. Either it must be held that the implied contract on the part of the husband is that in case of a change of a domicile the wife shall enjoy all the rights of a woman married in the country where the new domicile is established, and that he will surrender in her favour so much of his rights as may be inconsistent therewith; or else it must be assumed that marriage in Scotland is not required to create communion of goods, but that communion of goods is incidental to the status of married persons in Scotland; or, as Lord Eldon puts it, "the law of Scotland 'recognizes' communion of goods 'in the married state.'" Now, if that assumption be necessary in order to support Lord Eldon's conclusion in "Lashley v. Hog," it is obvious that there is so wide a divergence between the law of Scotland, or what is assumed to be the law of Scotland, and the law of France as to make the decision inapplicable to the present case. If, on the other hand, Lord Eldon's conclusion is a legitimate extension or development of the principle on which his argument is founded, it seems to me that there is no room for the application of the principle in the circumstances of the present case. The principle, as Lord Eldon explains, is founded on the notion that upon an English marriage without an express settlement there is an implied contract that the expectations of the wife are to depend upon the domicile of the husband. Lord Eldon admits, and it was conceded at the Bar, that, if there had been a written contract dealing with the whole property of the spouses present and future, the principle of "Lashley v. Hog" could not apply. Now the effect of what took place on the occasion of the French marriage, so far as it amounted to a compact in respect to property, must, I think, be determined by French law, and it has been proved by the evidence in this case that what did take place was to all intents and purposes, according to the law of France, equivalent to a written contract. It appears to me, therefore, that the case is not governed by the decision in "Lashley v. Hog," and I think the appeal ought to be allowed.

LORD MORRIS and LORD SHAND concurred.

LORD BRAMPTON, in the course of his judgment, stated the facts, quoted at considerable length the relevant provisions of the Code Civil, and then continued thus:—It was under this system, which had been for nearly half a century a very familiar and approved form of settlement, the nature and provisions of which the parties as French subjects must be presumed to have had knowledge, they were married; and upon the faith and under the belief that its provisions would regulate the property of both so long as their married life continued, and that on the death of either it would be divided between the survivor and the representatives of the deceased, the wife placed in the possession of her husband as part of the capital of their "conjugal partnership" such little property as she could then call her own; and from that time until the death of her husband it was never suggested that with the change of domicile to England the rights of property the wife had acquired by her marriage in France vested in her husband as absolute owner, as if they had been married in England without any settlement at all. The Married Women's Property Acts do not, in my opinion, affect the present case. His Lordship then discussed at large the case of "Lashley v. Hog," and in concluding his judgment said:—It is conceded that, had the provisions of the system been embodied in the very words of the Code in an instrument signed by the parties expressing their intention to marry under it, it would be unobjectionable, and as valid in an English Court as a special agreement of the parties made under Article 1,383. This may at least be taken as an admission that there is nothing in the system itself repugnant to the law of England, and this reduces the objection to one merely of form. What, then, is the weight of this objection if all required by the law of France has been observed? I have always been under the impression that the form required for a contract by the law of the place where it is made is both sufficient and requisite for its validity in England. In this case every form required by the Code Civil has been complied with, and I see nothing to prevent the operation of the rule that where there is a marriage contract or settlement the terms of such contract or settlement determine the rights of husband and wife in respect of all movables to which it applies. As a rule the rights of spouses conferred by the law of one country change with every change of domicile, for the law of one country can have no intrinsic force except within the territorial limits and jurisdiction of that country. But the comity of nations, with a view to the comfort and convenience of their respective subjects, has rightly conceded that there should be some exceptions to this strict rule of the territorial law. By one of such exceptions it is universally admitted that where, upon marriage, a marriage contract or settlement is made regulating the property of the spouses, such contract or settlement shall have effect given to its provisions, wherever the spouses may afterwards be domiciled. When "Lashley v. Hog" was decided in July, 1804, the Code Civil had only been promulgated about five months; this may account for no mention having been made of it. What might have been held had the question then arisen in an English Court, as to how far it should be allowed to operate under circumstances similar to those before us, I cannot of course say, for in itself it was an untried novelty. It seems strange that no such question has been raised and decided in an English Court hitherto. In dealing with it to-day, we have the benefit of nearly a century's experience before us of the cheerful and ready submission to and approval of this system and enactment so admirably calculated to satisfy the requirements of French spouses by millions of the subjects of a great and powerful country. I am sanguine enough under such circumstances to entertain a hope that your Lordships will, in declaring the law of this land, think it right to accord to this system and enactment a place with contracts and settlements as exceptions to the rule of territorial law—even apart from the question of contract, which I have discussed—and carry out the real wishes and advance the interests of the many subjects of France whose properties in their own country are, and in the future will be, regulated by it. Thinking as I do that this case falls within the exceptions engrafted by the comity of nations upon the strict rule of the territorial law, I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be reversed, and that of Mr. Justice Kekewich restored, and that judgment should be entered for the plaintiff with costs.

The decision of the Court of Appeal was therefore reversed, and that of Mr. Justice Kekewich restored.

FRANCIS V. TURNER BROTHERS.*

Master and Servant—Master's liability to servant

*Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, sec. 7, subs. 1.

The words employment "on, in, or about a factory" mean at the factory which is occupied by the employers, and do not include employment at another factory.

This was an appeal from the decision of the Newtown County Court Judge in proceedings to assess compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. The appellant was a labourer in the employment of the respondents, who were the owners and occupiers of a factory. On November 14, 1898, the appellant was sent by the respondents with three other workmen to the cloth factory of the Severn Tweed Company to remove from the engine-shed an old disused steam engine which the respondents had purchased. According to the evidence the men had to remove two cog wheels and the shafting, and then the frame. There was a prop on the frame which ran up to some iron girders upon which two tanks rested. The prop had to be removed, and inquiry was made whether the prop supported anything, and the men were told that it could be knocked down. When the prop was knocked down the tanks came down and fell upon the respondents' men, killing two of them and seriously injuring the appellant. It appeared from the evidence that Mr. Turner, one of the respondents, came to the Severn Tweed Company's mills once or twice during the work. The Severn Company's machinery was driven by steam or gas, and their carding machine was working close to the respondents' workmen. In the back part of the engine-shed an engine was going and pumping water for steam power for the mills. It was admitted that the accident arose out of and in the course of the appellant's employment. The Severn Company's factory was 860 yards from the respondents' factory by the footpath, and rather further off by the road. The County Court Judge held that the employment of the appellant was not an employment on, in, or about a factory within the meaning of section 7 subsection 1 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, and he accordingly dismissed the application to assess compensation.

Mr. ELLIS GRIFFITH and Mr. H. C. DAVENPORT, for the appellant, contended that the Act applied to an accident happening to the appellant in the Severn Company's factory. It was not necessary that the accident should happen at his employers' factory, if the workman was sent on his employers' business to work at another factory. Section 7 subsection 1 of the Act of 1897 spoke of employment by the undertakers "on, in, or about a factory," not "the" factory. Secondly, the respondents were the occupiers for the time being of the engine-shed at the Severn Company's mills, and were, therefore, the occupiers of a factory within the meaning of section 23 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895. The word "undertakers" was defined by section 7 subsection 2 of the Act of 1897 as meaning the occupier of a factory within the meaning of the Factory and Workshop Acts, 1878 to 1895. Section 93 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, was also referred to.

Mr. Ruegg, Q.C., and Mr. A. Powell, for the respondents, were not called upon.

The Court dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that there could be no doubt about the case. The respondents were the occupiers of a factory, and if the accident to the appellant had happened there the Act would have applied. The respondents had bought an engine which was in a factory about half a mile away from their own factory, and their workmen were sent to remove the engine to their factory. The first question was whether the employment in which the accident happened was an employment by the undertakers "on, in, or about a factory" within section 7 subsection 1 of the Act. In his Lordship's opinion those words meant employment at the factory which was occupied by the employers and where the employers carried on their business. The words did not include employment at another factory. It was then said that the respondents were the occupiers of a factory within the Severn Company's mills within the meaning of the Act. They were clearly not the occupiers, of the factory in the ordinary sense. But the word "undertakers" was defined as meaning the occupiers of a factory within the meaning of the Factory and Workshop Acts, 1878 to 1895. There was only one possible section in those Acts which could be relied upon—namely, section 23 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895. That section only said, so far as material to the present case, that certain provisions of the Factory Acts, relating to the fencing of machinery, &c., should have effect as if all machinery and plant used in the process of loading or unloading from or to a dock, wharf, quay, or warehouse, and any premises on which machinery worked by steam, water, or other mechanical power was temporarily used for the purpose of the construction of a building or any structural work in connexion with a building, were included in the word factory, and the person so using the machinery should be deemed to be the occupier of a factory. That provision did not apply to the present case. It was a special legislative provision as to such machinery and such premises. The appeal must be dismissed.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS and LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS concurred.

Mr. F. H. MELLOR, who appeared for the Severn Tweed Company, said that a third party notice had been served on them by the respondents under section 6 of the Act of 1897, and he asked that their costs of the appeal should be paid by the respondents. They were bound to appear in the County Court to defend their rights.

Mr. RUEGG said that no notice to appear on the appeal had been served on the Severn Tweed Company, and

The Court thereupon said that the Severn Company were not entitled to their costs.

THE LONDON AND WESTMINSTER BANK V. THE COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE.*

Revenue—Stamp duty—Exemptions—Sched. I., "Receipt" exemption 11—Stamp Act, 1891.

A duly stamped scrip certificate for £100 was issued upon payment of the allotment money, the balance being payable in two monthly instalments. At the foot of the certificate there were two blank forms of receipt for payment of the two instalments respectively. As the instalments were paid the receipts were filled in. Held, that the receipts were exempt from stamp duty under Exemption 11, Title "Receipt," in Schedule 1 to the Stamp Act, 1891.

*Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was an appeal by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue from the judgment of the Divisional Court (Mr. Justice Day and Mr. Justice Lawrance), upon a case stated by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, pursuant to section 13 of the Stamp Act, 1891; reported in 68 L.J., Q.B., 787. On May 10, 1899, two receipts, partly in print and partly in writing, appearing upon the face of a scrip certificate of the Cape of Good Hope Consolidated Three per Cent. stock, were presented on behalf of the London and Westminster Bank to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue under section 12 of the Stamp Act, 1891, for the opinion of the Commissioners as to the stamp duty with which they were chargeable. The scrip certificate and the receipts respectively were in the following form:—

“Cape of Good Hope Consolidated Three per Cent. stock. Issue of £3,107,400. Scrip certificate for £100. The bearer of this scrip certificate is entitled to £100 Cape of Good Hope Consolidated Three per Cent. stock, 1933-1943, after payment to the London and Westminster Bank (Limited), Lothbury, of the instalments due thereon as under, viz.:—£40 on April 10, 1899, £40 on May 10, 1899. Payment in full may be made at any time, under discount at the rate of 2 per cent. per annum. If default be made in payment of the amounts at their due dates, the previous payments will be liable to forfeiture. This scrip certificate, when fully paid, must be lodged at the London and Westminster Bank (Limited), Lothbury, for inscription in the ‘books of the ‘Cape of Good Hope Consolidated Three per Cent. stock, 1933-1943,’ in such name or names (not exceeding four) as may be desired. The interest on the stock will be payable at the London and Westminster Bank (Limited) on February 1 and August 1 in each year, and the principal will be repayable there on February 1, 1943, the Government of the Cape of Good Hope having the option to redeem the stock at par on or after February 1, 1933, on giving 12 calendar months’ notice to the stockholders. Six months’ interest on the stock will be paid on August 1, 1899. The revenues of the colony of the Cape of Good Hope alone are liable in respect of this stock and the dividends thereon, and the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom, and the Commissioners of her Majesty’s Treasury are not directly or indirectly liable or responsible for the payment of the stock or of the dividends thereon, or for any matter relating thereto, 49 and 41 Vict., cap. 59, section 19.—For the London and Westminster Bank (Limited), J. A. BAKER, London, March 14, 1899.

“Received the 10th day of April, 1899, £40, being the instalment on the above scrip certificate, due April 10, 1899.—For the London and Westminster Bank (Limited), J. L. OVINGTON.”

“Received the 10th day of May, 1899, payment in full.—For the London and Westminster Bank (Limited), H. E. BILLINGE.”

The scrip certificate was duly stamped as such with the duty of 1d., and the London and Westminster Bank contended that by reason of exemption 11 under the head “Receipt” in schedule 1 to the Stamp Act, 1891, the receipts were exempt from duty. The Commissioners, being of opinion that the exemption was not applicable, assessed each of the receipts with the duty of 1d. The questions for the opinion of the Court were—(1) Whether the receipts or either of them were chargeable with the duty of 1d. in accordance with the assessment of the Commissioners; (2) if not, with what duty they were respectively chargeable. The Divisional Court held that the receipts were exempt. The Inland Revenue Commissioners appealed. The material provisions of the Stamp Act, 1891, are set out in the judgment given below

The Solicitor-General (Sir R. B. Finlay, Q.C.) and Mr. Danckwerts appeared for the Commissioners; Mr. McIntyre (Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., with him) appeared for the respondents.

The COURT, having taken time to consider, delivered judgment dismissing the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS read the following judgment of the Court:—This is an appeal by the Crown from the decision of Mr. Justice Day and Mr. Justice Lawrance allowing an appeal from the Commissioners. The question is whether certain receipts endorsed on a scrip certificate for £100 Cape of Good Hope Consolidated Three per Cent. stock are liable to a duty of 1d. each under the Stamp Act, 1891, first schedule, or whether they fall within the exemption (11). The scrip certificate, so far as material, is in these terms. His Lordship read the material parts of the certificate and the receipts, and continued:—The following is the provision of the Stamp Act, 1891, Schedule 1:—“Receipt given for or upon the payment of money amounting to £2 or upwards, 1d.” Exemption 11 is as follows:—“Receipt endorsed or otherwise written upon, or contained in any instrument liable to stamp duty, and duly stamped, acknowledging the receipt of the consideration money therein expressed, or the receipt of any principal money, interest, or annuity thereby secured or therein mentioned.” The scrip certificate had been duly stamped as such, and on the date of its issue the first instalment, a sum under £20, had been paid in respect of it. We are of opinion that the decision of the Divisional Court was right. The scrip certificate is duly stamped, and the receipts are endorsed respectively or otherwise written upon it. Therefore if they “acknowledge the receipt of the consideration money therein expressed,” they fall within the exemption. What then is meant by the “consideration money therein expressed” of which the receipt is to be acknowledged? We think it is the money which it appears from the terms of the instrument is the consideration for the obligation undertaken by the issuer of the instrument—i.e., the Government of the colony. It is in return for the payment not of one, but of all the instalments, that the Government undertakes this obligation, and it can make no difference whether the consideration is paid in a lump sum, or by instalments, or with conditions of forfeiture on non-payment of an instalment or not. Neither is it material that the instrument can be transferred pending the payment of the instalments, so that each may be paid by a different person. The money consideration is the same by whomsoever it is paid, and whatever may be the conditions to which it is made subject. The point made by the Crown in the Court below, that the scrip certificate is not “an instrument” within the exemption, was not taken before us; but it was argued by the Solicitor-General that the consideration for the certificate was not the sums of £40, or either of them mentioned in the receipts, but the first instalment paid on the issuing of the certificate. We think, with deference, that there is a fallacy in this argument, in that it confounds that which is payable as a condition precedent to getting the custody of the certificate with that which is expressed in the certificate as the consideration, not for the handing over of the certificate with the inchoate rights arising therefrom, but for the acceptance of the final obligation which is only assumed when all the instalments are paid. Is the consideration expressed in an instrument as the total sum in return for which the obligation is accepted any the less the consideration because it is made payable by instalments, and the custody of the instrument is handed over in exchange for the first instalment? In our opinion the receipts on this instrument acknowledge the payment of the full sum in return for which, by the terms of the instrument, the Cape Government undertake to treat the holder as entitled to 25% Cape of Good Hope Consolidated 3 per Cent. stock. The Crown also relied upon section 3, subsection 2, which enacts that "if more than one instrument be written upon the same piece of material, every one of the instruments is to be separately and distinctly stamped with the duty with which it is chargeable"; but this only applies if the instruments do not fall within exemption 11 above set out. We cannot say whether our reasons coincide with those of the Divisional Court, for they have given none; but on the grounds above stated, we are of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed.

*WALKER V. WHITAKER BROTHERS LIMITED.

Master and Servant—Master's liability to servant—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897—"Accident arising out of and in the course of the employment."

This was an appeal from the decision of the Hull County Court Judge (Judge Raikes, Q.C.) in proceedings to assess compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. The respondent, a boy of 15 years of age, was in the employment of the appellants, who were contractors in a large way of business, and who at the time of the accident were engaged in constructing a dock at Hull. There was a railway line used and worked by them for the construction of the dock. The respondent had been employed by the appellants as a signaller, but at the time of the accident he was employed to grease the wheels and axles of the railway trucks. On October 15, 1898, he had finished greasing the trucks that were ready for him, and had to wait for more trucks. He went to a fire which was a short distance away from the place where he had been greasing the trucks, the fire being close to a lever used for moving points. All trucks coming to him were passing that spot. The handle of the lever was away from the line, and the respondent sat on the handle to warm himself at the fire. He saw an engine with trucks coming along the line, up an incline, and, thinking that the points were against the engine, he began to pull the lever over to open them, when the engine came on and took the lever over with a jerk, the lever throwing him against the engine. He was so injured that his leg had to be amputated. The lever was in the middle of the line, and there was evidence that the points had been left so that the engine would have crossed them. The respondent had not been told not to touch the lever, but it was no part of his duty to do so. There was a boy whose duty it was to look after the points, but he was about 20 yards away at the time. The questions were (1) whether the accident arose "out of and in the course of the employment" within section 1, or section 1, of the Act of 1897; and (2) whether the injury was attributable to the serious and wilful misconduct of the respondent. The County Court Judge found in favour of the respondent. He said that the respondent was not neglecting any duty at the time of the accident; that he was only waiting for more trucks to come to be greased, and he was under no obligation to stay or stand in any particular place until the trucks arrived; and that he was in the course of his employment when the accident happened. He also held that the respondent was not guilty of serious and wilful misconduct.

Mr. W. H. Owen appeared for the appellants.

Mr. H. T. Kemp, for the respondent, was not called upon.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that the boy was engaged on the day of the accident in greasing the wheels of the trucks. He had greased all the trucks that were ready for him, and he had then to wait for others. What was he to do while waiting? There was a fire not far from the place where he had greased the trucks, and he sat down on a lever to warm himself by it. The County Court Judge came to the conclusion upon the evidence that the story told by the boy was true. An engine and trucks came along the line, and the boy was thrown against the engine and injured. The only question they had to decide was whether there was evidence upon which the County Court Judge could find that the accident arose out of and in the course of the boy's employment. It was the boy's duty to wait for the other trucks. In his Lordship's opinion there was evidence to justify the finding of the Judge. He would go further and say that he thought the County Court Judge was right. Again, upon the evidence the Judge was justified in finding that there was no serious and wilful misconduct.

*WALKER V. LITTLE HALL COMPANY LIMITED.

Master and Servant—Master's liability to servant—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897—"Accident," what is.

The word "accident" implies the happening of something fortuitous and unexpected. Therefore, where an engine-fitter was fixing steampipe joints for which purpose red lead was used, and in consequence of a blister on his finger the red lead poisoned the finger, it was held that the injury was not caused by an "accident."

This was an appeal from the decision of the Judge of the Bow County Court (Judge French, Q.C.), in proceedings to assess compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. The appellant was an engine-fitter in the employment of the respondents, who were engineers and ironfounders. The appellant on April 17, 1899, was working for the respondents at the Abley Mills, West Ham, fixing some machinery there. He was working at steampipe joints for a machine, it being the duty of a labourer to put red lead on the joints, the appellant having then to screw the pipes into position. The appellant had in the previous week blistered one of the fingers of his right hand while chipping steel plates for a large engine at the same works. On the day of the accident the appellant showed the blister to the foreman and said that he thought it was hardly fit for him to do the job. The foreman replied that he must do it, as the engine had to work that afternoon. The appellant accordingly did the work. The next night the finger became inflamed from the red lead and oil, and was seriously injured. The County Court Judge said that the appellant had received a serious injury whilst working in the respondents' employment in the ordinary way with the usual materials and appliances, and that there was no accident within the meaning of the Act of 1897. He accordingly decided in favour of the respondents.

Mr. Bassett Hopkins appeared for the appellant.

Mr. T. W. Chitty, for the respondents, was not called upon.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that to bring a case within the Act there must be, by section 1, subsection 1, personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment. The sole question here was whether there had been an accident. The personal injury was beyond question. But it arose when the workman was working in the ordinary way and with the usual materials. There were two cases, decided a fortnight ago, in which a similar question arose. In "Hensey v. White" (16 The Times L.R., 64) the workman was suffering from chronic inflammation of the stomach, which caused the blood-vessels to become congested, and the man died through the bursting of the blood-vessels while at his ordinary work, though at the time of his death the work was more arduous than usual. The County Court Judge found as a fact that the man died of inherent weakness of the blood-vessels and not from an accident, and this Court dismissed the appeal. Lord Justice Collins in that case said that "it was clear on the findings of the County Court Judge that the element of accident was entirely wanting. The injury arose in the ordinary course of the deceased man's work, though there might have been a little more exertion used by him in that work on the occasion in question than was usual. In 'Pandorf v. Hamilton' (12 App. Cas., 518, at p. 524) Lord Halsbury said that he thought that the idea of something fortuitous and unexpected was involved in the word 'accident.' That element was wanting in the present case. In the cases which had been cited a fortuitous and unexpected element existed which was the proximate and ultimate cause of death." He (the Lord Justice) entirely agreed with that view. The next case was "Lloyd v. Sugg and Co." (16 The Times L.R., 65), where the workman was holding a flatter on an anvil for another man to hit. The duty of the latter man was to hit the flat end of the flatter, but he struck the round part and jarred the other workman's hand. That was an injury caused by a mis-hit, and was therefore an accident. In his Lordship's opinion there was no accident in the present case.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS and LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS agreed.

Criminal Law—Larceny Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict., c. 116), sec. 1—Beneficial owners—Committee of friendly societies.

This was a case stated by Mr. Justice Wills for the opinion of the Court. The case was as follows:—
"Frank Neat has been tried and convicted before me at Maidstone Assizes on November 29, 1899, on an indictment containing two counts alleging—(1) That the prisoner being a beneficial owner with H. E. Millen and others of certain moneys, to wit £194 4s. 8d., whilst he was such beneficial owner feloniously stole the said moneys, then belonging to such beneficial owners as aforesaid, against the form of the statute, &c. See 31 and 32 Vict., c. 116, section 1. (2) That the prisoner feloniously stole £194 4s. 8d. of the moneys of H. E. Millen and others against the form of the statute, &c. In August, 1897, a fête was held under the direction of what was called an amalgamated committee, consisting of 30 persons. Two of them were appointed by each of 15 registered friendly societies. The committee of each of the 15 societies guaranteed £3 towards the expenses. Tickets were sold to any persons who would buy them. Programmes also were sold, and there were various matters for which on the ground money was taken, as for refreshments, care of bicycles, and the like. The amalgamated committee (hereinafter called the Fête Committee) ordered the various items of expenditure in respect of the fête, engaged and paid the band, ordered the printing, advertising, and so forth. They received the proceeds, and at the close of the fête were in the possession of a sum of upwards of £200. Millen, named in the indictment, and the prisoner were both members of the committee, the prisoner being one of the two appointed by the committee of the Loyal Providence Lodge of Oddfellows, and Millen one of the two appointed by the Anglo-Saxon Lodge of the same order. Millen was also the treasurer and the prisoner was also the secretary of the Fête Committee. Neither of them had any banking account. Millen was going from home and did not wish to have so large a sum left in his house, and he asked the prisoner if he had a banking account. The prisoner had none, but proposed that they should ask one Cording, an advertising agent who had advertised the fête for the committee, to allow the money to be paid into his banking account for the use of the committee. Cording assented. Millen thereupon handed £210 17s. 2d. to the prisoner, who handed it to Cording, who paid it into his own banking account. The prisoner procured from Cording a cheque for £16 2s. 6d. for an account due to one Jewry in respect of advertisements. This account he paid. He then procured from Cording £15 in cash and two cheques of £100 and £89 4s., supposed to represent the balance of the £210 17s. 2d., alleging that the money was wanted for the purposes of the committee. By mistake Cording paid him about £10 above the balance of the sum deposited with him. The prisoner paid Cording a small account for advertisements, but absconded with the balance of about £180 and avoided apprehension for more than two years. The whole of the societies by whose committees the members of the Fête Committee were appointed were registered friendly societies. The provision of the fête, however, was entirely outside the purposes of the societies, and they were all aware of this and acted upon that view. Such fêtes were held from time to time, and an established practice had grown up with respect to them. Each of the 15 societies had its banking account, and only one account. The funds which properly belonged to the society, and the application of which was provided for by its registered rules, were paid into that account and were regularly dealt with in the books of account of the society. But into the same account were paid other moneys forming what was called the 'incidental fund,' of which a separate account was kept by each society. This incidental fund had no legal relation to the society, and the money was only paid into the society's banking account for convenience. It was used only for the purpose of providing entertainments, such as concerts and fêtes, in which the members of the society were interested. These might be either concerts, &c., for members of the particular society or such entertainments as the fête now in question in which other societies joined, and the entertainments were sometimes merely for the purposes of personal enjoyment, sometimes in aid of some charitable object. Out of this incidental fund was paid the committee's contribution to the guarantee fund of a Fête Committee. Into it was paid any share of profits received from a Fête Committee, and out of it was defrayed any proportionate sum due from the society's committee in respect of any loss incurred by holding an amalgamated fête. In the administration of this fund the committee of the society acted, not on behalf of the registered society, which all concerned were aware could not sanction any such enterprise or expenditure, but as the managing body ad hoc for the members of the particular society; and it was entirely in the hands of the members of the society meeting for that purpose to say how the incidental fund should be applied, though in practice it never was applied except for the purposes I have mentioned; and it was undoubtedly the general understanding that the incidental fund of each society should be applied under the control of the members generally to the provision of entertainments of the character above mentioned. But for the misappropriation of the money taken by the prisoner there would have been in the present instance a considerable surplus divisible amongst the 15 contributing groups above described. It was objected by Mr. Hohler, of counsel for the prisoner, that there were no persons who, together with the prisoner, were the beneficial owners of the money in question. The section 1 of 31 and 32 Vict., upon which the indictment is based, is, so far as is material, as follows:—'If any person being one of two or more beneficial owners of any money shall steal or embezzle any such money belonging to such joint beneficial owners, every such person shall be liable to be dealt with, tried, convicted, and punished for the same as if such person had not been one of such beneficial owners.' I was, of opinion that the term 'beneficial owner' was not a technical one and ought to receive a liberal construction, and that either the members of the Fête Committee, of whom the prisoner was one, or the whole of the members of the 15 societies (of whom also the prisoner was one), or both, had an interest in the fund of a character which made them 'beneficial owners' within the meaning of 31 and 32 Vict., c. 116, section 1. As to the second count I told the jury that there was evidence upon which they might find the prisoner guilty of larceny as a bailee. I was, however, under the impression that the property was laid as that of Cording. I do not think that a man can be said to be a bailee when he is one of the bailors, and probably the only question in reference to this count is whether the words of the statute that he shall be 'liable to be dealt with, tried, and convicted and punished as if he had not been one of the beneficial owners' render him liable to be indicted in the manner above set forth. The prisoner was convicted; separate judgments have been entered upon each count. He was sentenced to eight months' imprisonment in the second division and is undergoing that sentence. The question for the decision of the Court is whether the conviction can be sustained under either or both of the counts in the indictment."

Mr. Hohler appeared for the prisoner; no one appeared for the prosecution.

Mr. HOHLER, on behalf of the prisoner, submitted that the Act created no new offence, but took away defects. It provided that the fact of being a beneficial owner should be no defence.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE.—Who do you say was the beneficial owner?

Mr. HOHLER.—Assuming that there is a trust of some kind for the societies, that does not make the prisoner beneficial owner. The Act was meant to apply to the case where the man was entitled to a part of the fund.

There was no trespass in such a case and therefore the Act was passed. Millen was the owner. He was not bound to pay over the particular money to the societies.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE.—In this case we have to deal with one point only. I wish to make it clear that the Court is only considering the question which alone was raised by counsel for the prisoner at the trial—namely, that there were no persons who, together with the prisoner, were the beneficial owners of the money in question. [After stating the facts his Lordship proceeded.] Whether the prisoner was guilty of obtaining money by false pretences is not raised by the case. The prisoner was indicted under section 1 of the Larceny Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict., cap. 116). The question is whether the contention raised by counsel for the prisoner—that no persons were beneficial owners of the money in question—is sound. In my opinion the legislature intended by the statute to get rid of some perplexities which had surrounded the case where a person charged with larceny had a beneficial interest in the fund. Upon the facts of the present case it seems to me that the 30 members of the committee, including the prisoner, may well be said to have been the beneficial owners of the money. They had the control of the fund and the right to see to its appropriation in discharge of their liabilities. But it is not necessary to rest our judgment upon that ground. There were beneficial owners of this fund somewhere. An object cannot be a beneficial owner. The persons who benefit must be the beneficial owners. Either the beneficial owners must be the members of the committee or the members of the 15 societies. In either case the conviction was right. The prisoner was a member of both. As to the second count, Mr. Justice Wills was under the impression that the property was laid in Cording. That was not so. The conviction upon the first count will therefore stand, but upon the second it will be quashed.

MR. JUSTICE WILLS concurred.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT concurred, adding that the case must not be taken as deciding that larceny had been committed by the prisoner. In his opinion no larceny had been committed, but the prisoner could, even if the indictment were quashed, be prosecuted and punished for obtaining money by false pretences.

MR. JUSTICE DARLING and MR. JUSTICE CHANNELL were of the same opinion.

IN RE JOHN SCOTT, JUN., DECEASED.

Revenue—Estate duty—Beneficiary under will dying in testator's life time—Wills Act, 1837, sec. 33—Finance Act, 1894.

This was a petition by the executors of the will of Mr. John Scott, jun., against a claim made by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue for estate duty.

Mr. John Scott, jun., died on January 22, 1899, leaving a widow and daughter. By his will he left his property to the petitioners in trust for the widow and daughter, and after the death of the widow for the daughter absolutely. The total net value of the property passing on his death was £16,000. On May 12, 1899, Mr. John Scott, sen., the father of Mr. John Scott, jun., died, having made a will dated June 5, 1891, by which he left freehold property valued at £80,000 to his son, Mr. John Scott, jun. By virtue of the Wills Act, 1837, this disposition took effect as if the death of Mr.

—Reported by C. G. WILBRAHAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

John Scott, jun., had happened immediately after the death of Mr. John Scott, sen., and accordingly the freehold property passed to the petitioners as executors and trustees of the will of Mr. John Scott, jun. Estate duty was paid on this property in respect of the death of Mr. John Scott, sen. The question now was whether it could be aggregated with the rest of Mr. John Scott, jun.'s, property as property passing on his death within the Finance Act, 1894, and whether estate duty was chargeable upon the total amount accordingly in respect of such death. Section 33 of the Wills Act, 1837, enacts "That where any person being a child or other issue of the testator to whom any real or personal estate shall be devised or bequeathed for any estate or interest not determinable at or before the death of such person shall die in the lifetime of the testator leaving issue, and any such issue of such person shall be living at the time of the death of the testator, such devise or bequest shall not lapse, but shall take effect as if the death of such person had happened immediately after the death of the testator, unless a contrary intention shall appear in the will."

Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. Edwardes Jones appeared for the petitioners; and the Attorney-General, the Solicitor-General, and Mr. Vaughan Hawkins for the Crown.

The arguments of counsel, which were heard on December 11, are sufficiently indicated in the judgments. The COURT gave judgment for the Crown.

MR. JUSTICE DARLING, after stating the facts as above, said:—John Scott, jun., never had an interest in the estate devised to him, for he died before his father, but it is claimed that the estate of John Scott, jun., is liable to estate duty in respect to the property so devised to him by reason of the effect of the Finance Act, 1894, and section 33 of the Wills Act, 1837. It is plain that the devise of the estate devised to John Scott, jun., by his father did not lapse, but enures to be disposed of according to the trusts of the son's will. Hereupon arises the claim to further estate duty, and it is argued on behalf of the Crown that this estate is covered by the words of the Finance Act, 1894, because it is property which "passed on the death" of John Scott, jun., within the meaning of section 1 of that statute. As a matter of fact this estate never was the property of John Scott, jun., although it would have become so had he in fact died immediately after the death of his father. For the Crown it is, however, contended that the natural death of John Scott, jun., should be disregarded for this purpose, and that "constructive death" at a later date must be imagined, or in the words of the Solicitor-General, "the life of the son is projected forward and his death postponed, by the Wills Act." In my opinion the Wills Act has no such operation, and this contention must go the way of that in "Pearce v. Graham" (9 Jurist N.S., 568), where such a reading of the Wills Act was used to support the argument that coverture revived, so that a widow was reconstituted the wife of a man who had been dead some years. That contention, in itself sufficiently extravagant, might easily have led on to a doctrine of constructive bigamy and the present suggested fiction of "life projected forward" or "death postponed" might, if accepted now, soon be coupled with another doctrine, too readily adopted by some—that of constructive murder—with consequences too absurd to be even alluded to here. Having referred to "Woods v. Parker" (1 Swabey and Tristram, 525) and to "Winter v. Winter" (5 Hare, at pp. 312 and 313) his Lordship proceeded:—For my part I believe that the Act, having regard to parental affection, intended to recognize the truth expressed by Gray in his Elegy:—

"E'en from the tomb the voice of nature cries; E'en in our ashes live their wonted fires."

and I think it meant no more. I cannot therefore hold that this was in fact property of the deceased, John Scott, jun., which passed on his death—meaning a fictitious death occurring months after his burial—by virtue of section 1 only of the Finance Act, 1894. But I have much greater difficulty in dealing with the contention that within section 2 (1) of that Act, it is liable to estate duty as being property of which the deceased was at the time of his death competent to dispose. I do not feel that I derive any assistance in construing these words from the terms of the Finance Act, 1894, section 22 (2) (a); but it is to be observed that the Wills Act does not give the devised property to the issue of the devisee, although failing such issue the devise will lapse; and, further, a devise of the residue of his estate will enable the son who dies in his father's lifetime, leaving issue, to effectually dispose of what never would be his own, even—as "Winter v. Winter" shows—of property left to him by a will made after his death. I come, therefore, to the conclusion that this estate was property of which John Scott, jun., was "competent to dispose." It remains still to consider whether "at the time of his death" he was so competent. And here, for the reasons I have given already, I understand by the words "his death" his real, natural death, and not any decease by fiction of law. Now, what disposed of the property? Clearly it was the will of John Scott, jun. When? Well, four months after that will first came into operation—four months after the death of the maker of it. Yet that will had no force of its own. All that it could do was what its testator did, and what he did was to make the will. He made it before his death. It spoke with his last breath, and what he could not then say by means of it that will cannot say now ever would. Still it had force to devise this estate. That is to say he who made it was competent to do what it in law effected. Therefore I think that the case comes within the Finance Act, 1894, section 2. But I have arrived at this opinion after much doubt, and by a train of reasoning in which I am conscious that there may perhaps be some defect. Still I think this conclusion is right; for my learned brother Channell has arrived at the same end by a different road. Estate duty must therefore be paid. How that duty shall be calculated remains to be determined. I am of opinion that this property is, by virtue of the Finance Act, 1894, sections 5 and 22 (1) (i), and by virtue of section 2 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, to be considered as settled property, and therefore is liable only to such duty as can be charged upon it having regard to those provisions. I understand that additional settlement duty is not in this case claimed.

MR. JUSTICE CHANNELL said:—The question we have to decide is whether estate duty is payable by the petitioners as upon the passing, or supposed passing, of the property on the death of John Scott, jun. During the argument of this case I certainly was of opinion that the question must be determined by ascertaining what was the true legal construction of the material provisions of the Finance Act. These provisions are extremely intricate, and when we came to apply them to the case before us it was very difficult to arrive at any clear conclusion as to their effect. I was, however, then, and I still am, unable to bring myself to the conclusion that the property really did pass on the death of John Scott, jun., even under the definition of property passing given by section 22 (1) (i), and certainly not without it. I think that is so whether "passing on the death" means passing in point of time on the death or "passing by reason of the death," as suggested by the Solicitor-General. It seems to me that after the death of John Scott, jun., as before it, the freehold premises remained absolutely the property of John Scott, sen. Nothing had happened either to pass the property in them or to interfere with Scott, sen.'s, absolute right to dispose of them as he pleased. The property neither passed on the death in point of time, nor did it then or ever pass by reason of the death. It passed by reason of John Scott, sen.'s death and of his disposition of the property. The question whether John Scott, jun., was competent to dispose of the property within the meaning of section 2 (1) (a) is somewhat more difficult. It is said on the one hand that any man who dies leaving both a parent and a child living is made competent by the Wills Act to dispose of anything which the parent may happen afterwards, during the life of the grandchild, to leave to him by will. But, at most, the son only directs to whom the property shall go if his father chooses to adopt that mode of disposition, and it is really the father who disposes. Further, there is a doubt whether to bring the case within section 2 (1) (a) there must be power to dispose of the specific freehold houses in question, which is more difficult still to see. I have, however, come to the conclusion that this case does not turn so much upon the consideration of these clauses of the Finance Act as upon the question of the true construction of the Wills Act. What is the meaning of the devise "taking effect as if the son had died immediately after the father." Kindersley, V.-C. in "Pearce v. Graham" states the effect of the statute correctly when he says that the "Act simply prolongs the life of the legatee for a particular purpose—namely, to prevent a legacy given to a child, dying before but leaving issue which survived the testator, from lapsing, and does not prolong the life for any other purpose." But the Act does say just a little more. What the Act does say is that the devise is not to lapse, but is to take effect "as if the son had died after the father." Now, how is this to be carried out? If the son has died intestate his heir takes as he would if the son had in fact survived his father. If the son has made a will containing appropriate words, by residuary devise or otherwise, to carry the property, the devisees take. If the son has died insolvent, the creditors take. So far the matter is fairly clear. But what do they take in each case? And does the Crown take anything? If the son had in fact survived the father the beneficiaries of the son would have taken the property subject to the payment of duties to the Crown. The duties are a charge on the property. If those duties are not to be paid when the devisees get the property by virtue of the Wills Act the beneficiaries will take more than if the son had survived the father. Is this making the devise take effect as if the son had survived the father. It seems to me that it is giving the devise a different effect, and the only way to give it the same effect is to hold that, as the Wills Act gives the property to the devisees of the son as if he had survived his father, it gives it, subject to the same duties, as if the son had survived the father. His Lordship referred to the cases of "Executors of Perry v. The Queen" (L.R., 4 Exch., 27), "Lord Advocate v. Bogie" ([1894] A. C. 87), and "Attorney-General v. Lloyd" ([1895] 1 Q.B., 497), as supporting this view, and, after discussing the cases he proceeded. Estate duty is, in my opinion, payable, and, of course, upon the view I have taken the settlement question, which would have been one of some difficulty, does not arise. I think there was in fact a settlement by the combined effect of the two wills and of the Wills Act, but I think that effect must be given to it as if the son had survived—that is to say, that it takes effect as a settlement made by the son. The duty out of this property must be the same as if the son had survived. The rate of duty on the property, therefore, will be arrived at by taking the rate applicable to the property when aggregated with the other property of John Scott, jun. I do not know whether the Crown claims any additional duty—that is to say, at a higher rate than paid on the £16,000, the property of John Scott, jun., by reason of the aggregation with it of this freehold property; but I do not think the Crown entitled to such a higher rate on the £16,000. The Wills Act gives the duty on the property passing by virtue of it; but it is difficult to see how it could give a higher duty on other property. This case should be dealt with as coming under section 7 (6) (a) and (b), which provision happens to fit this case. There must be judgment for the Crown.

BURDETT V. STANDARD EXPLORATION COMPANY (LIMITED).*

Company—Shares—Certificate—Neglect of Company to issue share-certificates within a reasonable time.

This was an action of a very peculiar nature. The plaintiff, Mr. Frederick Burdett, a stock jobber and a member of the London Stock Exchange, sought a declaration that he was entitled to a certificate under the seal of the company, duly signed and countersigned, in respect of 1,763 shares therein, an order on the defendant company forthwith to issue the certificate, and damages for wrongfully refusing or neglecting to issue the certificate. Only nominal damages were, however, claimed at the Bar. The company was incorporated on February 11, 1898, with a nominal share capital of £1,500,000 in £1 shares. On May 12, 1899, the company issued a prospectus offering 500,000 of the shares for public subscription, 10s. being payable on application and 10s. on allotment. The plaintiff applied for 1,763 shares on May 18, 1899, and paid the application moneys (£881 10s.), and on May 20, 1899, received notice of allotment of all the shares applied for. On May 23, 1899, the plaintiff paid the other 10s. per share due on his shares, which were therefore fully paid up. Clause 10 of the articles of association provided as follows:—"The certificates of title to shares shall be issued under the seal of the company and signed by two directors and countersigned by the secretary or some other person appointed by the directors. Every member shall be entitled to one certificate for the shares registered in his name or to several certificates each for a part of such shares. Every certificate of shares shall specify the denoting numbers of the shares in respect of which it was issued and the amount paid up thereon." The plaintiff, being unable to obtain his certificate, commenced the present action on November 28, 1899. The defendants pleaded that they had proceeded with every expedition to prepare for the issue in the ordinary course of the certificates for shares to the persons entitled to the same, and that it was the duty of the defendants, in the special circumstances of the case, in the general interest of all entitled to certificates, to issue the certificates to all simultaneously, without any priority to any individual or section of individuals. In argument it was contended on behalf of the company that, as under certain contracts referred to in the prospectus paid-up shares were to be issued to the shareholders of nine amalgamating companies, which shares could not be issued for six calendar months (and which period might be extended), the certificates for the cash shares could not be properly issued before the other certificates, and that the directors could not be compelled to split their issue of certificates into two issues. A number of the Stock Exchange rules were referred to with reference to what was required to obtain a special settlement, &c. Several witnesses were also called to show the time occupied by other companies in getting out their certificates.

Mr. Warrington, Q.C., Mr. Rufus Isaacs, Q.C., and Mr. Stewart Smith were for the plaintiff; and Mr. Swinfen Eady, Q.C., Mr. Eve, Q.C., and Mr. Whinney for the company.

MR. JUSTICE COZENS-HARDY, in the course of his judgment, said that there were about 3,000 applicants under the prospectus. The plaintiff contended that under the articles he was entitled to his certificate. His Lordship said he must import into article 10 the words "within a reasonable time." The article could not mean that a person to whom shares had been allotted was only entitled to his certificate if and when the company was minded to give it. What was a reasonable time? The mere physical difficulty of issuing the certificates must have been got over long ago. But it was said, in effect, that the company was not bound to issue the certificates, or that a reasonable time for doing so had not elapsed when the action was commenced. The ground set up was that it appeared by the prospectus that the company was to take over a number of businesses to be paid for in shares, and that these shares amounted to over 700,000. Under the agreements shareholders in other companies had an option to take shares in the defendant company within a time which might be extended to six months and might be further extended by the company. It was contended that at any rate until the six months had expired no certificates of shares ought to be issued. The company was not bound to allot shares at once, but if allotments were in fact made it was bound to issue certificates for the shares allotted within a reasonable time; and, in considering what time was reasonable, the Court was not bound to take into account the fact that the prospectus referred to certain contracts under which the certificates in respect of other shares could not be issued for six months. The plaintiff was accordingly entitled to the declaration he asked for, and the company must issue the certificate to him on or before the 1st of January, and must pay the costs of the action.

ISAACS V. EVANS.*

Frauds, Statute of—Partnership, alleged contract of—Part performance.

This action related to an alleged partnership in a gold mine in Wales. One of the plaintiffs, Thomas Evans, alleged that he and the defendant, Meredith Evans, had had several transactions together as partners in joint adventures in relation to gold-mining properties in Wales and that in the month of April, 1898, they determined to acquire a certain property at Garthgell, in Merioneth, with a view to mining for gold. The owner of the property was one John Vaughan, and the plaintiff Evans alleged that he and the defendant arranged with him for the grant of a lease to the defendant on behalf of himself and the plaintiff Evans, and such lease was accordingly granted, and further, that a Crown licence was granted to the defendant on behalf of himself and the plaintiff Evans. The defendant has worked the mine since the date of the lease and the licence. In November, 1898, the plaintiff Evans assigned to the other plaintiff, Godfrey F. Isaacs, his moiety of the term, with rights and powers under the said lease and licence. The plaintiffs alleged that the defendant had refused to recognize their title or interest, and that he wrongfully claimed to be himself fully entitled to all the benefit arising under the said lease and licence. They accordingly claimed (1) a declaration that the defendant is a trustee of one moiety of the property at Garthgell for the plaintiffs or one of them; (2) an account; (3) an injunction. The defendant denied the existence of a partnership, and pleaded the Statute of Frauds. In reply, the plaintiffs set up acts which they alleged to be part performance of the partnership agreement.

MR. JUSTICE FARWELL said that he would first deal with the plea of the Statute of Frauds.

MR. BADCOCK, Q.C. (Mr. E. Ford with him), on behalf of the plaintiffs, said that the Statute of Frauds could be got rid of on two grounds—(1) because there had been part performance, and (2) because the statute could not be made an instrument of fraud. On the first point, he submitted that acts had been done which constituted a part performance of the partnership contract, and that the Court should have parol evidence—"Forster v. Hale" (3 Vesey, 695, 5 Vesey, 308), and Lindley on Partnership, 5th Edition, p. 84. Parol evidence was admitted in "Forster v. Hale." "Carriek v. Skidmore" (2 de G. and J., 52) seemed to be against him, but that case was clearly distinguishable, as the land had been acquired before the partnership, whereas here the land was acquired after the partnership. On the second point, "Rochefoucauld v. Boustead" ([1897] 1 Ch., 196) and "Davis v. Whitehead" ([1894] 2 Ch., 133) proved that the statute could not be set up to cover a fraud. His case was that the defendant had here wrongfully appropriated the benefit of the lease and the licence, and ought not to be allowed to escape by simply pleading the statute. Lastly, the acts of part performance need not be referable to the actual contract set up by the plaintiff, but to some such contract (see Fry on Spec. Perf., sec. 582).

Mr. Hughes, Q.C. (Mr. Ingle Joyce with him), was not called on.

MR. JUSTICE FARWELL, in delivering judgment, said that in his opinion he would be going too far not to allow the plea of the Statute of Frauds. It was clear on the cases that, before evidence could be admitted as to the contract, it must be shown that there actually was a partnership—to show that a partnership existed was a necessary antecedent to parol evidence. In "Forster v. Hale," for example, there was a clear partnership between four persons as bankers. It was impossible to escape the statute by simply putting in the word partnership. If it were not so it would be enough for the pleader in each case merely to plead a partnership, and that would amount to a repeal of the statute. "Carriek v. Skidmore" seemed to him to be a case directly in point, and he must be bound by it. Then as to the cases cited by Mr. Badcock that the statute could not be used as an instrument of fraud, those were all cases dealing with trusts. But here there was no question of a trust till the partnership was proved, and the partnership had not been proved to exist. He took the law to be as stated by Lord Justice Cotton, in "Britain v. Rossiter" (11 Q.B.D., 123) and by Lord Selborne in "Maddison

v. Alderson" (8 App.Cas., 467). As to the acts being referable to "some such contract" he was of opinion that this was one of those cases in which all sorts of acts might be set up which were not referable to any contract of partnership at all. It was just one of those cases to which the statute, in his judgment, was meant to apply. The action must, therefore, be dismissed with costs.

WELSH V. MAYOR, &C., OF WEST HAM.*

Local Government—Buildings—Contravention of by-laws—Continuing offence—Liability for—Builders—Public Health Act, 1875, sec. 158.

This was an appeal by case stated from a conviction by the deputy stipendiary magistrate of West Ham. An information was laid by the respondents against the appellants for that, having been convicted on November 30, 1898, of an offence committed on September 3, 1898, against one of the by-laws of the borough relating to buildings, they did continue such offence for 85 day after written notice, contrary to section 158 of the Public Health Act, 1875. The by-law was one providing for a sufficiency of air space about buildings to secure a free circulation of air. The appellants were builders, and in 1898 they rebuilt for the Commercial Brewery Company (Ltd.) the Dew-drop Inn, Arkwright-street, in the borough of West Ham. The conviction, on November 30, 1898, was admitted, but it was stated that after that date the appellants had not been in possession of the premises, and had no right, power, or authority to go upon them. The premises remained in the same condition as on September 3, 1898, and as on the date of the conviction. The notice given by the respondents, who were the urban authority, was served on the appellants on January 20, 1899. The magistrate held that the existence of the building in the condition above stated was a continuing offence, and convicted the appellants. Section 158 of the Public Health Act, 1875, after providing that an urban authority may, after notice, pull down any building not erected in accordance with their by-laws, enacts that:—"Where an urban authority may under this section pull down or remove any work begun or executed in contravention of any by-law, or where the beginning or execution of the work is an offence in respect whereof the offender is liable in respect of any by-law to a penalty, the existence of the work during its continuance in such a form and state as to be in contravention of the by-law shall be deemed to be a continuing offence, but a penalty shall not be incurred in respect thereof after the expiration of one year from the day when the offence was committed or the by-law was broken." The appellants' contention was that they could not be convicted of a continuing offence inasmuch as they were not owners of the premises and could not comply with the respondents' notice without committing a trespass. "Marshall v. Smith" (L.R., 8 C.P., 416), "Rumball v. Schmidt" (8 Q.B.D., 603), "Reay v. Mayor, &c., of Gateshead" (55 L.T., 92), and "Smith v. Legg" ([1893] 1 Q.B., 398) were cited.

Mr. Boydell Houghton appeared for the appellants; and Mr. Gwynne James (Mr. Asquith, Q.C., with him) for the respondents.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

MR. JUSTICE DARLING said that if the building was put up in contravention of the Act the local authority might have ordered it to be pulled down. The statute went on to say that if the building remained in that condition there was a continuing offence. The question was, Who committed the continuing offence? The builders, the appellants in this case, had done wrong in the first instance, and had been convicted for it, but before the notice in respect of which these proceedings were taken was served they had gone away and had nothing more to do with the building. The local authority had it in their own hands to put an end to the offence either by pulling the building down or by proceeding against the person or persons who really continued the offence. The statute did not say that the person who first committed the offence was responsible for its continuance. Such a person was responsible for his own misfeasance; but it did not follow that another person might not be responsible for continuing the offence. That person need not be the original builder.

MR. JUSTICE CHANNELL said that he was of the same opinion. The latter part of section 158 was introduced to meet the case of "Marshall v. Smith," in which it was held that suffering a wall built in contravention of a by-law to remain unaltered was not a "continuing offence." As the offence was building the wall, not pulling it down was not a continuance of the offence. The question was, Who is the person guilty of the continuing offence in this case? The Act might have said that the original builder was the person guilty. The Court were asked to assume that the Act meant this because the section limited the penalties to one year. His Lordship, however, thought that the reasonable meaning of the section was that the person who was liable for the continuing offence was the person who actually continued it. If the local authority could not find out who that person was so much the worse for them. The Act, at all events, provided (in section 306) machinery for discovering the owner. There was nothing in the Act which obliged their Lordships to hold that there was here a continuing offence by the person or persons who originally erected the building. In "Reay v. Mayor, &c., of Gateshead" Mr. Justice Hawkins was reported to have used language which justified the decision of the learned magistrate. The words attributed to him were, "If this section had been passed before 'Marshall v. Smith' there would have been no doubt at all that the penalties there would have been properly imposed." But having regard to the actual decision in "Marshall v. Smith" this language was inaccurate and might have been incorrectly reported.

THE DUKE OF WESTMINSTER AS CUSTOS ROTULORUM OF THE COUNTY OF LONDON AND THE LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL V. THE DUKE OF BEDFORD AS CUSTOS ROTULORUM OF THE COUNTY OF MIDDLESEX.*

Metropolis—Local Government Act, 1888, sec. 40 —Property liable to apportionment—Records of the County of Middlesex—Custody of.

The plaintiffs claimed a declaration that the records of the old county of Middlesex existing on April 1, 1889, and then deposited at the Guildhall, Westminster, were in the joint legal custody of the Custos Rotulorum of the County of London and the Custos Rotulorum of the county of Middlesex, or that such of the said records as related to the locality now known as the County of London were in the legal custody of the Custos Rotulorum of the County of London, and that the said records existing on April 1, 1889, were property liable to apportionment between the present counties of London and Middlesex within the meaning of section 40, subsection 7 of the Local Government Act, 1888 (51 and 52 Vict., c. 41). An award under section 40 of that Act had been made, upon a submission of all matters between the parties, by Commissioners appointed under the Act, and that award had not dealt with these records. It was alleged that among these records were documents extending back to the time of Edward VI. A number of them were of purely local interest and related purely to that area now known as the County of London.

Sir Edward Clarke, Q.C., Mr. Avory, and Mr. Daldy appeared for the plaintiffs; and Mr. Cripps, Q.C., and Mr. Danckwerts, for the defendant.

MR. JUSTICE BIGHAM delivered a written judgment as follows:—All the documents in question came into existence before the passing of the Act of 1888. They may be divided into two classes; first, those which relate to local matters dealt with in quarter sessions under its administrative powers; and secondly, those which relate to the exercise of its criminal jurisdiction. Before the passing of the Act on which the plaintiffs rely, these documents were kept in the old Middlesex Sessions-house at Clerkenwell in the custody of the Clerk of the Peace of the county of Middlesex, and there they still were when the Act came into existence. Before examining the particular provisions of the Act which bear directly on the questions in this case, it is worth while to consider its general scope. The first part of the Act provides for the establishment of county councils throughout England and for the transfer to such councils of the greater part, if not the whole, of the administrative business of the quarter sessions of the counties (sections 1, 2, and 3.) The second part of the Act provides that the metropolis shall be an administrative county for the purposes of the Act by the name of the Administrative County of London, the "metropolis" being defined as comprising the City of London and certain parishes and places in Middlesex, Surrey, and Kent. It further provides that such portion of the Administrative County of London as formed part of the counties of Middlesex, Surrey, and Kent should be severed from those counties and form a separate county for all non-administrative purposes by the name of the County of London and that to such County of London a sheriff should be appointed, and a commission of the peace and a Court of quarter sessions granted and, subject to the provisions of the Act, all enactments, laws, and usages with respect to counties in England and to sheriffs, justices, and quarter sessions were, so far as circumstances would permit, to apply to the County of London (section 40, subsections 1 and 2). The third part of the Act deals with questions of boundaries, and provides a means of referring to Commissioners appointed by the Act certain matters for their determination. Part IV. deals with questions of finance and with matters affecting the property of county councils. Part V. deals with the appointment and duties of the officers of county councils, and Part VI. contains what are called transitory provisions. It will be seen from this short reference to the general scope of the Act, that one great object which the Act had in view, was the transfer of the administrative duties of quarter sessions to the county councils, the criminal jurisdiction of the sessions being left untouched. Referring particularly to section 40, subsections 1 and 2, it will be noticed that the Act created two new counties, one called the "Administrative County of London" and the other the "County of London," the former to be governed for administrative purposes by the London County Council and the latter for criminal business by the Court of quarter sessions to be granted under this Act. The areas of these two counties overlap, but they are not co-extensive; the first includes the City of London, and the second does not. Thus the state of things created was as follows:—The City of London retained its ancient criminal jurisdiction, but its administrative jurisdiction passed to the County Council of the Administrative County of London. The Middlesex Quarter Sessions lost its administrative jurisdiction in that part of Middlesex which formed part of the "metropolis" within the meaning of the Act, and it also lost its criminal jurisdiction over the same area, the one jurisdiction being transferred to the County Council of the Administrative County of London, and the other being transferred to the newly-appointed quarter sessions for the County of London; but it retained its criminal jurisdiction over the part of Middlesex which was not transferred. The commission of the peace and the quarter sessions for the new County of London were granted on January 30, 1889, and on April 1 the plaintiff, the Duke of Westminster, was appointed Custos Rotulorum thereof. Some time afterwards an agreement was entered into by the London County Council and the Middlesex County Council, under which certain properties were apportioned between them. By this agreement the old county of Middlesex Sessions-house at Clerkenwell went to the County of London, and the Sessions-house, known as the Guildhall, at Westminster, went to the county of Middlesex. Thus, the actual possession of the Clerkenwell Sessions-house passed from the county of Middlesex. Thereupon the then Earl of Strafford, who was the Custos Rotulorum of the county of Middlesex, authorized the Clerk of the Peace of the county to remove all the records and documents to the Guildhall at Westminster, and they were accordingly taken there. The present defendant, the Duke of Bedford, is the successor to the Earl of Strafford, in his office as Custos Rotulorum, and as such, he claims to retain the documents. It appears to me that the documents are now lawfully in the custody of the defendant unless the Act of Parliament has deprived him of the right to hold them. He is the Custos Rotulorum of the county of Middlesex, and, as such, he is the keeper and guardian of the records of the county. Does it matter that since the documents in question came into existence the area of the county has been diminished, and the jurisdiction of the quarter sessions cut down? I think not, because, although these changes have taken place, the county still exists with its own quarter sessions and its own Custos Rotulorum as before; and the legal consequence of such a state of things is that the defendant is entitled to the possession of the documents. Then do the provisions of the Act make any difference? The plaintiffs say they do, and they rely particularly on sections 64 and 40. The first of these two sections is of general application—that is to say, it relates to all counties in England and Wales affected by the Act. The second applies only to the metropolis as defined by section 100 of the Act. Section 64 is in Part VI., which deals generally with matters of finance. It provides that all property of the quarter sessions of a county, or held by a clerk of the peace for any public uses and purposes of a county, shall pass to and vest in and be held in trust for the council of the county. By the definition clause, section 100, "property" is to include registers, books, and documents, and when used in relation to any quarter sessions or clerk of the peace it is to include any property belonging to or vested in or held in trust for such quarter sessions or clerk of the peace. Reading section 64 by the light of the definition clause it seems to me that all documents of the kind mentioned in the statement of claim would by its operation pass from the custody of the quarter sessions of any county and of its clerk of the peace to the custody of the newly-constituted council of such county. But there is a proviso to the section which is in the following words:—"Provided that the existing records of or in the custody of the Court of quarter sessions shall, subject to any order of that Court, remain in the same custody as would have been if this Act had not passed." There is no definition of the word "records," but I see no reason for cutting down its meaning. The records which are to remain undisturbed are the existing records, and they are not only the records of the quarter sessions, but also those in the custody of the quarter sessions. Perhaps the draftsman had in his mind a distinction between those documents which are nominally in the keeping of the Custos Rotulorum and those which may be said to be in the keeping of the clerk of the peace, but anyway all are to remain undisturbed in the custody in which they were before the Act. If I am right in this view of the meaning of the proviso the effect of the Act in the case of any other county than that of Middlesex (and perhaps Surrey and Kent) would be that all the existing documents of quarter sessions would, on the transfer of the administrative business to the County Council, remain in the custody of the clerk of the peace as representing the Custos Rotulorum and the quarter sessions. No inconvenience would arise, for with two unimportant exceptions the offices of clerk of the County Council and of clerk of the peace are both held by the same person, who is, subject to the directions of the Custos Rotulorum, or the quarter sessions, or the County Council, as the case may require, to have charge of and be responsible for the records and documents of the county (section 83, subsections 1 and 3). Then, is Middlesex to be an exception? This turns on the meaning of section 40, subsection 6. I have already dealt with subsections 1 and 2 of this section, by which the Administrative County of London and the County of London were created. The sixth subsection of section 40 is in the following terms:—"The provisions of this Act with respect to the powers, duties, and liabilities of county councils and the transfer of property, debts, and liabilities of counties to county councils shall apply to the Administrative County of London in like manner so nearly as circumstances admit as if the quarter sessions justices and clerks of the peace of the counties of Middlesex, Surrey, and Kent had been, as far as regards the metropolis, the quarter sessions justices and clerk of the peace of the Administrative County of London." Now section 64 is a provision of the Act with respect to the transfer of property of counties to county councils. The words of section 64, "all property of the quarter sessions of a county or held by a clerk of the peace or any justice or justices of a county or treasurer or commissioners or otherwise for any public uses and purposes of a county," are compendiously summarized in section 40, subsection 6, as "property of counties." Therefore, when section 40, subsection 6, provides that the provisions of the Act with respect to the transfer of property of counties to county councils shall apply to the administrative county of London it means that, amongst other sections, section 64 is to be applied to the case of the Administrative County of London as nearly as circumstances may admit. Section 40, subsection 6, shows how. It is to be applied "as if the quarter sessions of Middlesex, Surrey, and Kent had been the quarter sessions" of the Administrative County of London. For the purpose of the case in hand one may discard Surrey and Kent. Then, if the quarter sessions of Middlesex had been the quarter sessions of the Administrative County of London, what would have happened upon the application to such a state of things of the provisions of section 64?

In my opinion what would have happened would have been that the property of the quarter sessions would have passed to the London County Council, but with the proviso that such property should not comprise the records of, or in the custody of, the quarter sessions, which would "remain in the same custody in which they would have been if this Act had not passed." Where would they remain if this Act had not passed? The answer is, In the custody of the clerk of the peace of the county of Middlesex as deputy of the Custos Rotulorum of the quarter sessions of Middlesex. It was said, however, on the part of the plaintiffs, that the proviso to section 64 should at all events not be held to apply to such documents as related to the administrative business of the quarter sessions done before the passing of the Act in connexion with the area transferred to the Administrative County of London. It was argued that the Legislature could not have intended to give the administrative business of that part of the county of Middlesex to the London County Council without at the same time giving to that body the control of the records and documents relating to the same kind of business transacted before the Council began its work; and it was suggested that I should direct the documents to be apportioned those which relate to administrative business to be delivered over to the plaintiffs, the London County Council, those which relate to the criminal business to be left with the defendant. I think, however, that the Legislature never intended that any such apportionment should take place. These records and documents go back to the time of Edward the Sixth, and if they were to be apportioned as the plaintiffs suggest some would have to go to the London County Council, some to the Middlesex County Council (for that body takes over the administrative business of so much of Middlesex as is not transferred to the Administrative County of London), and some would have to be left with the clerk of the peace. This would introduce inextricable confusion. I think it was intended that they should be kept together in one place and in the custody of one person. If it should now be necessary for the clerk of the County Council to inspect them he will, no doubt, be able to do so without hindrance. No doubt records and documents coming into existence in connexion with the business of the quarter sessions of the County of London after the passing of the Act are to be kept apart from those documents which come into existence in connexion with the Administrative County of London; for by section 83, subsection 11, the clerk of the peace for the County of London is to be a separate officer from the clerk of the County Council, and each officer is to have charge of the documents appertaining to his own office. But this does not seem to afford any reason for saying that the records before the passing of the Act should be apportioned. It is further to be observed that there is no Custos Rotulorum of the Administrative County of London, and that the Council, which it is said ought to have possession of the records and documents, or of some of them, represents for administrative purposes the City of London as well as the area transferred from Middlesex, Surrey, and Kent. I do not think the Legislature intended that any of the records and documents should pass out of the custody of the Custos Rotulorum of the county of Middlesex into the possession of the clerk of a council representing such an area. I come, therefore, to the conclusion that the records and documents in question are at present where they ought to be, and that there they ought to remain. As to the claim of the Duke of Westminster, it is sufficient to say that he is merely the Custos Rotulorum of the new County of London, and that as such he becomes entitled to the records and documents of the new quarter sessions for that new county, and to nothing more. There is no provision in the Act affording any pretence for saying that any of the records and documents in question have been transferred to him. In the view I take of the rights of the parties under the Act, it becomes unnecessary to deal with the defendant's contention that the documents have passed to him by virtue of an award made under the provisions of the Act. I will only say that in my opinion, as the question of the right to the custody of these documents was not in the minds of any of the parties at the time of the submission and arbitration, and was not mentioned before the arbitrators, the award did not affect the matter in controversy.

His LORDSHIP in concluding said the case was not one in which any costs should be allowed and expressed the hope that the parties would not think it necessary to go further in the matter, as it was one of merely technical interest and of little real importance.

Court of Appeal (Lindley, M.R., Sir) 1899.
Francis Jeune, and Romer, L.J.) } Dec. 19.

GREENWOOD V. THE LEATHER SHOD WHEEL COMPANY.*

Company—Prospectus—Directors—Untrue statements—Waiver clause—Particularity—Companies Act, 1867, sec. 38—Directors' Liability Act, 1890 (53 and 54 Vict., c. 64), sec. 3, subs. 1.

A misleading statement in a prospectus may be untrue within the meaning of sec. 3, subs. 1, of the Directors' Liability Act, 1890. To ascertain whether a statement is, or is not, untrue within the meaning of that section it is important to consider—not the meaning of those who issued the prospectus, but the meaning it conveys to those who read it.

A waiver clause in a prospectus must give such notice as brings home to the mind of a reasonably intelligent and careful reader such knowledge as fairly and in a business sense amounts to notice of the contract. Therefore a waiver clause—which said that "there may be other agreements as to the formation of the company, the subscription to the capital, or otherwise, to none of which the company is a party, and which may technically fall within sec. 38 of the Companies Act, 1867, subscribers will be held to have had notice of all these contracts, and to have waived all right to be supplied with particulars" thereof—was held insufficient to prevent the liability under sec. 38 of the Companies Act, 1867, from attaching in respect of a contract under which the promoter obtained considerable benefits.

In this case there were four appeals against a decision of Mr. Justice Kekewich's (reported in The Times of February 24 last). The action was brought to obtain the rescission of a contract into which the plaintiff had entered to take 1,000 £1 shares in the above company, and the repayment of the £1,000 which he had paid for the shares, on the ground that the plaintiff had been induced to apply for the shares by misstatements contained in the prospectus issued by the company. The plaintiff also claimed damages or compensation from the directors of the company and the promoter, on the grounds that the misstatements were made fraudulently and without a reasonable belief that they were true; that some agreements, which, by virtue of section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867, ought to have been disclosed in the prospectus, were not mentioned in it, and that consequently the directors and promoters were liable as for fraud; and that at any rate the directors had not shown that they had reasonable grounds for believing the statements in the prospectus to be true, and that, under section 3, subsection 1 (a) of the Directors' Liability Act, 1890, the directors and the promoter were liable to compensate the plaintiff for the loss which he had sustained. The claims against the directors and the promoter were made, because, even in case the plaintiff should obtain as against the company judgment for the rescission of his contract and the return of his money, it was doubtful whether the company would be in a position to pay. The prospectus stated that the company was formed "to take over the patent rights for the United Kingdom of the most important improvements in wheels of the century—namely, the leather tire invented by Messrs. Pierron and Klein in 1895, which should supersede all present forms of vehicle tires, as it is elastic, durable, quiet, cheap, light-running." It was further stated that "works were started in Vienna in 1895, and Messrs. Pierron and Klein state that the wheels met with universal approval." It was afterwards stated that "wheels for the trolleys in the House of Commons have been ordered and are now in use. The Secretary of State for War has given an order for wheels for military carriages, and wheels have been ordered by the Director of Clothing of the Royal Army Clothing Department. Instructions have been received to prepare trial sets of wheels for the General Post Office, the London Road Car Company, and others. The following may be specially mentioned amongst those who have already given orders in England with a view to their adoption," followed by the names of the Bank of England and many of the leading English railway companies, &c. The plaintiff complained that the prospectus was so worded as to lead to the belief that very substantial orders for the tires had been given, whereas the truth was that the orders actually given were merely "trial orders"—that is, orders for tires for trial or on approval, and not affording any foundation for the belief that the company would be able to commence business on a permanent basis. The prospectus stated that an agreement dated February 5, 1897, had been entered into between the Coris Syndicate (Limited), the vendors, and J. R. Sherman, as trustee for the company, for the sale to the company of the patents and rights at a profit. It was added, "there may be other agreements as to the formation of the company, the subscription to the capital, or otherwise, to none of which the company is a party, and which may technically fall within section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867. Subscribers will be held to have had notice of all these contracts and to have waived all right to be supplied with particulars of such contracts, and to have agreed with the company, as trustees for the directors and other persons liable, not to make any claims whatsoever or to take any proceedings under the said section or otherwise in respect of any non-compliance therewith." Mr. Justice Kekewich held that the prospectus contained material misstatements, and the plaintiff was entitled to have his contract rescinded and his money repaid by the company. His Lordship acquitted the directors of any fraudulent intention, and held that they had acted honestly and that they believed the statements in the prospectus to be true. But he held that the directors had not shown that they had reasonable grounds for believing the statements in the prospectus to be true, because they had not taken proper pains to look narrowly into the orders referred to and ascertain their nature. Accordingly, his Lordship held that the directors and the promoter were, under the Act of 1890, liable to compensate the plaintiff for his loss. His Lordship also held that, even if the provisions of section 38 could be waived, the clause of waiver must be so expressed as to inform a reader of ordinary intelligence of the nature of that which was intended to be waived. In his Lordship's opinion the clause of waiver in this prospectus was not sufficient to prevent the liability under section 38 from attaching to the promoters.

The defendants appealed.

Mr. Swinfen Eady, Q.C., Mr. Warrington, Q.C., and Mr. Hans Hamilton were for Major Jameson, M.P., the chairman of the company; Mr. Buckley, Q.C., and Mr. Willes (three were for Messrs. W. Lambert, Baker, and Mace, three other directors; Mr. Bramwell Davis, Q.C., and Mr. Alexander were for the company; Mr. Edward Ford was for Mr. T. H. Lambert, the promoter; Mr. Warrington, Q.C., Mr. Renshaw, Q.C. and Mr. Norman Craig were for the plaintiff.

The appeals were heard on the 11th and 12th inst., when judgment was reserved. The COURT dismissed the appeal.

THE MASTER of the ROLLS read a judgment in which, after stating the effect of the judgment of Mr. Justice Kekewich, he continued:—That the prospectus was issued by the directors who are defendants and that T. H. Lambert was a promoter and that he took part in the preparation of the prospectus are facts not now seriously controverted. The attempt to satisfy us that the plaintiff did not take shares on the faith of the prospectus wholly failed. "Arnison v. Smith" (41 Ch.D., 369) shows what is meant by taking shares on the faith of a prospectus, and I need say no more on this point. The only matters which affect the whole case, and which require attention, are the meaning of the prospectus, the belief of the defendants in its truth, and the grounds which they had for that belief. There is another point raised by the defendant T. H. Lambert, turning on section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867, which I will refer to hereafter. The prospectus, in my opinion, is grossly misleading. The very first statement in it, printed in large type so as to attract attention, is that "orders for tires have been already received from (inter alia) the House of Commons." There is a subsequent statement that "wheels for the trillies in the House of Commons have been ordered, and are now in use." These are statements which it is impossible to justify. The evidence is that the person who supplies refreshments to the House of Commons had one trolley with these wheels. There was no other. It was not ordered by the House, nor by any committee or official on its behalf. The statement in the prospectus would convey to any one reading it a very different meaning from the truth. I can only regard the statement as clearly untrue. So as regards other orders. No single order had been obtained, except for trial and by way of experiment. The prospectus is fair enough as regards the statement as to trial sets. But the statement which follows as regards "orders already given with a view to their adoption" is of a very different kind. Any person reading this would understand that the persons who had given those orders had satisfied themselves that the wheels would answer their purpose, and intended to adopt them. But the fact is that no single order had been obtained, except for trial and by way of experiment. A good many of these, moreover, were ordered by persons who took care to incur no liability to pay for them. The statement in question is again, in my judgment, untrue. This is not the first time in which a misleading statement has been judicially held to be untrue. [His Lordship referred to "Dring v. Dring,"

Wood," [1849], 1 Ch. 333, 407, 15 The Times L.R., 18.] The principle is sound, and ought not to be open to question. It was contended that a statement in a prospectus is not untrue, within the meaning of section 3 of the Directors' Liability Act, 1890, unless that statement is untrue in the sense in which it is used by those who issue the prospectus. This contention is, in my opinion, quite inadmissible. Considering the object of a prospectus, and the object of that Act, the meaning which is important is the meaning which the prospectus conveys to those who read it. The meaning of those who issue it becomes all-important when those persons are charged with fraud; for, if a statement is ambiguous, it may be misunderstood without any fraud on the part of the person who makes it. Upon this point I will refer to what I said in "Smith v. Chadwick" (30 Ch.D., at p. 79), and to which I adhere. But the object of the Directors' Liability Act, 1890, was to remove the defect in the law brought to light by the decision of the House of Lords in "Derry v. Peek" (14 App.Cas., 337), and to impose upon those who issue prospectuses the duty to take reasonable care not to make untrue statements. This object would be very inadequately attained if the Court held that a grossly misleading statement was not untrue within the meaning of the Act. As regards the care taken by the defendants not to make any untrue statement, the evidence shows that, although they took care to see that they had orders from the persons mentioned in the prospectus, they took no care at all to see that the prospectus as a whole was not misleading, which, as I have already said, in my opinion it clearly was. Upon the main part of the case the decision of the learned Judge was right, and the appeals fail. One part of the order, however, affects Mr. T. H. Lambert alone, and it raises a very important question as to the effect of what are called "waiver clauses" on section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867. The prospectus in this case omitted all reference to an important contract of December 3, 1896, by which Mr. T. H. Lambert was to obtain considerable benefits. There can be no doubt that this contract ought to have been disclosed in the prospectus. Mr. T. H. Lambert has been held to have infringed this section, and an order has been made against him as to costs, of which he complains. The other directors apparently knew nothing of the contract in question, and no similar order was made against them. Mr. Justice Kekewich's view was that the waiver clause could not avail Mr. T. H. Lambert because the plaintiff was not sufficiently informed of what he was waiving. I am of the same opinion, but, as this matter is one of great importance, I will state my reasons for my conclusion. The first part of section 38 enacts that every prospectus of a company, and every notice inviting persons to subscribe for shares, shall specify the dates and names of the parties to any contract entered into by the company, or the promoters, directors, or trustees thereof, before the issue of such prospectus or notice. The second part of the section enacts that every prospectus or notice not specifying the same shall be deemed fraudulent on the part of the promoters, directors, and officers of the company knowingly issuing the same, as regards any person taking shares in the company on the faith of such prospectus, unless he shall have had notice of such contract. A prospectus, therefore, which does not comply with the first half of the section is to be deemed fraudulent, as between the persons issuing it, on the one hand, and all persons taking shares on the faith of it, on the other, except only in one case—namely, if they have notice of the contract of which some particulars have to be given in compliance with the first part of the section. Considering the manifest object of this section, which is to compel the persons issuing prospectuses to afford to persons invited to take shares the information required by the section, it is obvious that the words, "unless he shall have had notice of such contract" mean a great deal more than unless he shall have some vague information which, if followed up, will lead to such notice. Notice in the section means, not what is called "constructive notice," but actual notice, that is, notice which brings home to the mind of a reasonably intelligent and careful reader such knowledge as fairly, and in a business sense, amounts to notice of a contract. Any other construction would render the section perfectly useless. Again, what is to be deemed fraudulent is the prospectus as a whole. It may contain some true statements, but the introduction of these will not save the prospectus from being deemed fraudulent as a whole. The introduction into the prospectus of a tricky waiver clause, instead of preventing the prospectus from being deemed fraudulent, affords an additional reason for holding it to be so in fact. The waiver clause in the prospectus of this company is, in my opinion, clearly tricky and fraudulent on the part of Mr. T. H. Lambert. It is printed in small print, so as to escape attention; it is worded so as to conceal and not to afford notice of the contract of December 3, 1896, to which he (the promoter) was a party. The language "there may be contracts which perhaps ought to be referred to," when it was perfectly well known to Mr. T. H. Lambert, at all events that there certainly was one which ought to have been disclosed, stamps the clause as tricky and dishonest, so far as he is concerned. But then, it is said, that the application for shares contains another waiver clause. But the application for shares refers to the prospectus, and was sent out with it, and the waiver clause in the application for shares is as tricky as the other, and is even worse by reason of the words "or otherwise," which increases its scope beyond all reasonable bounds. Literally construed, it would, if effect were given to it, afford a defence to the whole action. If a company's prospectus is fraudulent at common law, or is to be deemed fraudulent under section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867, and an applicant for shares signs a contract which is intended to deprive him of his right to redress, he is not bound in equity by what he signs, unless his attention is called to the existence of facts which render the prospectus fraudulent. The introduction of a stipulation that an applicant for shares is to be deemed to have notice of what is in fact concealed from him is simply part of the trick had recourse to in order to evade the consequences of the improper concealment. Such a stipulation in a tricky waiver clause like the one before us affords no protection to the person who seeks protection from it. The principle of refusing to give effect to parts of documents so as to prevent successful deception by means of them is quite familiar in its application to general words in releases, and to catching conditions of sale. The refusal is based on ordinary principles of honesty, and is as applicable to tricky waiver clauses as to other tricky documents. I wish to guard myself against being supposed to go further than I intend. I have no doubt that a person who takes shares on the faith of a contract which is fraudulent at common law, or which is deemed to be fraudulent under section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867, may elect to keep his shares, and may agree not to enforce his right to damages. But, in order to bind him by election or agreement, he must be fairly dealt with; and his attention must be fairly drawn to the facts, or at all events the existence of facts, which confer the rights which he elects or agrees not to enforce. If his attention, instead of being drawn to such facts, is drawn from them, the attempt to catch him will fail. I am aware that, owing to the wide language of section 38, there is sometimes practical difficulty in determining whether all contracts, which apparently come within it, are really such as to require notice in a prospectus; and to put in a long list of contracts, which no applicant for shares would care to know anything about, would frighten the public and do no good to any one. These difficulties have given rise to honest attempts to protect honest men by waiver clauses from the consequences of honest unintentional breaches of the law. General waiver clauses in prospectuses, applications for shares, articles of association, or other documents addressed to large numbers of persons are, however, always suspicious, and require careful scrutiny. When the Court has to deal with an honest case of the kind above mentioned the Court will, I have no doubt, be able to come to a just conclusion, and will, if necessary, uphold the clause. On the present occasion we have no such case to deal with. Mr. T. H. Lambert, the promoter, has ingeniously endeavoured to shield himself from the consequences of concealing a contract, to which he dared not allude, and his appeal, like the others, must be dismissed with costs.

The PRESIDENT of the PROBATE DIVISION concurred.

LORD JUSTICE ROMER delivered judgment to the same effect.

THE RHYMNEY RAILWAY COMPANY V. THE BRECON AND MERTHYR TYDFIL JUNCTION RAILWAY COMPANY.*

Railway Company—Agreement between two Companies for pooling traffic—Stipulation not to seek any new line—Breach entitling other Company to treat agreement at an end.

The trial of this action and counter-claim was concluded on the 10th ult., when his Lordship reserved judgment.

The proceedings relate to disputes as to traffic, particularly coal traffic arrangements. In the year 1864 both companies were seeking additional Parliamentary powers and opposing one another in Parliament. They came to an agreement, they both obtained additional powers, and heads of an agreement in 17 articles were settled and sanctioned by and scheduled to an Act promoted by the plaintiff company and passed in 1864. All the provisions contained in those heads have either been carried out or become inoperative except two, the subject of this litigation, which were as follows:—
“(11) After the opening of the Caerphilly and Cardiff line the receipts arising upon the traffic carried between the New Tredegar Works and Cardiff shall, as between New Tredegar and Caerphilly, be divided in equal proportions between the two companies after the deduction of 30 per cent. for working expenses, the mileage proportion between Caerphilly and Cardiff to belong exclusively to the Rhymney Company, the Brecon Company being allowed working expenses on the portion carried by them. . . .
(17) Except as herein mentioned, neither company shall either directly or indirectly seek any new line from one side of the valley to the other to take away the traffic of either company.” Since that time the mineral working and traffic of the district of the Rhymney Valley have enormously developed, and the powerful Barry Railway and Dock Company has sprung into existence and become a formidable rival to the local railways. In 1898 the Barry Company were promoting a Bill which was opposed vigorously by both the plaintiff and defendant companies, till the latter came to an agreement with the Barry Company and withdrew opposition. The Barry Company succeeded in obtaining an Act, the result of which was calculated to take away a considerable part of the plaintiffs' traffic; by withdrawing their opposition the defendant company, as the plaintiffs alleged and the Judge decided, had broken the agreement contained in article 17. On the passing of the Act the plaintiffs gave notice that the agreement was broken and would be considered determined, and on November 9, 1898, gave formal notice in writing to that effect. The plaintiffs claimed a declaration of their right to determine the agreement and that it had been determined. The defendants counterclaimed a declaration that article 11 was still in force and an account.

Mr. Buckley, Q.C., Mr. Moon, and Mr. Harold Bompas were for the plaintiff; Mr. E. C. Macnaghten, Q.C., and Mr. Sargant for the defendants.

MR. JUSTICE NORTH this morning gave judgment. After stating the facts he said that, according to his view of the evidence, he had felt some difficulty at first in seeing how the plaintiffs could maintain a mere declaratory action in such a case, but, finding that the defendants were themselves seeking a declaration that article 11 was still binding and for an account, that difficulty was removed. One point was made by the defendants going to the root of the whole matter—namely, that as the agreement of 1864 had been confirmed by Parliament it could not be determined by either party. He did not understand that argument. If it had been confirmed the refusal by the defendants to perform it in a vital matter would have given the plaintiff company a right to elect to treat it as at an end. He did not know how the fact of its having been confirmed by Parliament could make any difference. The parties could have agreed to alter the mode in which profits were divided without breach of agreement. But, in truth, the effect of such confirmation as was found here was merely to remove difficulties which might otherwise have stood in the way, and not to make all the provisions of the agreement absolute and irrevocably binding on both companies for all time. See "Reg. v. Midland Railway Company" (19 Q.B.D., 540), and cases there cited. The next point made by the defendant company was that they had not broken their contract contained in article 17 of the 1864 agreement. They contended that in 1864 they had the east side and the plaintiffs had the west side of the valley (with an exception), and that the meaning was that neither company should tap the coal traffic on the other side of the valley, which they said they had not done. If that had been intended as the meaning the article might have been so expressed. (His Lordship gave instances of conduct of traffic inconsistent with the defendants' construction.) What the article referred to was not a geographical partition at all; the question did not relate to traffic from particular pits, but was what was "the traffic" of either company. It applied to and included all traffic, minerals, goods, and passengers, not coal only. If that was the true construction, it was clear that article 11 had been broken. Indeed it was admitted; but it was said that even in that case the plaintiff company could not show that they had been injured by what the defendants had done, or that the defendants were the proximate cause of the Act passing. That did not seem material. The agreement was not to directly or indirectly seek a new line. His Lordship thought that when the defendant company joined the Barry Company in formulating the new line, they did seek a new line whether they succeeded or not. It might be that a mere unsuccessful attempt would not have been sufficient ground for the plaintiffs treating the agreement as determined. But when the Bill became an Act the state of things was altered. The damage ensuing to the plaintiffs was clear and imminent; that it arose from the promotion and passing of the Act was clear also; and there was no ground for concluding that if the defendants had continued to oppose the Bill would have passed. The next question was whether the breach was so vital as to give the plaintiffs the right to treat it as at an end. This was a mixed question of law and fact. As to the law, he took it to be clearly settled that if one party to a contract refuses to perform that part of the contract which has to be performed by him, this does not indeed amount to a rescission of the contract, as for rescission the consent of both parties is requisite, but it does entitle the other party to say, if he chooses, that he will accept the situation by treating the contract as at an end and will not perform the part to be performed by him. His Lordship read authorities on this point, and continued,—It was not every breach that would give the right to treat the contract as at an end; the breach must be vital, going to the root of the contract. He was of opinion, having regard to the authorities, some of which his Lordship mentioned, that there had been a breach going to the root of the contract as it existed. The defendant company had wilfully repudiated the agreement and also incapacitated themselves from performing it. To hold otherwise would be to hold that while the defendants did not the plaintiffs did remain bound. His Lordship next rejected an argument on the ground of part performance as merely verbal and of no substance. He also held that the conduct of the plaintiffs in protecting themselves before the committee of the Houses of Parliament did not affect their right. He also rejected an argument that Parliament had compensated the plaintiffs so as to take away the right of action. He now dealt with a contention that there could be no right of action in respect of what was done by authority of Parliament. The proposition appeared to him true but irrelevant. If it meant that when the Bill became an Act the plaintiffs could not sue for breach of article 17, it only enhanced the importance of their other alternative to treat the whole as rescinded. But the action was not of such a character at all. In the result his Lordship made the declaration asked for by the plaintiffs. As to the counter-claim he held that the defendants were entitled to no account in respect of the period subsequent to July 7, and that, as there were no receipts before that date of which they had not had their share, the counter-claim failed altogether. He gave the plaintiffs costs.

CROSS AND OTHERS V. WEST DERBY UNION.*

Rating—Rateability—Exemption—Police-station—Residences of police officers.

The County Council of Lancashire erected a police-station which contained cells for prisoners, living accommodation for ordinary constables, charge officers, magistrates' room, and other offices. The premises also contained three unfurnished dwelling-houses exclusively occupied by a superintendent, an inspector, and a sergeant of the county police respectively, with their families, for their domestic use. These dwelling-houses might be visited and inspected at any time by members of the standing joint committee, the chief constable, or the Government inspector. The front doors opened on to the street, but from the superintendent's house there was direct access to the station, and in one of the bedrooms there was a speaking tube to the charge office and day room. A deduction was made from the salaries as rent for the three houses. There was frequent communication passing between the officers and and those in charge of the prisoners, and no prisoner could be locked up, bailed, or remanded, unless one of the three officers was present. Held, that the three dwelling-houses formed part of the police-station, and were exempt from rating.

This was a special case stated by the quarter sessions of Lancashire on an appeal against an assessment to a poor rate made for the township of Seaforth. The appellants were a superintendent, an inspector, and a sergeant of the county police, who were assessed to the rate in question as the occupiers of three dwelling-houses. The facts stated in the case were in substance as follows. The premises the assessment of which was in question were erected by the county council of Lancashire in 1895 as residences for the members of the county police, together with other premises which the respondents did not claim to be rateable, the whole of the premises being vested in the county council. The premises erected in 1895, in addition to the cells for prisoners, living accommodation for the ordinary constables, charge offices, magistrates' room, and other offices constituting the Seaforth Police-station, comprised three dwelling-houses exclusively occupied by the respective appellants and their families for their domestic use. These dwelling-houses might be visited and inspected at any time by members of the standing joint committee, the chief constable, or the Government inspector. The front doors of the three houses opened into the street, but from the superintendent's house there was direct access to all parts of the station by passing into the yards of the houses and from the yards across an enclosed space. In one of the bedrooms of the superintendent's house there was a speaking tube communicating with the charge office and day room. In respect of the residences there was deducted from the salaries of the officers, as rent for the premises occupied by them, the sums following:—From that of the superintendent, £40 per annum; from that of the inspector, £7 10s. per annum; and from that of the sergeant, £6 10s. per annum. The officers might be required by the authorities to move elsewhere at any moment, but whilst they were attached to the Seaforth division it was necessary that they should be resident within or adjacent to the police-station for the due carrying on of the work of the place, and when appointed to their respective offices they were compelled by the authorities to reside in the dwelling-houses in question. In the year 1898 there were 475 prisoners brought to the station and confined there, and the police force resident there and in the three houses the assessment of which was in question consisted of eight constables and the three officers, and there was frequent communication passing between the officers and those in charge of the prisoners. No prisoner could be locked up, bailed, or remanded unless the superintendent, inspector, or sergeant was present. In none of the houses was there any room set apart for any purpose other than for the use of the appellants and their families respectively. The appellants respectively provided the furniture for the dwelling-houses. The case was not argued before the quarter sessions, as both parties were desirous of obtaining the decision of the High Court on the facts, as to which there was no dispute; but the quarter sessions gave formal judgment dismissing the appeal subject to the present case.

Mr. Pickford, Q.C., and Mr. A. G. Steel appeared for the appellants; and Mr. C. A. Russell, Q.C., and Mr. Collingwood Hope for the respondents.

In the course of the argument the following cases were cited:—“Gambier v. Lydford Overseers” (3 E. and B., 346); “Reg. v. St. Martin's, Leicester Overseers” (L.R., 2 Q.B., 403); “Martin v. West Derby Union” (11 Q.B.D., 145); “Showers v. Chelmsford Union” (60 L.J., M.C., 55); “Leicestershire County Council v. Leicester Union” (78 L.T., 463); and “Bent v. Roberts” (3 Ex. D., 66).

MR. JUSTICE DARLING said that it appeared to him that the question raised by the case—namely, whether certain premises built for the police of the Seaforth division of Lancashire were rateable or not—depended very much on the view taken of the facts as stated in the case. The premises comprising the dwellings to which the case related were all erected in 1895 for a police-station and residences for a superintendent, an inspector, and a sergeant. It was stated in the case that the premises erected in 1895, in addition to the cells for prisoners, living accommodation for the ordinary constables, charge offices, magistrates' room, and other offices constituting the Seaforth Police-station, comprised three dwelling-houses exclusively occupied by the respective appellants and their families for their domestic use; and that the dwelling-houses might be visited and inspected at any time by members of the standing joint committee, the chief constable, or the Government inspector. It was, therefore, clear that, although the houses were occupied by the officers for their domestic use, they were occupied subject to some conditions arising out of the officers' employment. The case further stated that in the year 1898 there were 475 prisoners brought to the station and confined there, that the police force resident there and in the three houses the assessment of which was in question consisted of eight constables and the three officers, and that there was frequent communication passing between the officers and those in charge of the prisoners. The case also stated that no prisoner could be locked up, bailed, or remanded, unless the superintendent, inspector, or sergeant was present. What sort of exception was it that was to be applied to these dwelling-houses, if any objection was to be applied to them at all? His Lordship thought it was to be collected from the judgment of Lord Justice Bowen in “Showers v. Chelmsford Union” (60 L.J., M.C., 55). The Lord Justice had said with reference to the premises there in question:—“But here there is no single building in the sense that it is one occupied as a bare trust for public purposes, for it is not a police-station as a whole.” That apparently laid down, and was intended to lay down, that if a building was occupied as a police-station as a whole then the whole building came within the exception. Lord Justice Fry also seemed to have treated that as a test; and Lord Esher said the question was very much one of fact. Here the three appellants did live in the houses, but the houses were all within the surrounding wall of the police station. There was frequent communication between the officers and those in charge of the prisoners. And it was clear that the reason for those frequent communications was that no prisoner could be locked up, bailed, or remanded unless one of the appellants was present. Could it be said, then, that the appellants' houses were not part of the police-station? If the houses were not part of the police-station, the police-station would be of a very imperfect character; there would be no one connected with the place, or forming part of the establishment, who could look up, bail, or remand a prisoner. The proper conclusion of fact was that the whole building, including the officers' dwellings, was occupied as a bare trust for public purposes, and that it was a police-station as a whole. The appeal must, therefore, succeed.

MR. JUSTICE CHANNELL concurred, observing, however, that the case was very near the border line, and that a very slight alteration in the arrangement of the premises would have prevented the appellants from successfully claiming the exemption.

CREDITORS' BONDS.*

Administration—Practice—Administration bond —"Not preferring his own debt."

At the sitting of the Court,

The PRESIDENT said,—There is a matter of practice in the Probate Registry about which an alteration is going to be made and as to which it is thought desirable that I should give public notice. It is this. Up to the present time the ordinary form of administration bond has provided only that the administrator shall administer in due course of law and so on "not unduly preferring his own debt." It was understood, although, no doubt, wrongly, that the effect of that was to prevent an administrator appointed in the ordinary course of law from preferring himself, paying his own debt, even though the estate should be insolvent. Of course that is a very undesirable state of things, and lately, in the case of "Davies v. Parry" (15 The Times L.R. 186 and [1899] 1 Ch., 602; 68 L.J., Ch., 346; and 47 W.R., 429), Lord Justice Romer (sitting then as Mr. Justice Romer) decided, and, no doubt, rightly, that the effect of that provision was not what was ordinarily understood, but that the effect of it enabled the administrator to pay his own debt, because the words are "not unduly preferring," and therefore he was entitled to prefer himself, because it was not unduly, although, of course, it was a preference. In those circumstances it is desirable to alter the passage, and in future the administration bond will be granted with the substitution of the words "not, however, preferring," instead of "not unduly preferring." The consequence of that will be that the administrator will not have an injustice done to him upon which Mr. Justice Romer commented. That will take effect all over the country on January 1 next.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL V. LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL.†

Revenue—Income-tax—Interest on loans by County Council—Interest payable out of rents received—Income-tax already paid under Sched. A—Income-tax Acts, 1842 and 1853, Sched. D.

The London County Council borrowed moneys, part of which they re-lent to other local bodies. The fund out of which interest on the moneys borrowed was paid was partly made up of the rents of their property and the interest payable by the various local bodies to whom the loans had been made. In paying the interest on the moneys borrowed by them the County Council deducted the income-tax payable thereon under Sched. D, and claimed to retain as against the Crown out of the sum so deducted by them the income-tax already paid on the rents of their property under Sched. A, and the income-tax on the interest on the loans to the local bodies already paid by the local bodies.

Held, that the County Council were entitled to retain the amount of the income-tax already paid by the local bodies under Sched. D, but not the income-tax on the rents already paid under Sched. A.

This was an appeal from a judgment of a Divisional Court, Mr. Justice Day and Mr. Justice Lawrance, on an information against the London County Council claiming an order for the payment of £19,963 9s. 3d. and £11,035 3s. 8d. in respect of income-tax under Schedule D. The case is reported in 15 The Times L.R., 395, and in [1899] 2 Q.B., 226.

The question arose in respect of the sum deducted as income-tax under Schedule D by the London County Council when they pay interest to the stockholders of the Metropolitan stock. The Crown claimed the whole of the sum so deducted. The County Council's view was that so far as the sum required for the payment of the interest was made up by the rents of their property, for which tax had been paid under Schedule A, they were not called upon to hand over to the Crown the amount deducted. Further, the County Council contended that so far as the sum required for the payment of the interest was made up by the payment of the interest due to them on loans to other authorities, from which income-tax under Schedule D had been deducted before the County Council received it, they could retain the amount deducted. The information set out the material provisions of the Metropolitan Board of Works (Loans) Act, 1869, which dealt with loans raised by the Board and the creation of the Metropolitan Consolidated stock. By section 5 the sums required for the redemption of the Consolidated stock and the dividends thereon were to be charged on the whole of the land, rents, and property belonging to the Board, and on all moneys which could be raised by rate. The London County Council have succeeded to all the functions and powers of the Metropolitan Board of Works. Section 22 created a Metropolitan Consolidated rate. Section 26 created a Metropolitan Consolidated Loans Fund. Section 27 provided that the Board should carry to the Consolidated Loans fund the moneys following:—(1) All moneys, whether in the nature of capital or otherwise, arising from the sale, lease, or other disposition of lands, rents, and property belonging to the Board, (4) such greater or less annual sum as the Treasury may from time to time approve as being in their opinion necessary in order to pay the dividends on and to redeem all the Consolidated stock in 60 years from the date of the creation thereof. Under section 28 the Board was to apply the Consolidated Loans Fund according to such regulations as might be approved by the Treasury. This section was repealed by section 15 of the London Council (Money) Act, 1889, which provided for the Consolidated Loans Fund being applied in payment of the dividends on Consolidated stock and then in purchasing and redeeming Consolidated stock and in payment of certain other liabilities. The County Council from time to time raised large sums in accordance with the provisions of Acts of Parliament. They had also lent large sums to local authorities, the interest on which and parts of principal repaid were payable into the Consolidated Loans Fund. The total sum paid by the defendant Council by way of dividends and interest on loans during the year April 1, 1897, to March 31, 1898, was £1,142,884 6s. 9d., the income-tax on which at 8d. in the pound amounted to £38,096 2s. 10d. The defendant Council, in paying the said dividends, deducted and retained the income-tax payable thereon under Schedule D. The defendants had paid certain sums to her Majesty, but had left a balance of £19,963 9s. 3d. unpaid. During the half-year April 1, 1898, to September 30, 1898, the defendant Council paid by way of dividends and interest on loans made to them £587,058 3s. 8d., the income-tax on which under Schedule D at 8d. in the pound amounted to £19,568 10s. 1d. The defendants had paid to her Majesty certain sums, leaving a balance of £11,035 3s. 8d. unpaid. In the information the Attorney-General charged that all the sums deducted should be accounted for to her Majesty. In argument, however, he gave up the claim in respect of a rateable proportion of so much money as was repayment to the County Council of the interest of loans by other authorities who had deducted income-tax under Schedule D before paying the County Council. In section 11 of the information the Attorney-General alleged, by way of alternative, as follows:—That the Consolidated Loans Fund has only one constituent portion which is chargeable to the income-tax under Schedule D of the Income-tax Acts—viz., the said interest paid to the defendant Council by local authorities on the loans made to them, and no other constituent so chargeable, and that such Consolidated Loans Fund is by law applicable, in the first place, to the payment of dividends on Consolidated stock and loans to the defendant Council, and then in purchasing and redeeming Consolidated stock and the payment of the other matters enumerated in section 15 of the said Act, 1889; that a rateable portion only, and no more, of the said interest payable by the said local authorities is applicable and applied to the payment of dividends on the said Consolidated stock and loans to the defendant Council; and that, therefore, no part of the dividends paid by the defendant Council, excepting only an amount thereof equal to the said rateable proportion of the said interest, is payable out of profits or gains brought into charge to the income-tax under Schedule D, and that the defendant Council ought to deduct and to account to her Majesty for the whole of the income-tax on the said dividends, excepting only the tax on the amount equal to the said rateable proportion of the said interest. The defendants, in answer to interrogatories, stated that they had paid the sums mentioned in the information by way of dividends on Consolidated stock partly out of rents and profits of land charged with income-tax under Schedule A, partly out of interest on loans to local authorities, and other interest or annual payments charged with income-tax under Schedule D, and partly out of sums raised by rate. The defendant Council contended that, in so far as the said dividends were paid out of rents and profits of land or out of interest or other payments already charged with income-tax either by way of deduction as and when they were received or otherwise, the said Council were entitled to deduct and retain income-tax on dividends paid out of such rents and profits, interest, and payments already charged. They claimed to do this by virtue of the Income-tax Acts, 1842 and 1853, and the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1888, and especially the rules contained in section 60 of the Income-tax Act, 1842, in section 40 of the Income-tax Act, 1853, and in section 24 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1888. By subsection 3 of the last-mentioned section, "upon payment of any interest of money or annuities charged with income-tax under Schedule D, and not payable, or not wholly payable, out of profits or gains brought into charge to such tax, the person by or through whom such interest or annuities shall be paid shall deduct thereout the rate of income-tax in force at the time of such payment, and shall forthwith render an account to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue of the amount so deducted, or of the amount deducted out of so much of the interest or annuities as is not paid out of profits or gains brought into charge, as the case may be; and such amount shall be a debt from such person to her Majesty and recoverable as such accordingly; and the provision contained in section 8 of 13 and 14 Vict., c. 97, now in force in relation to money in the hands of any person for legacy duty shall apply to money deducted by any person in respect of income-tax." The Divisional Court gave judgment for the Crown, holding that, so far as the sum paid by the County Council for interest consisted of rents received by them, they were not entitled to retain any of the deducted income-tax, and that, so far as it consisted of interest paid to them by other authorities, they were bound to account to the Crown for the deducted income-tax in accordance with section 11 of the information. The defendants appealed.

Sir Edward Clarke, Q.C., Mr. Bosanquet, Q.C., and Mr. Ryde appeared for the appellants; the Attorney-General (Sir Richard Webster, Q.C.) and Mr. Danckwerts for the Crown.

The COURT, having taken time to consider, delivered judgment, dismissing the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH read the following judgment:—Two questions arise in this case—the one as to the true construction of section 24 (3) of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1888; and the other, what, upon the facts proved when applied to this section, is the account to be rendered by the London County Council to the Crown. The London County Council has a stock, which is called consolidated stock, upon which they pay dividends to the stockholders amounting in round figures to the sum of 1,000,000 of money per annum. By section 24 (3) of the Act of 1888, it is provided that, before the London County Council pays this annual dividend to their stockholders, the Council shall deduct the income-tax payable thereon under Schedule D.—i.e., shall deduct one million of eightpences, and unless excused (about which hereafter) the Council is bound to render an account to the Crown of these eightpences, which it has thus deducted, and for this amount the London County Council is made debtor to the Crown. For the payment of these dividends and for the payment of the other expenditure of the London County Council the Council has a fund, called the Consolidated Loans Fund, which is supplemented by the many receipts of moneys which fall in to the London County Council. These receipts consist, amongst others, of rents, of interest upon loans, of profits made by borrowing and lending money, of profits made by purchasing and selling property, and of money raised by the levy of rates. These receipts are placed together in one fund, which forms the Consolidated Loans Fund. The rents which are received by the London County Council, and which are paid into this fund, amount in round figures to the sum of £100,000 per annum. The interest upon loans which are received by the London County Council, and which are paid into this fund, amounts in round figures to the sum of £500,000 per annum, and the total receipts paid into this fund, including the two sums above mentioned, amount to the sum of about £2,600,000 per annum. The first question is whether the rents of £100,000 per annum thus received by the London County Council, and which have had the income-tax under Schedule A of the Income Tax Act deducted by the tenants before these rents were paid to the County Council, fall within the provisions of section 24 of the Act of 1888; and this depends on the true construction of that section. By section 23 of the Act of 1888, under the heading "Income-tax," it is enacted that there shall be collected and paid . . . in respect of all property, profits, and gains, the amounts therein prescribed chargeable under Schedules A, B, C, D, or E. Section 24, so far as it is material, is as follows:—"Upon payment of any interest of money charged with income-tax under Schedule D"—i.e., upon payment of the annual dividends of £1,000,000 per annum accruing due upon the consolidated stock to the stockholders—"the person"—i.e., the London County Council—"by whom such interest shall be paid, shall deduct thereout the rate of income-tax in force at the time of such payment"—i.e., income-tax payable under Schedule D—"and shall forthwith render an account thereof to the Crown, and for the amount so deducted the person rendering the account shall be a debtor to the Crown." What is the meaning of this? It seems to me plain that where a person pays interest or a dividend which is liable to income-tax under Schedule D, that income-tax—i.e., the income-tax under Schedule D—is to be deducted by the person paying that interest or dividend, coupled with the obligation of rendering an account to the Crown of the amount so deducted, and for which amount the person deducting that tax becomes a debtor to the Crown. If there were no exception in this action, which there is, the London County Council in my judgment would have to render an account to the Crown of the million eightpences which it had deducted before it paid the million of dividend to its stockholders, which deduction would be the income-tax payable under Schedule D and has nothing whatever to do with income-tax under Schedule A. But there is an exception, and what is it? It is that the person to account to the Crown is not to deduct the income-tax payable under Schedule D, and therefore is excused from rendering an account as to this to the Crown, if the dividend paid to the stockholders is paid out of "profits and gains" already "charged to such tax." What tax? Why, charged to the income-tax under Schedule D. This is my reading of this section 24, and in my opinion this section, as I have said, has nothing whatever to do with income-tax payable under Schedule A of the Income-tax Acts, whereas the County Council argues that it has. It is said by the London County Council that the meaning of section 24 is that the Crown in no case is to get income-tax twice over, and that it would do so if income-tax upon the £100,000 of rents is not deducted from the account rendered to the Crown; for, say the County Council, the tenants, before they pay their rents to the Council, have already deducted the income-tax under Schedule A, and paid it to the Crown; and, unless the London County Council is allowed to deduct this income-tax from the account to be rendered, the Crown will get income-tax twice over. As regards income-tax under Schedule A this apparently would be so, but where is it enacted in section 24 that it is not to be so? As regards income-tax payable under Schedule D it is so enacted; but I am clear that this section does not embrace income-tax payable under Schedule A. It is said that we should read section 24 in such a way as to make it apply to income-tax under Schedule A; but this I cannot do, for the two taxes—i.e., the tax under Schedule A and the tax under Schedule D—are entirely distinct, excepting that they are both taxes upon income, as are the taxes under the Schedules B, C, and E. The tax under Schedule A is a tax upon the gross annual value of property. The tax under Schedule D is a tax upon "gains and profits," an entirely different tax from the tax under Schedule A. Whether the Legislature should have enacted otherwise is not for me to say. It suffices to say that it has not done so. The first point, therefore, taken by the London County Council—viz., that in the account it is to render to the Crown it may deduct the tax paid under Schedule A on the £100,000 of rents—in my opinion fails, and I pass on to the next question. I have already stated of what the Consolidated Loans Fund is composed. It is obvious that, though there is one component part upon which income-tax under Schedule D has been deducted before it was received into the fund, to wit, the tax under Schedule D upon the £500,000 of interest received by the Council upon loans made by it, on the others no such deductions have been made; for instance, upon the rents, the profits made by buying and selling property, and upon the rates levied by the Council. If the London County Council is to escape rendering an account to the Crown of the million of eightpences which it has deducted from the stockholders, it is for it to prove that the million of money paid to the stockholders has been paid out of money which has already paid income-tax under Schedule D. Do they prove this? In my opinion they do not; for it is impossible to say out of what moneys which constitute the Consolidated Loans Fund of £2,600,000 they do pay these dividends of £1,000,000 of money annually to their stockholders, whether partly out of the million of rents which have paid no income-tax under Schedule D or partly out of profits made by borrowing and lending money, or partly out of profits made by purchasing and selling property, or partly out of the rates, none of which have paid income-tax under Schedule D. If it is to be presumed that no part of the money received from rates and paid into the loans fund, together with the other receipts, was used to pay the one million of dividends, as Lord Justice Williams thinks should be presumed, though it is a mere presumption and in my opinion not proved, what then? The only effect will be that the loans fund, applicable to the payment of the dividends, will stand, not at £2,600,000, but at that sum less the amount received from rates, which will alter somewhat the rateable proportion mentioned in paragraph 11 of the information. But this is not the real point in the case, for what was really contended for by the learned counsel for the London County Council was that the interest of £500,000 paid to the London County Council was not the only sum in the loans fund which had already paid income-tax under Schedule D, but that the £100,000 of rent had also paid this tax, so that it came within section 24 of the Act of 1888. This I have held not to be so. In my opinion upon the facts proved paragraph 11 of the information has been established by the Crown. As the £500,000 of interest received by the Council will not pay the million of dividends to the stockholders, it is obvious to me that the dividends, in part at any rate, have been paid out of moneys which had not theretofore paid income-tax under Schedule D. I have not to decide whether, if the Crown pushed this case to its extreme limit, the London County Council would have to render an account of the whole of the million eightpences it has deducted from its stockholders; for the Crown does not insist upon this, and asks only for an account less such a rateable proportion as the £500,000 of interest received bears to the whole fund. In my judgment the London County Council cannot ask for more, and it is wrong as to this as also upon the construction of section 24 (3) of the Act of 1888. I think, therefore, that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS read a judgment in which he arrived at the same conclusion.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS read a judgment in which he agreed with the other members of the Court on the construction of section 24 (3) of the Act of 1888, but differed on other points.

Court of Appeal (A. L. Smith, Collins, } 1899.
and Vaughan Williams, L.J.J.) } Dec. 20.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL V. DE PREVILLE.*

Revenue—Estate duty—Settled property—Surrender of life interest to remainderman—Death within 12 months of surrender.

Where a tenant for life surrendered his life interest to the remainderman and died within 12 months; held, that estate duty was not payable by the remainderman.

Decision of the Divisional Court (15 The Times L.R., 398) reversed.

This was an appeal from the judgment of a Divisional Court, Mr. Justice Day and Mr. Justice Lawrence, on an information by the Attorney-General claiming estate duty in respect of a life interest surrendered to the remainderman less than 12 months before the death of the tenant for life. The case is reported 15 The Times L.R., 398; [1899] 2 Q.B., 238.

The information set out that George Thomas Mowbray, of Grangewood-house, in the parish of Seals, in the county of Leicester, deceased, by his will, dated February 4, 1892, devised and appointed all the real estate to which he should be entitled at the time of his decease, or over which he might have any disposing power, to the use of his sister, Georgiana Anne, the widow of the late Pierre Richard de Preville, for her life, and after her decease to the use of his nephew, the defendant, André George Richard de Preville, the son of his said sister, and the heirs of his body; and in default of such issue to the testator's own right heirs. The said George Thomas Mowbray died on February 29, 1892. By an indenture of settlement dated October 10, 1845, the manor or lordship of Overseal, in the county of Leicester, and certain freehold messuages, &c., therein described, were limited to the use of trustees in trust to permit the said Georgiana Anne Richard de Preville, then Georgiana Anne Mowbray, during such part of her life as she should be single and unmarried, to receive the rents and profits of the said hereditaments, and during any coverture of the said Georgiana Anne Richard de Preville to pay the said rents and profits to her for her separate use, and from and after her decease to the use of her first and other sons successively, according to seniority in tail male with remainders over. By an indenture dated February 5, 1896, made between the said Georgiana Anne Richard de Preville, widow, of the first part, the defendant, André George Richard de Preville, of the second part, and David Hale of the third part, reciting inter alia the said indenture of October 10, 1845, and the said will of George Thomas Mowbray, and his death, and reciting (as the fact was) that the defendant, André George Richard de Preville, was the eldest and only son of the said Georgiana Anne Richard de Preville, and that they were desirous of barring the estate tail of the defendant in the hereditaments comprised in the said settlement and devised by the said will, and of limiting the said hereditaments as thereafter expressed to the intent that the life estate of the said Georgiana Anne Richard de Preville therein should be absolutely released in favour of the defendant, it was witnessed that the said Georgiana Anne Richard de Preville as settlor, and the defendant, André George Richard de Preville (with the consent of the said Georgiana Anne Richard de Preville as protector of the settlement and will), thereby granted unto the said David Hale, first, all the manor or lordship, freehold messuages, &c., in the parishes of Overseal and Netherseal, or elsewhere, in the county of Leicester, comprised in the indenture of October 10, 1845; and, secondly, all the freehold messuages and hereditaments devised by the said will of the said George Thomas Mowbray, and also all other freehold hereditaments which had become subject to the uses or trusts of the said indenture of settlement or of the said will concerning the said testator's real estate and all moneys, stocks, funds, and securities (if any) which were subject to be invested in the purchase of hereditaments of which the defendant would be tenant in tail male or in tail, and the hereditaments to be purchased therewith, to hold the same unto the said David Hale and his heirs discharged from all estates in tail male or in tail of the defendant at law or in equity, and all estates, rights, interests, and powers to take effect after the determination or in defeasance of such estates in tail male or in tail to the use of the defendant, his heirs and assigns for ever absolutely released and discharged from the life estate therein of the said Georgiana A. R. de Preville. The indenture also witnessed that the said Georgiana A. R. de Preville thereby absolutely released under the defendant the power of appointing a life interest to any husband with whom she might intermarry and of charging portions for her children by the said indenture of October 10, 1845, given to her. The lastly stated indenture was enrolled on February 11, 1896. The said Georgiana A. R. de Preville died within 12 months after the execution of the said indenture—namely, on December 11, 1896—intestate. Letters of administration to her personal estate were granted to the defendant on August 9, 1897. The information alleged that on the death of Georgiana A. R. de Preville estate duty under sections 1 and 2 of the Finance Act, 1894, became payable in respect of the hereditaments and property comprised in the said indenture of February 5, 1896 (or alternatively in respect of the life interest at the date of the last mentioned indenture of the said Georgiana A. R. de Preville in the said hereditaments and property), as property passing on her death within the meaning of the Act. The defendants answered that estate duty under section 1 and 2 of the Finance Act, 1894, did not become payable on the death of the said Georgiana A. R. de Preville in respect of the hereditaments and property comprised in the said indenture of February 5, 1896, or in respect of her life interest at that date inasmuch as no such property was property passing on her death within the meaning of the said Act. The Divisional Court gave judgment for the Crown. The defendant appealed.

Mr. Butcher, Q.C., and Mr. Ashton Cross appeared for the appellant; the Attorney-General, the Solicitor-General, and Mr. Vaughan Hawkins for the Crown.

The COURT, having taken time to consider, delivered judgment allowing the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH read the following judgment:—The real point upon which the decision of this case turns is whether section 2 of the Finance Act, 1894, imposes estate duty on a life estate which, prior to the passing of that Act would not have had to be included in an account under section 38 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, upon the death of the tenant for life. The facts are peculiarly short. On and prior to February 5, 1896, Georgiana Anne de Preville was tenant for life of real property situate in the county of Leicester, of which her son, the present appellant, was tenant in tail, and upon the day above-named the mother and son executed a disentailing deed, by which the estate tail was barred, and the son thereupon became owner in fee of the property. On December 11, 1896—i.e., ten months after the execution of this deed—the mother died. The question is whether the life estate of the mother, which had passed to her son ten months before her death, is liable to estate duty upon her death. It has been held in this Court, affirmed in the House of Lords in the Attorney-General v. Beech'' ([1899] A.C., 53), that where the owner of a life estate has conveyed that estate to a donee more than 12 months before the death of the donor estate duty upon the life estate is not payable by the donee upon the death of the donor, for the reason that by the Finance Act it is only the estate which passes upon death which is liable to estate duty, and that when the donor, the tenant for life, died nothing passed upon which the estate duty could operate, for the life estate had already passed to the donee before the death of the donor. It is now said by the Crown that Beech's case does not apply, because in the present case the tenant for life died within 12 months of the gift, and not after 12 months of the gift, as in Beech's case, and it is argued that upon this ground, by reason of the provisions of the remarkable section 2 (1) (c) of the Finance Act of 1894, this case is different from Beech's case, and that estate duty is leviable upon the life estate upon the death of the tenant for life. The Crown admits that, if section 2 (1) (c) of the Finance Act, 1894, does not impose this duty upon the life estate upon the death of the tenant for life, there is no other section which does. Section 2 (1) (c) is as follows:—“Property passing on the death of the deceased shall be deemed to include property which would be required on the death of the deceased to be included in an account under section 38 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, as amended by section 11 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1889, if those sections were in this Act enacted and extended to real property as well as personal property, and the words ‘voluntary’ and ‘voluntarily’ and a reference to a ‘volunteer’ were omitted therefrom.” In the case of “Attorney-General v. Earl Grey” ([1898] 2 Q.B., 534) I expanded this composite section, and I will do so again so far as material to this case. It then reads as follows:—“Property passing on the death of the deceased shall be deemed to include property which would be required on the death of the deceased to be included in an account under section 38 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, which, as amended, enacts that real or personal property to be included in an account shall be property of the following description—viz., any real or personal property taken under a disposition by a person dying on or after June 1, 1881, purporting to operate as an immediate gift inter vivos, which shall not have been bona fide made 12 months before the death of the deceased.” This section 38 of the Act of 1881 is one of a group of sections under the heading “Stamps,” which relates to the taking out of probate and letters of administration to the estate and effects of deceased persons—i.e., of property which deceased persons die possessed of, or leave behind them—and it seems to me that this group of sections has nothing to do with property a deceased person has not left behind him, excepting cases in which a deceased person would have left property behind him had he not given it away before he died. It is only as regards such cases that an account is to be rendered. Section 38 being one of the sections in this group, what is its true reading? Does it mean that a life estate—which of necessity comes to an end on the death of the tenant for life, and which never under any circumstances can come into an account upon the death of the tenant for life—is nevertheless to be brought into an account if the deceased has given it away less than 12 months before death, or is its true reading that, if there be property which would come into an account upon death if it had not been given away, that property must be brought into an account if the deceased has given it away less than 12 months before death? Considering that the group of sections in the Act of 1881 is dealing with the property of which deceased persons in fact die possessed, or should have died possessed if they had not given it away, in my opinion it is not the true reading of section 38 that property must be brought into an account no matter whether it would or would not have had to be brought into an account if it had not been given away within 12 months of the death. It is only to be brought into an account if it would have had to be so brought but for the gift. In my judgment this section is to prevent persons giving away property less than 12 months before death which otherwise would have to be included in an account, and thus escaping the duty. It is not disputed by the Crown that the life estate in the present case could never have been included in an account, for upon the death of the owner of this life estate, even if it had not been given to the son, it ipso facto came to an end, and there was therefore nothing whatever to bring into an account. For those reasons section 2 (1) (c) in my judgment does not bring about what is contended for by the Crown, and, as before stated, there is no other section which does so. I need not discuss Lord Cowley's case ([1899] A.C., 198), for it has no bearing upon the point I have to decide, and I think the Crown is wrong, and I cannot agree with the Divisional Court, though upon what ground that Court decided in favour of the Crown I do not know, for it has not told us. I think this appeal must be allowed, with costs.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS delivered a judgment in which he came to the conclusion that the appeal should be allowed.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS read the following judgment:—The decision in this case depends, it seems to me, upon the meaning of the word ‘property’ in subsection 2 (a) of section 38 of 44 Vict., c. 12. Does property there mean any property, irrespective of the interest of the deceased therein? Or is it limited to property in which the deceased had an interest which by its nature might continue after the death of the deceased—i.e., property capable of devolution as estate of a deceased—or, in other words, an interest not limited to determine with the life of the deceased? Now Lord Cairns in “Partington v. Attorney-General” (L.R., 4 E. and I., at p. 122) says, speaking of the construction of revenue statutes:—“The principle of all fiscal legislation is this. . . . If the person sought to be taxed comes within the letter of the law, he must be taxed, however great the hardship may appear to the judicial mind to be. . . . In other words, if there be admissible in any statute what is called an equitable construction, certainly such a construction is not admissible in a taxing statute, where you can simply adhere to the words of the statute.” On the other hand, a taxing Act is to be construed upon the same principle and by the same rules as any other Act. “Mersey Docks v. Lucas” (51 L.J., Q.B., 118, per Lord Justice Brett.) For instance, I suppose that, if upon the ordinary rules of construction general words would be limited on the ejusdem generis doctrine by preceding particular words, this construction would be applied in a taxing statute equally with any other statute. Now in the present case there is nothing to be found in the statute itself limiting the ordinary legal meaning of the word "property"; but the statute refers to antecedent legislation, that is to say, to the statutes beginning with 55 Geo. III. and coming down to 43 Vict., c. 14, granting the Crown certain duties, in respect of the value of the estate and effects of deceased persons, and provides for an inventory or account being made by the executor or administrator of such estate and effects, and section 38 deals with what shall be included, and says in effect that it shall include not only property forming part of the estate and effects of the deceased at his death, but also property which he has parted with within three (now twelve) months before his death. Now, must not this mean, according to the ordinary rules of construction, property of the same kind as that dealt with in the antecedent legislation? That is to say, property in which the deceased had such an interest that if he had not parted with it by a gift within 12 months before his death, it would have been estate and effects of a deceased, and therefore have been included in the property on the value of which the duty was granted? It is clear in the antecedent legislation that no duty was granted in respect of property the interest of the deceased in which terminated with his life, for the duty was in respect of property as being estate and effects of a deceased; and must not the word "property" in subsequent legislation be read in the same sense? On the whole I think it must, and I find nothing in the Finance Act generally or in section 2 (1) (c) to enlarge the sense in which the word "property" is used in the probate duty legislation and the account to be rendered thereunder. The Probate Duty Acts prior to 1881 dealt with property capable of devolution as part of the estate and effects of a deceased at death; for it dealt with property which in fact devolved as such estate at death. Then comes the statute of 1881, which says that the tax shall apply to property which does not in fact devolve at death but shortly before death is transferred by what purports to be a gift inter vivos, but which property, the statute says, shall be taxed in the same manner as property in fact devolving at death. Surely, according to the ordinary rules of construction, the word "property" in the statute of 1881 must be limited to property in its nature capable of devolution as part of the estate and effects of a deceased. Thus to construe the word "property" in subsection 2 of section 38 of 44 Vict. is only to apply the ordinary rule of construction, that words in the same and in cognate connected lists must be presumed to have the same meaning.

BARBER V. MEXICAN LAND, & C., COMPANY.*

Jurisdiction—American Courts—Order authorizing action in this country—Code of Civil Procedure of California, secs. 714, 720.

This case raised a question as to the jurisdiction of an American Court to make an order authorizing a person, who had recovered judgment in that Court against an American company to bring an action in the name of that company in this country against an English company. It was a summons on behalf of the International Company of Mexico, one of the plaintiffs, that the writ and subsequent proceedings in the action might be amended by striking out the name of that company as plaintiffs, on the ground that such name had been used without due authority. The plaintiff company was incorporated under and in accordance with the laws of the State of Connecticut, U.S.A. The defendant company was an English company registered under the Companies Act, 1862. By an agreement in writing dated May 4, 1889, made between the plaintiff company of the one part and the defendant company of the other part, the plaintiff company agreed to sell and transfer all the property and undertaking of the plaintiff company to the defendant company; and the defendant company thereby undertook to pay and satisfy all the obligations, debts, engagements, and liabilities of the plaintiff company and to indemnify the plaintiff company in respect thereof. On June 10, 1889, one F. E. Bates commenced an action in California against the plaintiff company, to which the plaintiff company duly appeared; and on November 29, 1892, Bates recovered judgment in that action for a sum equivalent in English money to £24,751, which still remained unsatisfied. On December 12, 1892, Bates assigned to the plaintiff Barber his judgment and all sums to be recovered in respect thereof. On March 16, 1896, in certain proceedings in the Californian Court, an order was made whereby Barber was "authorized and empowered to institute any and all necessary and proper action or actions against the said Mexican Land and Colonization Company (Limited), in any and all proper Courts, in his own name, or in the name of the said American company, to his use for enforcement of the said agreement of May 4, 1889, and the recovery of the said judgment and the moneys due and to become due on the said judgment and claim"; and the order further appointed Barber receiver of the International Company of Mexico, with full power to bring all actions and take all proceedings necessary and proper for the collection of the said judgment. The writ in the present action was issued on June 15, 1896, Barber and the International Company of Mexico being the plaintiffs and the Mexican and Colonization Company being the sole defendant. The statement of claim was delivered on June 23, 1896, and thereby the plaintiffs claimed specific performance by the defendant company of the agreement of May 4, 1889, so far as might be necessary to enforce payment by the defendant company to the plaintiff Barber of his judgment debt; payment of the debt with interest; and damages for breach of the agreement. On March 12, 1897, the plaintiff company gave notice of motion in the American action for an order vacating and setting aside the order of March 16, 1896, on certain grounds, inter alia that the Court had no jurisdiction to make it. On January 12, 1898, the motion was refused, and no further proceedings had been taken in the American action.

Mr. Jenkins, Q.C., and Mr. Danckwerts were for the summons; and Mr. Upjohn, Q.C., and Mr. Eustace Smith for the defendant Barber.

MR. JUSTICE STIRLING, in giving judgment, said that on the facts it must be taken that the order of March, 16, 1896, was properly made, and it was on that that the plaintiff Barber relied in opposition to the summons. The order, however, did not in terms empower the plaintiff Barber to bring an action in the name of the plaintiff company in an English Court; and the contention of the plaintiff company was that if a construction were placed on the order which would so authorize the plaintiff Barber then it was not within the powers of the Court in California, and that a more limited meaning ought to be given to it. In support of that contention reliance was mainly placed on the reasons given by the learned Judge who made the order in the judgment delivered by him on the application of the plaintiff company to set it aside. The learned Judge then relied upon sections 714 and 720 of the Code of Civil Procedure of California as conferring on him authority to make the order of March 16, 1896. Those sections fell under Title IX. of the Code, "On the Execution of the Judgment in Civil Actions." That title was divided into two chapters—(1) "The Execution"; (2) "Proceedings Supplemental to execution." Sections 714 and 720 were found in the second chapter. An examination of those two chapters showed that (as might be expected) they contained provisions as to the mode of obtaining execution of a civil judgment through Courts and officers of Courts whose proceedings were regulated by the Code—that was to say, the Courts of the State of California, the district Courts of the United States of America having jurisdiction within the State of California, and possibly other Courts of the United States or of the individual States. It seemed to his Lordship that section 720, when carefully considered applied only to such Courts. The concluding sentence—"Such order may be modified or vacated by the Judge granting the same or the Court in which the action is brought, at any time, upon such terms as may be just"—appeared to show that the section was to be read with such a limitation as his Lordship had indicated. If that were so then the order of March 16, 1896, would be perfectly valid and operative in all American Courts whose proceedings were regulated by the Code of Civil Procedure of California; and it ought not to receive such a construction as would give it an effect beyond that authorized by the very enactment in pursuance of which it was made; and his Lordship thought that the "proper Courts" mentioned in the order ought to be read as meaning Courts in respect of which the Court of California could properly make the order, and not as including English Courts. It was to be observed that the learned Judge nowhere stated that he had power to authorize the plaintiff Barber to sue in the name of the plaintiff company in an English Court; indeed, his language appeared to indicate that he at least entertained doubts on the subject. His Lordship (Mr. Justice Stirling) then referred to the opinion of several American lawyers, and, continuing, said it was not contended that the plaintiff Barber could, according to the practice of the English Courts, maintain this action in his capacity as receiver. If effect were given to the contention on behalf of Barber remarkable results might follow. In his Lordship's opinion an order ought to be made in accordance with the summons.

ARMSTRONG V. LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL.*

Metropolis—Streets—Laying out street—Sanction of County Council—London Building Act, 1894, sec. 7—Street, what is—Entrance to blocks of flats.

This was a special case stated by magistrates raising a question under the London Building Act, 1894. The facts sufficiently appear from the judgment.

The case was argued on November 16, when Mr. Macmorran, Q.C., and Mr. R. Cunningham Glen appeared for the appellant; and Mr. Avory and Mr. Daldy for the respondents; and judgment was reserved.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE of ENGLAND delivered the written judgment of the Court as follows:—This was an appeal against the decision of the magistrates convicting the appellant upon an information charging him with having commenced to form and lay out a street for carriage traffic without having first obtained the sanction of the Council pursuant to the 7th section of the London Building Act, 1894. The question was whether the carriage-way proposed to be formed by the appellant would, when formed, be a street within the meaning of section 7, and the magistrates found that it would. The facts are as follows:—The appellant owns some three acres, three roods, and 39 perches of land adjoining a public carriage-way called the Grove. The Grove communicates by a carriage-way 15ft. wide with the Highgate-road. No public right of way exists over the land of the appellant, and the only access from any public way is from the Grove. There is a private right of way for foot passengers through a gateway 3ft. in width in the boundary fence at the back of the land on to a public footpath in Parliament-hill. The appellant had originally applied to the respondents for their sanction to form and lay out a street for carriage traffic on the site in question. It was intended that the street should run from the Grove through the site to, and to communicate with, the footway referred to upon Parliament-hill. As a carriage-way it would have been a cul de sac. It was intended to be open and without gate or barrier at the Grove end. The respondents refused their sanction because the proposed street would not afford direct communication between two streets formed and laid out for carriage traffic. Section 9 (4) of the Act of 1894 gave to the respondents the right to refuse their sanction in such a case. The appellant then proceeded with the plan now in question without seeking the sanction of the respondents. That plan is described as follows in the case stated by the magistrates, paragraphs 3, 4, and 5:—“(3) It is proposed by the appellant to remove certain old buildings shown on the plan, and to lay out the said piece of land and erect new buildings thereon in the manner shown upon the plan annexed to this case marked A—that is to say, the appellant proposes to erect 20 new buildings or blocks of flats, each block containing eight flats, of which 16 blocks will be erected in a quadrangular form with an ornamental garden in the centre of the quadrangle formed by such blocks. The approach to the said buildings will be by means of a carriage-way from the Grove running round the said garden, and upon each side of such carriage-way between the Grove and the said garden will be erected two or more of the said blocks. Each of the said blocks will have a separate entrance from the said carriage-way. The said approach from the Grove and also the carriage-way around the said ornamental garden will be 40ft. in width, and such approach and carriage-way will be of a total length of 600ft. (4) The drainage plans for the said buildings had been submitted by the appellant to the said vestry of St. Pancras, upon which were shown the levels of a sewer it was proposed to construct running along and round the said carriage-way with the intended levels of the connecting drains from each of the said buildings. The said plan also showed the position of the manholes and gullies, similar to street gullies, which it was intended to construct in connexion with the sewer, and the mode in which it was intended to connect the said sewer with the sewer belonging to the said vestry in the Highgate-road; and also showed that the said carriage-way would be formed and sewered in all respects in the way in which a carriage-way of an ordinary street would be formed and sewered. It was admitted, however, that gullies similar to those shown on the said plan would be required for draining a stable-yard or any other yard. (5) The appellant does not propose to dedicate any right of way to the use of the public over the said piece of land, but intends to erect gates at the entrance to the said approach and to keep a porter at such entrance to open such gates when necessary to allow persons going to or from any of the said flats to pass, so that the public will not be entitled to enter the said approach. There will be no entrance or exit to or from the said flats into the said public park called Parliament-hill, and the said carriage-way will be for the use only of the tenants of the flats in the said proposed new buildings and the tradesmen and others visiting them on business or pleasure with or without carriages; but the appellant is not under any covenant to maintain the said gates or the said porter." It is to be noted that it is not stated that the appellant is under any legal obligation to erect or to maintain the gates, or to keep the porter mentioned in paragraph 5. It is to be further noted that, if, without the respondent's sanction, the appellant can now do what is proposed, the objects intended to be secured by section 9 will be defeated. Where sanction, as in this case, has been withheld under section 9 all the owner would have to do, if the appellant is right, would be to resort to such a plan as the present, and thus reach practically the same end by a different route. It seems desirable before considering the sections of the Act, which apply to this particular case to notice the general scope of the Act. It involves a large measure of interference with the rights of private owners: they cannot do what they like with their property. They cannot make or even widen streets except in conformity with the provisions of the Act. They must observe certain lines of building frontage. They must have a certain specified space at the rear of the domestic buildings they erect. The buildings constructed must be built in conformity with certain detailed requirements as to height, thickness of walls, openings, &c. It is clear that this legislation materially interferes with the action of owners in the use and disposition of their property, and it must be assumed that this has been permitted by the Legislature for reasons of public policy affecting the health, safety, and convenience of the public. The question in this case turns upon the true construction of section 7, which provides that before any person can commence to form or lay out any street, whether for carriage traffic or for foot traffic, he must obtain the sanction of the respondents. Would the way which the appellant has commenced to lay out and form be, when formed, a "street" within the meaning of that section? Unless the context otherwise requires, the interpretation section (section 5) shows the wide meaning to be given to the word "street." It means and includes highway, road, bridge, lane, mews, footway, square, court, alley, passage whether a thoroughfare or not, and also a part of any of these. No description can be wider. Why, then, is the contemplated way not a street? It is not the less a street because, after proceeding straight for a certain distance, it is continued inside or around the proposed square, for "square" is expressly mentioned in the interpretation section. It was admitted in argument, and it seems clear, that it is not less a street because it is intended to be used as a private way, for the interpretation section in no way so limits street. If so, it is not less a street because the traffic for which it is intended is limited to what may be called private traffic to and from the houses to be built along its course. Indeed, it is clear from the wording of the interpretation section (section 5; 3, 5) that the traffic there mentioned includes both public and private traffic, for there is no trace of any intended limitation to the former of these. No doubt the controlling word in the 5th section is "street." It does not follow that everything enumerated in the interpretation clause is a street for all purposes and in all circumstances within the meaning of the Act. For example, the drive to a private house is not a street, nor an approach by a courtyard to one or two blocks of buildings or houses; see section 8. Nor is a bridge a street unless it is, or may be, a link in, or continuation of, a street. There is involved in the idea of street the presence of houses or buildings more or less continuous, and in greater or less proximity to one another along it—"Reg. v. Fulford" ([1864] 33 L.J., M.C., 125). But this description is not complete or exhaustive for the purposes of the Act in question. Section 8 (which it is not easy to construe) would seem to treat as the commencement of a street, amongst other things, the mere forming of the foundations of a house in such a manner and position that it might become one of three or more houses abutting on or erected beside land on which a street might thereafter be laid out. But the facts of this case present no difficulty. Taking the broad description of what a street is as expressed in the judgment in "Reg. v. Fulford," we think that what the appellant here began to lay out was a street even within that description. I have already dealt with the contention that because it was intended for private and not for general public traffic the way or road in question was not a street. What remains? The appellant began to lay out and form a road, in part straight, intending to build houses or blocks of buildings on each side of that straight part and facing into it, which road ran into a square and formed a boundary of such square, round which again it was intended to build a continuous line of houses facing into the square, the length of the entire road being 600ft. We are clearly of opinion that, in these circumstances, the appellant had commenced to form and lay out a street within the meaning of section 7, and as he did so without having obtained the sanction of the respondents he committed the offence of which he has been convicted. We think that the magistrates would have decided wrongly had they decided differently. The appeal will, therefore, be dismissed with costs. We have examined, but do not think it necessary to refer to, the cases cited during the argument. Each case depends on its particular circumstances. It is, indeed, worth noting that the question of street or no street is uniformly treated in these cases as largely a question of fact. The decisions, except in the case of "London County Council v. Wood" ([1895] 64 L.J., M.C., 276), upheld the views taken by the magistrates, and in our opinion that case was wrongly decided.

LOGSDON V. BOOTH.*

Metropolis—Common Lodging Houses Acts, 1851 and 1853—Registration of houses—Common lodging-house, what is—Salvation Army shelters. That class of lodging-house in which persons of the poorer sort are received for short periods, and although strangers to one another are allowed to inhabit one common room, are common lodging-houses.

"Booth v. Ferret" (25 Q.B.D., 87) overruled.

This was a special case stated by the chief metropolitan magistrate on the hearing of an information laid by the appellant against the respondent charging the latter with keeping an unregistered common lodging-house in contravention of the Common Lodging Houses Act, 1853. The house or building alleged to have been so kept was a Salvation Army shelter known as the "Harbour," Stanhope-street, St. Clement Danes. The learned magistrate dismissed the information on the authority of "Booth v. Ferret" (25 Q.B.D., 87) in which another such shelter had been held not to be a common lodging-house. The case was argued on November 16, when Mr. Jelf, Q.C., and Mr.

*Reported by A. F. JENKIN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law

Ryde appeared for the appellant, and Mr. Pollard for the respondent, and judgment was reserved.

THE LORD CHIEF JUSTICE of ENGLAND delivered the judgment of the Court, allowing the appeal. After stating the manner in which the case came before the Court, he said:—The questions which arose for our determination are as follows—(1) Is “Booth v. Ferret” in principle distinguishable from this case; (2) if not, was that case rightly decided; and (3) if not rightly decided, ought we now to review it? His Lordship then discussed minutely the facts of the case, and stated that in the opinion of the Court the present case was not distinguishable in principle from “Booth v. Ferret.” He then proceeded:—The next inquiry is, Was that case rightly decided? The learned Judges in “Booth v. Ferret” came to the conclusion (but with hesitation) that a similar house and similarly conducted to the present was not a common lodging-house, on two grounds—(1) that it was not carried on as a business for the sake of profit, but as a humane or charitable enterprise, and (2) that it was not open to all comers as (it was stated) a common lodging-house was. Before examining these grounds of decision more closely it will be well to examine the scheme of legislation on this subject and endeavour to get a clear conception of its object. His Lordship, after referring in some detail to the provisions of the Common Lodging Houses Acts, 1851 and 1853, and pointing out that they must be regarded as measures of sanitary protection, continued:—Applying these considerations to the first ground on which the decision in “Booth v. Ferret” was based, it seems impossible to admit that the fact that the house or building in question was carried on for charitable objects and not for gain would take it out of the measure of sanitary protection if otherwise it would be within it. The question is not with what object or prompted by what motive the house is carried on, but whether the house is such, and is so carried on as a lodging-house as to be within the provisions of the Act, as it is clearly within the mischief aimed at by the Act. It is to be observed that the learned Judges in “Booth v. Ferret” differentiate the house in that case from a common lodging-house only on the two grounds I have mentioned. If large numbers of the most wretched class are lodged in common sleeping rooms insanitary conditions are, in the absence of inspection, supervision, and control, likely to arise, and it was the object of the law to secure that inspection, supervision, and control. We fail to see the relevance in this connexion of the motive actuating the keeper of such a house whether it be philanthropic or mercenary. But the second ground of the decision is that the “Harbour” is not within the statute on the ground that a common lodging-house is open to all comers in this sense that the keeper of such a house cannot refuse admission to any applicant. Is this so? To give to a common lodging-house this character is to attach to its keeper obligations analogous to that of a common carrier or a common innkeeper. We are unaware of any authority for this proposition. The language of Mr. Justice Lindley in “Langdon v. Broadbent” (37 L.T., 434) is referred to where he speaks of a common lodging-house as one “open to all comers”—that is, as we understand the language, where practically all comers are received without discrimination; but that is a very different thing from saying that the keeper is under an obligation to receive all comers. We see no reason to doubt that the keeper of a common lodging-house might refuse to admit drunken or disorderly or uncleanly men or men of known evil reputation, as thieves and the like, or indeed any persons whom he chose to exclude. Further it seems to us on the facts before us that the “Harbour” might properly be described as open in the same sense to all comers. The very “outcasts of society” are objects of the humane solicitude of the respondent. Even verminous subjects who are willing to submit to cleansing operations are admitted, and in the case before us it is stated that the occupants of the “Harbour” are of the same class as those who frequent common lodging-houses, but that into the “Harbour” are received persons who would usually be refused admission into registered common lodging-houses. The only restrictions on admission which may suggest a difference between the “Harbour” and registered common lodging-houses are the regulations (1) that men who are able to pay for better accommodation are not allowed to make the “Harbour” their permanent home, and (2) that the “Harbour” is not to be used to assist idle men to live a lazy life. We cannot assent to the view that this is sufficient to differentiate the two classes of houses. We know of no better description of a common lodging-house than that given many years ago by the Law Officers, Sir Alexander Cockburn and Sir W. Page Wood, to the effect that a common lodging-house was that class of lodging-house in which persons of the poorer class are received for short periods, and, although strangers to one another, are allowed to inhabit one common room. If this be the proper description of a common lodging-house, as we think it is, we cannot see in what material respect it differs from the respondent’s shelter. His Lordship then, after intimating that the Court was prepared to overrule “Booth v. Ferret” and dealing with an argument of the respondent based on the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, concluded as follows:—The result is that the appeal will be allowed, and that the case will be remitted to the learned magistrate with an intimation of our judgment upon it. Under the circumstances there will be no costs of the appeal, and, having regard to the decision of “Booth v. Ferret,” on which the respondent was justified in acting, the learned magistrate will, no doubt, think that the smallest nominal fine will meet the justice of the case. We desire to say that we should regret if the result of our decision were seriously to interfere with the humane work of the respondent. We do not think it will or can, but whether it does or not the law must be observed. We have read the careful regulations framed for the good government of the “Harbour” and the respondent’s other similar houses, and noticed the anxiety manifested in those rules, not only to ensure observance of all conditions necessary to secure cleanliness and good health and to prevent the growth and spread of disease, but also to observe the law, whatever that law may be. Indeed, the regulations expressly provide that every shelter shall be fitted up in accordance with the requirements of the sanitary authority of the district. On the other hand, we trust that those who are charged with the enforcement of the law will do all they can consistently with their duty and consistent with effecting the objects of the law to avoid anything like harshness or unreasonableness in its enforcement.

GREENWELL AND ANOTHER V. HOWELL AND ANOTHER.*
Practice—Costs—Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893—Action defended by clerk of the peace and the county surveyor by instructions of County Council—Solicitor and client’s costs.

*Reported by H. O. BUCKLE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In this action, which was heard at great length in the earlier part of this term, the defendants alleged and the plaintiffs denied that a certain road in the parish of Godstone, Surrey, was a public highway.

Mr. Neville, Q.C., Mr. Hume Williams, Q.C., and Mr. McSwinney appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Jelf, Q.C., and Mr. George Humphreys for the defendants.

MR. JUSTICE BRUCE gave judgment. His Lordship reviewed the evidence (which began with a presentment of 1799) in detail and came to the conclusion that it was impossible to reconcile the evidence offered by the opposing parties, and that the balance was in favour of the existence of the highway.

Judgment was accordingly given for the defendants, with costs.

Mr. JELF asked that the order should be for costs as between solicitor and client under 56 and 57 Vict., cap. 61, section 1 (6) (the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893). The defendants were the clerk of the peace and the county surveyor, acting upon the instructions of the county council. Under 56 and 57 Vict., cap. 73, section 26 (the Local Government Act, 1894), it was the duty of the council to protect rights of way.

Mr. NEVILLE objected. The county council was not a party to the case. If the plaintiffs had succeeded they could only have got a judgment against the individual defendant, not against the council.

MR. JUSTICE BRUCE thought this case came within the Acts. The council had a duty to protect rights of way, and it was within their discretion to use this method. Costs would be granted as between solicitor and client.

BROWNE V. PETO.*

Mortgage—Mortgagor in possession—Leasing power—Lease comprising chattels and shooting rights—Conveyancing Act, 1881, sec. 18—Lease held valid against mortgagee.

In this case Alexander Browne, the plaintiff, claimed possession of Knowlton-court and 45 acres of land, parcel of the Knowlton estate, near Dover, in the county of Kent, held by the defendant under a lease granted on November 26, 1890. Notice to quit expiring on March 25, 1899, had been given on February 21, 1898. The defendant contended that under his lease he was entitled to remain in possession until the year 1904. The questions in the case were—first, whether this lease was binding on the plaintiff; secondly, whether the plaintiff had so conducted himself as to become bound by its terms; and, thirdly, whether, if not, the notice to quit was given by the person legally entitled to give such notice. The material facts were shortly as follows. In the year 1897 Captain L. N. H. D'Aeth mortgaged Knowlton-court and the Knowlton estate to three persons, trustees of the estate of Henry Forman, deceased, to secure a sum of £30,000 and further advances. Captain D'Aeth, being mortgagor in possession, granted to the defendant a lease of Knowlton-court mansion-house, 45 acres of the Knowlton estate, eight acres of meadow land, and the right of shooting and sporting over the Knowlton estate, for a term of 14 years from March 25, 1890, at the yearly rents of £315 10s. for the mansion-house, furniture, and sporting rights, £55 for the 45 acres, and £13 for the meadow land. There was a covenant by the tenant to spend £746 18s. 6d. on the property in internal repairs, which sum he was to be allowed to deduct from the rent at the rate of £50 each quarter. The tenant also covenanted to keep the interior and also the furniture in good repair, and it was provided that the tenant should not be entitled to require the lessor to do any internal repairs unless the same should be rendered necessary by the neglect of the lessor to keep the outside in repair. The lessor covenanted to do the outside repairs. There were provisos for the termination of the lease in certain events and also for re-entry in case of breach of the lessee's covenants. The furniture in the mansion, and let therewith, was stated to be of the value of £1,100. The defendant was in possession under this lease when the notice to quit was served upon him. In April, 1891, after the mortgagees had notice of the lease they made a further advance of £2,500. In January, 1893, the estate of Henry Forman, deceased, was resettled and conveyed to trustees to the use of A. H. Browne, father of the plaintiff, for life, after his death to the use of the trustees for a term of 1,000 years to secure a jointure to the widow of A. H. Browne, and subject thereto to the use of the plaintiff for life, remainder to his first and other sons in tail. In 1894 the interest under the mortgage was falling into arrear, and on the 23rd of September, 1896, the interest being still in arrear, proceedings for foreclosure were commenced, which resulted in a foreclosure decree made on November 11, 1896. In December, 1896, the trustees repudiated the lease, the plaintiff insisting on his rights under it. The defendant, however, regularly paid rent to and got receipts from the trustees of the resettlement, and not the tenant for life, and correspondence passed between the defendant and the solicitors to the trustees referring to the repairs to be done under the lease. On June 1, 1897, a summons was taken out in the Chancery Division before Mr. Justice Stirling, who made an order that the mortgagees should convey Knowlton-court and the Knowlton estate to the trustees of the resettlement of the 18th of January, 1893, to the uses and upon the trusts declared concerning the freehold hereditaments therein comprised. In pursuance of this order the mortgagees conveyed the Knowlton-court and estate to one Gray to the use of A. H. Browne for life, then to the use of the trustees of the settlement for a term of 1,000 years, and subject thereto to the use of the plaintiff for life. On the 21st of February, 1898, a notice to quit was served on the defendant couched in the following terms:—“To William Herbert Peto, of Knowlton Court, near Dover, in the county of Kent, Esquire,—I, the undersigned Charles Dorman, of 23, Essex-street, Strand, in the county of London, as the agent for and on behalf of your landlord, A. H. Browne, hereby give you notice to quit and deliver up possession of Knowlton Court, and the premises above mentioned, including the right of shooting, on the 25th day of March, 1899, or at the expiration of the year of your tenancy, which will expire at or next after the end of one half-year from the time of your being served with this notice.—CHARLES DORMAN.” On April 11, 1898, Mr. A. H. Browne died. The plaintiff became tenant in tail in possession, and the notice to quit expiring, he issued the writ in this action for possession.

Mr. DICKENS, Q.C., and Mr. MORTON SMITH, for the plaintiff, contended that the lease, as it included furniture in the mansion and sporting rights over the estate, was not a lease under section 18 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881; “Tolson v. Sheard” (5 Ch.D., 19); “Dayrell v. Hoare” (12 A. and E., 356); consequently it was not binding on the plaintiff or the trustees, and that therefore the defendant held, as tenant, from year to year, and that his tenancy was liable to be determined by notice to quit. Secondly, that the plaintiff was, under the deeds of January 18, 1893, and January 1, 1897, legal owner of the reversion expectant on the determination of the lease. If this were not so, the trustees of the resettlement were the legal owners. In either event, the notice to quit was good as having been given by the plaintiff either in his own right or on behalf of the trustees—"Jones v. Phipps," (L.R. 3, Q.B. 567).

Mr. BRAY, Q.C., and Mr. J. R. ATKIN, for the defendant, argued that the lease was none the less a lease under section 18 of the Conveyancing Act, because besides the land it conveyed furniture and sporting rights. Section 18 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, allowed a lease of the "land." Land was defined by section 2, subsection 2, and included incorporeal hereditaments, of which a right of shooting was one. [MR. JUSTICE BIGHAM.—May not a lease under this Act include a right of way?] As to the furniture, the rent issued out of the land, and not out of the furniture—"Read v. Lawnce" (2 Dyer 212 b.), "Farewell v. Dickenson" (6 B. and C. 251)—every lease of a house includes the lease of some chattels. Further, if not a valid lease under the statute it must be taken as an agreement to execute a valid lease (12 and 13 Vict., c. 26, s. 2). Counsel also argued that if as between the mortgagor and mortgagee the latter has adopted the lease made by the former the lease would become binding as between the mortgagee and the leasee. In numerous letters and affidavits the mortgagee had recognized the lease and could not now repudiate it—"Keech v. Hall" (Smith, L. C., 494), "Marquis of Donegal v. Greg" (13 Ir. Eq. Rep. 12, Sugden on Powers Ed. [1861], p. 766); "Taylor v. Stibbard" (2 Ves. 437); "Corbett v. Plowden" (25 Ch.D., 687). The receipts for rent clearly confirmed the lease (13 Vict., c. 17, s. 2). By making a further advance with notice of the lease the mortgagees were pro tanto at all events mortgagees after the date of the lease and bound by its terms.

Mr. DICKENS, in reply, referred to "Reg. v. Wood" (1 F. and F., 407), to establish that there could be no occupation of a right of shooting. A lease under the Conveyancing Act must be an occupation lease. He also referred to 37 and 38 Vict., c. 54, section 3, which first made sporting rights rateable. The statute 13 and 14 Vict., c. 26, only applied as against those who were successors in title to the grantor of the lease. Mortgagees were not successors in title to a mortgagor as regarded a leasee holding under a lease after the date of the mortgage. That statute had no application to such a case as this. "Dowager Duchess of Sutherland v. Duke of Sutherland" ([1893], 3 Ch., 169). Mere knowledge of the existence of a lease was not enough to bind the mortgagee. Nothing short of a new agreement would have that effect "Towerson v. Jackson" ([1891], 2 Q.B., 484).

MR. JUSTICE BIGHAM first decided the question as to the validity of the notice to quit, and in giving judgment said that even though the notice to quit was given by a person in whom the legal estate was not vested it was a good notice, as it was given by the authority and on behalf of the persons who had the legal estate: that the defendant knew that the plaintiff was the only person beneficially interested and had received the notice as given on behalf of the landlords whoever they might be. Upon the other points his Lordship delivered a written judgment as follows:—The next question in this case is whether the lease of November 26, 1890, comes within the meaning of section 18 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, so as to make it a good lease, as against the mortgagees, although they were not parties to it. Before that Act a lease made by a mortgagor alone did not bind the mortgagee, but it bound both the mortgagor and the tenant by estoppel; it was a good lease as between the parties to it, but it did not affect the mortgagee. This rule of law produced hardship, particularly in cases where the mortgagor had been left in possession and the tenant had taken a lease without notice of the existence of the mortgage. To remove this hardship and to enable persons in possession of land more freely to deal with it, the Act in question was passed. By section 18 it is provided that a mortgagor of land, while in possession, shall as against every encumbrancer have by virtue of the Act power to make any such lease of the mortgaged land as in that section described and authorized. The leases authorized are an agricultural or occupation lease, for any term not exceeding 21 years, and a building lease for any term not exceeding 99 years. It is said on the part of the plaintiff in the present case that the lease which the defendant relies on does not come within the meaning of this section; first, because it is not "a lease of the mortgaged land or any part thereof" and, secondly, because it is not "an occupation lease." Now, by the terms of the lease the house and furniture with the sporting rights are let for one lump sum of £315 10s., the other two properties being let for £55 and £13 respectively. It is said that the lease is not a lease of the mortgaged land because it comprises a lease of the furniture, the two together being let at one rent; it is said that it is a lease of chattels as well as of land, and that therefore it is not a lease within the section. I was referred to "Tolson v. Sheard" (5 Ch.D., 19) in support of this argument. That case merely decided that the trustees of two different trust estates, the properties of which happened to adjoin, could not grant a lease of both properties at one rent; it was said, and no doubt rightly said, that such a lease would be a breach of trust. That was the only point decided. I do not think the case is of any value for the purpose of interpreting the meaning of section 18 of the Conveyancing Act. There is no doubt in my mind that this is a lease of part of the land mortgaged; it is none the less such a lease because it comprises in addition certain chattels; nor were the mortgagees in any way injured by the addition, for, in my opinion, the whole rent must be taken as issuing out of the land and as being, therefore, recoverable by the mortgagees when they come to take possession "Read v. Lawnce" (2 Dyer, 212b), "Farewell v. Dickenson" (6 B. and C., 251). Then it is said that this lease is not good because it comprises the right to shoot over a part of the land in mortgage which is not included in the demise. This raises a more difficult question. It was held in the case of "Dayrell v. Hoare" (12 A. and E., 356) that a power to lease several "estates, hereditaments, and premises, or any part or parts thereof" did not authorize a lease of part of the lands with a right of shooting over the rest. It was said that if part was demised it must be demised in its entirety, and that it was outside the power to subject the land not demised to a servitude. But what kind of lease does this Act authorize? It is such a "lease of the mortgaged land or any part thereof as in this section described and authorized." The kinds of leases described and authorized are an agricultural or occupation lease and a building lease. These expressions are not defined, but I believe it is a common practice for the landlord to reserve the sporting rights when granting an agricultural lease. A lease with such a reservation would be an agricultural lease within the meaning of this Act. If after the making of such a lease the mortgagee in possession were to grant an occupation lease of the mansion with those reserved sporting rights, would such occupation lease be outside the power granted by the Act? I think not. If it would be outside the power, then the only way of letting the sporting rights would be by some deed in which both mortgagor and mortgagee would have to join. It must be remembered that "land" is defined in the Act (section 2, subsection ii.) to include "hereditaments corporeal or incorporeal," and that it is any part of land so described that the mortgagor has power to lease. On this part of the case I was referred to the judgment of Mr. Justice Romer, in the case of "Dowager Duchess of Sutherland v. Duke of Sutherland" ([1893] 3, Ch., 169). The case, however, does not appear to me to be of any importance in this connexion. It was decided with reference to the supposed exercise of powers under the Settled Land Acts, 1882 and 1890, the provisions of which are quite different from those in the Act I am now considering. But then it was further said that this was not an occupation lease within the meaning of section 18, because sporting rights could not be the subject of any occupation. I am not sure that sporting rights may not be the subject of occupation; the owner of sporting rights is rated as the "occupier" of them. But whether that be so or not, the fact (if it be a fact) that sporting rights cannot be the subject of occupation does not, in my opinion, render this lease any the less an occupation lease. I come, therefore, to the conclusion that the lease is a lease within the meaning of the Act, and that it is therefore binding on the plaintiff. Assuming, however, that it is not, it was said for the defendant that the alleged deviations from the statutory form were such as could be cured with the assistance of the provisions of the statute 12 and 13 Vict., c. 26, section 2. But I do not think it can be said that the inclusion of the furniture and the sporting rights amounted to a mistake or inadvertence within the meaning of the preamble to that Act, and I am of opinion that to rectify this lease by severing the furniture or the sporting rights from the land and by apportioning the rent between them would be to make an entirely new lease and not to rectify the already existing lease. Upon the question whether the plaintiff had confirmed the lease so as to bind himself by its terms, his Lordship held that, but for the Conveyancing Act, nothing had occurred to prevent the plaintiff or his predecessor from asserting that the tenancy of the defendant was merely a yearly tenancy. He gave judgment for the defendant upon the ground that the lease was a lease under section 18 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, and gave leave to amend the pleadings by adding any parties who might be necessary in any further proceedings.

COSSEY V. COSSEY AND OTHERS.*

Probate—Will—Destruction—Animus revocandi— Doctrine of dependent relative revocation.

Probate of a will granted on the ground that the testator had destroyed it with the sole intention of reviving an earlier will, and that there was, therefore, no animus revocandi.

This probate suit, arising out of the testamentary dispositions of the late Francis William Arthur Cossey, who died on May 31, 1899, was before the Court on December 12 last. The plaintiff was the sole executor of the deceased's last will, dated April 6, 1899, and he asked for probate of a draft of that will on the ground that the testator had never revoked that will, but had destroyed it, meaning to revive an earlier will. The defendants were the widow and sisters of the testator.

* Reported by J. H. MURPHY and W. O. WILLIS, Esqs., Barristers-at-Law.

The sisters pleaded that the will had been destroyed by the testator animo revocandi and asked the Court to pronounce for an intestacy.

Mr. Inderwick, Q.C., and Mr. Barnard were for the plaintiff; Mr. Kisch for the defendants.

Mr. BARNARD, in opening the plaintiff's case, said that the deceased duly executed a will on April 6, 1899, under which the plaintiff was appointed sole executor. On May 24, 1899, the testator, in the presence of his wife and a servant, said that he was going to destroy his will, because he desired to revive an earlier will which benefited his wife and her niece more than the last one did.

Evidence was called in support of counsel's opening statement.

At the end of the evidence his LORDSHIP said that he was satisfied (subject to anything that Mr. Kisch might say) that the testator destroyed his will, because he thought that what he had done had revived the earlier will.

Mr. KISCH intimated that he was not in a position to rebut the evidence put forward on behalf of the plaintiff.

Mr. BARNARD then submitted that this was a case of dependent relative revocation and cited the case of "Powell v. Powell" (L.R., 1 P. and D., 209). The learned counsel also referred to Tristram and Cooke's "Probate Practice," 11th Edition, p. 464, and Williams on Executors, 9th Edition, p. 126.

Mr. KISCH relied on the cases of "Evans v. Dallow" (31 L.J., P. and M., 128), and "Dickenson v. Swatman" (30 L.J., P. and M., 84).

Judgment was reserved.

MR. JUSTICE BUCKNILL, in delivering a considered judgment, said,—In this case I find the facts to be as follows. On April 6, 1899, the deceased person, Francis W. A. Cossey, called on Mr. Ernest Edward Chapman, a solicitor, about some legal proceedings with which he was threatened by his sister-in-law. He produced on that occasion a will made by him, and dated May 1, 1897, which he said he was anxious to alter. By that will his sister-in-law would be benefited. He then gave instructions to Mr. Chapman to prepare another will, which he wished to execute at once. That was done, and it was duly executed and attested in the presence of the testator, who called again on April 11, and took it away with him. On May 31, 1899, the testator died. By the will of May 1, 1897, he had left his property to his wife for life, and after her death to the sister-in-law already referred to, with power of appointment to her children. That will is not among the scripts, but its contents are proved by Mr. Chapman. By a will dated December 16, 1887, the testator had left his property to his wife, subject to a legacy of £2,000 to a niece, whom he and his wife had brought up, they having no children. On May 24, 1899, it being his wedding day, the testator told his wife that it should not pass without the destruction of the will of April 6, 1899, in which he told her he had been unjust to her; and he said he wished his property to go by the first will he had made, that is, the one dated December 16, 1887, by which she and her niece alone benefited. By his order the servant girl was summoned that she might be present when the will was destroyed, and in her presence he tore it up and gave her the pieces to burn, repeating to her first of all what he had previously said to his wife. On these facts I have to decide with what intention the testator destroyed that will. Was it done with a determination simply to cancel it, or was it done with the sole intention, wish, and expectation that the result of the destruction of the one will would be to revive and set up the will by which his wife and niece would benefit? In other words, does the doctrine of dependent relative revocation apply here? I cannot better define this doctrine than by repetition of part of the judgment of Sir James Wilde in "Powell v. Powell" (L.R., 1 P. and D., 212) :—" This doctrine is based on the principle that all acts by which a testator may physically destroy or mutilate a testamentary instrument are in their nature equivocal. They may be the result of accident, or, if intentional, of various intentions. It is, therefore, necessary in each case to study the act done by the light of the circumstances under which it occurred, and the declarations of the testator with which it may have been accompanied. For unless it be done animo revocandi it is no revocation. What, then, if the act of destruction be done with the sole intention of setting up and establishing some other testamentary paper, for which the destruction of the paper in question was only designed to make way? It is clear that in such case the animus revocandi had only a conditional existence, the condition being the validity of the paper intended to be substituted, and such has been the course of decision in the various cases quoted in argument." The declaration alleging the intention of the testator must be clear and free from doubt, and not vague and unreliable; vide "In the Goods of Weston" (L.R., 1 P. and D., 633), where a testatrix after the destruction of a will told her daughter, who had been absent from home and who saw the will lying torn to pieces in the fireplace, that she had destroyed it intending that a former will might take effect; vide also "In the Goods of Gentry" (L.R., 3 P. and D., 80), where Sir James Hannen held that he could not construe the language of the testator at the time of the cancellation of his will so as to apply the doctrine of dependent relative revocation. But in the case which I am now deciding I find no such difficulty, and, repeating the language of Sir James Wilde in "Powell v. Powell," that in studying the act done by the light of the circumstances under which it occurred and the declarations of the testator with which it was accompanied, I find that the act of destruction was done with the sole intention of setting up and establishing the will of December 16, 1887, for which the destruction of the will of April 6, 1899, was only designed to make way. The case of "Dickenson v. Swatman" (30 L.J., P. and M., 84) was cited by the learned counsel appearing for the defendant, but it is not necessary to say more about it than that, so far as it is inconsistent with "Powell v. Powell," I follow the latter case. I find, therefore, that this is a case in which the doctrine of dependent relative revocation applies, and I pronounce therefore for the will of April 6, 1899, as contained in the draft thereof produced and sworn to by Mr. Chapman, who made it.

SCOTT V. CARRITT.*

Metropolis—Buildings—General line of buildings —Consent of County Council—Exemptions—
Land "lawfully occupied" by buildings—
London Building Act, 1894, sec. 22.

This was an appeal from a judgment of a Divisional Court, consisting of Mr. Justice Ridley and Mr. Justice Darling, on a special case stated by a metropolitan police magistrate on the hearing of an appeal against an objection, served by a district surveyor on the appellant under section 150 of the London Building Act, 1894 (57 and 58 Vict., c. CCXIII.), to the proposed erection by the appellant of certain buildings at Nos. 180 and 182, Pentonville-road, in the county of London, beyond the general line of buildings, contrary to section 22 of the London Building Act, 1894. The appellant was the owner of Nos. 180 and 182, Pentonville-road, and, being desirous of rebuilding the premises, he applied to the London County Council on July 5, 1898, for their consent to the erection of the buildings to the line of frontage of certain existing buildings one storey high which had been erected on the forecourt of the premises. On August 4, 1898, the London County Council informed the appellant that they refused their consent to the erection of the buildings to the said line of frontage. In September, 1898, the appellant caused plans to be prepared, showing the extent of the then existing buildings, and submitted the same to the respondent, under section 43 of the Act, who certified the plans to be correct. On September 5, 1898, the appellant applied to the London County Council to sanction the proposed new buildings as deviations from the certified plans under section 43, subsection 2. of the Act. The County Council on November 16, 1898, declined to consider or give any decision on the application on the ground that the proposed deviations from the certified plans were not such as were contemplated or referred to in section 43, subsection 2. of the Act. On November 30, 1898, the superintending architect of the County Council certified the general line of buildings in that part of Pentonville-road in which the buildings were situate. The general line so certified was the main front of the buildings standing back from the forecourts. On January 6, 1899, the appellant served on the respondent notice that he was going to build on the forecourts, and on February 10 the respondent served notice of objection to such building under section 150 of the Act, stating that the work would be in contravention of the Act on the ground that it was proposed to erect the buildings without the consent of the County Council beyond the general line of buildings, contrary to the provisions of sections 22 and 200 of the Act. The old buildings at Nos. 180 and 182, Pentonville-road consisted of houses of three storeys with forecourts in front abutting on Pentonville-road, the houses being built 50ft. back from the road. The forecourt of No. 180 had been built over and occupied by a publichouse of one storey since about 1858, and the forecourt of No. 182 had been built over and occupied as a shop since 1877. The forecourt in front of No. 182 had been so built over and occupied under licences or consents from the Metropolitan Board of Works dated August 21, 1876. The forecourt in front of No. 180 had been built over without any consent or licence. There had been no certificate defining the general line of buildings in that part of Pentonville-road prior to the certificate of the superintending architect of November 30, 1898. It was contended by the appellant that the intended buildings came within section 43 of the Act of 1894, and that the County Council, upon compliance with that section, were bound to certify under subsection 2; and, further, that section 22, subsection 2, applied, inasmuch as the land was "lawfully occupied" by buildings within the meaning of that subsection, and that, therefore, the superintending architect had no power to certify the building line, and that such certificate afforded no objection in law to the appellant's rights under section 43. It was contended by the respondent that by the joint effect of the Act 7 Geo. IV., c. CXLII., which prohibited the erection of any building within 50ft. of the side of the Pentonville-road, and of section 75 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1862, the land forming the forecourts of the old buildings was not at the commencement of the Act of 1894 and had not been within seven years previously "lawfully occupied" by a building within the meaning of section 22, subsection 2, of the Act; that the building on the forecourt of No. 180 was without any licence or consent, and was therefore illegal, and that the building on the forecourt of No. 182 was erected under a consent which was subject to a condition that the building should not be at any time altered or raised without the consent of the Metropolitan Board of Works, and that by section 216 of the London Building Act, 1894, such condition was still binding on the appellant; and that section 43 related only to open spaces at the rear of buildings and had no application to the case. Upon appeal to a metropolitan police magistrate from the objection of the London County Council to the proposed new buildings, the magistrate held that the respondent's contention was well-founded, and dismissed the appeal, subject to the present case. The Divisional Court affirmed the decision of the magistrate. The appellant appealed to the Court of Appeal. By section 22 of the London Building Act, 1894 "(1) no building or structure shall without the consent in writing of the Council be erected beyond the general line of buildings in any street. . . . (2) This section shall not apply to any building or structure erected after the commencement of this Act upon land which, either at the commencement of this Act or at any time within seven years previously, has or shall have been lawfully occupied by a building or structure."

Mr. Macmorran, Q.C., and Mr. Germaine appeared for the appellant; Mr. Horace Avory appeared for the respondent.

The Court dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that it was conceded that the case was stated with the view of ascertaining the rights of the appellant as building owner in respect of the forecourts of Nos. 180 and 182. Different considerations applied to each of those forecourts. The general line of buildings was certified to stand back from the forecourts of the houses in this part of Pentonville-road, so as to run along the line of the main buildings. In front of the main buildings the vacant land in the forecourts had been built upon from time to time. On the forecourt of No. 180 a publichouse of one storey had been built. The publichouse came up level with the foot pavement of the street. The forecourt of No. 182 was built upon for the purpose of a shop, and the building was erected with the consent of the Metropolitan Board of Works upon condition that the building should only be a low building according to the plans submitted to the Board of Works. The licence, therefore, was given on the condition that the only building erected should be the one put up according to those plans and now upon the forecourt. The appellant desired to build, without the consent of the County Council, high buildings upon both forecourts in the place of the one storey buildings now there. He failed to get their consent under section 22 of the Act of 1894, and he then tried to bring himself within section 43, which, in his Lordship's opinion, did not apply to the case. The appellant then contended that he did not want the consent of the County Council, because, so far as No. 180 was concerned, by subsection 2 of section 22 of the Act of 1894, the section was not to apply to any building erected after the commencement of the Act upon land lawfully occupied by a building, and that the forecourt of No. 180 was "lawfully occupied" by this publichouse. That contention brought them back to 7 Geo. IV., c. CLXII., which by section 140 prohibited the erection of any building within 50ft. of the side of the Pentonville-road, and enacted that any building erected contrary to the Act should be deemed a common nuisance. The publichouse was erected after the passing of that Act, and it was clear that it sinned against the provisions of section 140. In other words, it was a common nuisance. Apart from any question of subsequent legislation it could not be argued that the forecourt of No. 180 was "lawfully occupied" when the building erected thereon was a common nuisance. It was said, however, that, as section 75 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1862, repealed section 140 of the Act of George IV., the publichouse no longer unlawfully occupied the forecourt, inasmuch as the prohibition in the earlier Act was gone, and that, therefore, the land was "lawfully occupied" in 1894. But by section 108 of the Act of 1862, except as therein specially provided, nothing therein contained was to in any way prejudice or affect any act, matter, or thing made, done, or commenced prior to the passing of the Act. That meant that, though section 140 of the Act of George IV. was repealed, to put a concrete case, any house which was a common nuisance under the earlier Act was not affected by the repeal of that section. It did not make that lawful which was not lawful before. Then section 215 of the London Building Act, 1894, repealed section 75 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1862, but the repeal was not to affect the past operation of any enactment thereby repealed, nor any thing done or suffered under any enactment thereby repealed. Therefore, those two Acts kept alive that which was done in contravention of the Act of George IV. It seemed to him, therefore, that at the passing of the Act of 1894 the ground was not "lawfully occupied" within the meaning of subsection 2 of section 22 of the Act of 1894. Therefore, as regards the publichouse, No. 180, the consent of the County Council was necessary. Next, with regard to No. 182, the erection of the shop on the forecourt did not come within the prohibition in the Act of George IV., because the consent of the Metropolitan Board of Works had been obtained for the building of the shop. The ground was "lawfully occupied" upon a condition, but if the condition were broken it would be unlawfully occupied. Inasmuch as this litigation was instituted for the purpose of ascertaining what were the rights of the parties, in his opinion as soon as the appellant commenced to build in contravention of the condition the County Council could stop him upon the ground that their consent had not been obtained. For those reasons the appellant could not build on either plot without the consent of the County Council. The appeal must, therefore, be dismissed.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY and LORD JUSTICE COLLINS delivered judgment to the same effect.

PAYNE V. THE CORK COMPANY (LIMITED).*

Company—Winding up—Sale of company's undertaking—Dissentient shareholder—Purchase of interest—Companies Act, 1862, sec. 161.

In the event of a proposed sale of a company's undertaking in a voluntary liquidation a dissentient shareholder cannot be deprived by the articles of association of the rights conferred by sec. 161 of the Companies Act, 1862.

This case raised the important question whether a company can by its articles of association deprive dissentient shareholders of the rights conferred upon them by section 161 of the Companies Act, 1862, in the event of a proposed sale of the company's undertaking under a voluntary liquidation. It was a motion by the plaintiff, who was the holder of 200 shares, for an injunction to restrain the company and its voluntary liquidator from carrying into effect certain resolutions and agreements, which had been passed and confirmed by general meetings of the company, for the purpose of reconstructing the company on the footing of a sale of its undertaking and property to a new company in consideration of partly-paid shares in such new company. The plaintiff had given notice to the liquidator of his dissent from the resolutions, and required him either to abstain from carrying the resolutions into effect or to purchase the interest of the plaintiff at a price to be determined in the manner specified by section 161 of the Companies Act, 1862. The liquidator took up the position that the plaintiff was precluded by articles 130 and 131 of the company's articles of association from acquiring the rights given to dissentient members by section 161. The plaintiff thereupon commenced these proceedings. Section 161 of the Companies Act, 1862, provides that where any company is proposed to be or is in the course of being wound up voluntarily, and the whole or a portion of its business or property is proposed to be sold to another company, the liquidators of the first-mentioned company may, with the sanction of a special resolution, receive in compensation for such sale shares or other like interests in such other company for the purpose of distribution amongst the members of the company being wound up, and any sale so made by the liquidators shall be binding on the members of the company, subject to the proviso that a dissentient shareholder may, by giving notice to the liquidators in manner prescribed by the section, require the liquidators either to abstain from carrying the resolution into effect or to purchase his interest at a price to be determined as thereafter mentioned. Articles 130 and 131 of the company's articles of association were as follows:—

" 130.—Any such liquidator may (irrespective of the powers conferred upon him by the Companies Acts and as an additional power), with the authority of a special resolution, sell the undertaking of the company, or the whole or any part of its assets, for shares fully or partly paid up or the obligations of or other interest in any other company, and may by the contract of sale agree for the allotment to the members direct of the proceeds of sale in proportion to their respective interests in the company, and in case the shares of this company shall be of different classes, may arrange for the allotment in respect of preference shares of this company, of obligations of the purchasing company, or of shares of the purchasing company with any preference or priority over or with a larger amount paid up than the shares allotted in respect of ordinary shares of this company, and may further by the contract limit a time at the expiration of which shares, obligations, or other interest not accepted or required to be sold shall be deemed to have been refused and be at the disposal of the liquidator or the purchasing company.

" 131.—Upon any sale under the last preceding article or under the powers given by section 161 of the Companies Act, 1862, no member shall be entitled to require the liquidator either to abstain from carrying into effect the sale or the resolution authorizing the same or to purchase such member's interest in this company; but in case any member shall be unwilling to accept the shares, obligations, or interest to which under such sale he would be entitled, he may, within 14 days of the passing of the resolution authorizing the sale, by notice in writing to the liquidator, require him to sell such shares, obligations, or interest, and thereupon the same shall be sold in such manner as the liquidator may think fit, and the net proceeds shall be paid over to the member requiring such sale."

Mr. Rowland Whitehead appeared for the plaintiff; and Mr. W. F. Hamilton for the defendants, the company and its liquidator.

MR. JUSTICE STIRLING, in giving judgment, said that the question was whether the plaintiff was precluded by article 130 and 131 of the company's articles of association from asserting his rights under section 161 of the Companies Act, 1862. His Lordship referred to the section and continuing said that a power to sell meant, in the absence of any context to the contrary, a power to sell for money, and a person who exercised such a power was bound to sell for money. But the Legislature had thought fit by section 161 to extend the powers of a voluntary liquidator by giving him power to accept shares as a consideration for the sale of the property of the company. But that power was not absolute: it was subject to a proviso in favour of dissentient members. The object of the section was very clearly expressed by Mr. Justice Chitty in the case of "Cotton v. Imperial, &c., Investment Corporation" ([1892] 3 Ch., 454). Supposing this was a sale exclusively under section 161, would article 131 bind the plaintiff so as to deprive him of his rights under that section? His Lordship thought not. The article would be ultra vires for that purpose. The Legislature had conferred upon a voluntary liquidator the power of selling in a particular way, and had attached a proviso for the protection of dissentient shareholders, and it was not competent for a company by its articles of association to deprive the shareholders of that protection. The language of Mr. Justice Byrne in the case of "In re Peveril Gold Mines (Limited)" ([1898] 1 Ch., 122) with reference to another section was applicable to the present case. That learned Judge there said:—"I am of opinion that the company had no right, having regard to the Act of Parliament, to enter into such contract as a condition and part of the general contract binding upon all shareholders, whatever separate or distinct bargain they might have the power to make with an individual who happened to be or to desire to become a shareholder. This article appears to be one more attempt to remove a statutory safeguard of the inexperienced intending shareholder. Not one per cent. of intending shareholders read the articles before applying for or accepting a transfer of shares, and a shareholder does not expect to find that he has entered into a special contract waiving his statutory rights." But then it was said that this was a sale which the company had power to authorize and did authorize by its articles irrespective of section 161; and doubtless article 130 did purport to confer a power to do this irrespective of section 161. Had the company authority to confer such an additional power on a liquidator? The articles purported to confer a power to sell without regard to the safeguards of section 161. It was not, in his Lordship's opinion, within the powers of the company to say that the liquidator should do the thing without regard to those safeguards. It must be done in the way pointed out by the Legislature and in no other way. Supposing that the earlier part of article 131 were omitted (and in his Lordship's opinion it was ultra vires), the latter portion could not bind the plaintiff. The case fell within what was said by the Master of the Rolls in "Baring-Gould v. Sharpington Combined Pick and Shovel Syndicate" ([1899] 2 Ch., 90):—"I come to the conclusion that there was no agreement between the company on the one side and Mr. Baring-Gould on the other which could deprive him of his rights as a dissentient member under section 162. Any contrary interpretation of that section would come to this—that the company could by the articles of association made beforehand, before there was any dispute with a dissentient member, bind all the members, and deprive them of the benefits conferred on them in the event of their becoming dissentient members under section 162. I do not think this can be done by the articles of association." The Master of the Rolls was of opinion that it was impossible by articles of association to deprive dissentient shareholders of the benefit of their rights under section 161. In the case of "Cotton v. Imperial, &c., Investment Corporation" ([1892] 3 Ch. 454) the sale was not in a winding up, but by the company as a going concern under the powers of the memorandum of association. That did not apply here. In his Lordship's judgment, therefore, the plaintiff was entitled to the relief for which he asked, and, unless the liquidator would give an undertaking, there must be an injunction in the form of that granted in "Baring-Gould v. Sharpington Combined Pick and Shovel Syndicate."

THE SCHOOL BOARD FOR LONDON V. THE ASSESSMENT COMMITTEE OF THE WANDSWORTH AND CLAPHAM UNIONS.*

Rating—Rateable value—School buildings—Mode of assessment—Rent which a tenant could be found to give.

This was a case stated by the justices of London sitting in quarter sessions. It involved an important point as to the rating of the school buildings of the London School Board. One of these, the New Park-road School, was inserted in the supplemental valuation list for the parish of Clapham at a gross value of £1,074 and a rateable value of £895. The gross value was arrived at by adding 4 per cent. of the sum given by the Board as the value of the land on which the school was built to 5 per cent. of the sum given by the Board as the capital value of the buildings. It was found by the case that the buildings were more suitable for educational purposes than for any other, and that, though they might be occupied for purposes other than those of a school, they would not be so convenient for any such purpose without alteration, but that if the buildings were vacant a tenant or tenants could be found to give on an annual letting a rent sufficient to support the assessment. The case further found that the Board had borrowed the money for building the school and purchasing the land on which it stood from the County Council at the rate of £2 13s. per cent. The quarter sessions upheld the assessment.

Mr. R. C. GLEN, who appeared for the School Board, contended that, as there was no evidence that any one would give a greater rent for the school than the School Board, the proper principle of assessment was to take as the gross value the rate per cent. of the capital value of the land and buildings at which the School Board would be able to borrow money for the purpose of purchasing such land and erecting such buildings because that was the utmost amount which they would be prepared to pay as rent. In the present case that rate per cent. would be £2 13s. per cent., not 4 per cent. or 5 per cent. He referred to the "London County Council v. the Churchwardens of Erith" ([1893] A.C., at page 592).

Mr. J. C. Earle, for the respondents, was not called.

MR. JUSTICE GRANTHAM said that the case was unarguable. It might just as well be said that, if a person interested in education were to lend money for a school to the School Board at 1 per cent., then the gross value of such a school would be arrived at by taking 1 per cent. of the capital value; or that if money were lent for that purpose free of interest altogether then the school would be valued at nothing at all.

MR. JUSTICE CHANNELL said that the appellants had been stated out of Court, because it was found in the case that if the schools were vacant a tenant could be found to give a rent sufficient to support the assessment.

The appeal was accordingly dismissed.

IN RE AN ARBITRATION BETWEEN THE LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL AND LEWIS.*

Local Government—Factory and Workshops—Means of escape from fire—Arbitration.

In an arbitration under sec. 7 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1891, to determine the means of escape to be provided in a factory which formed part only of a building, the award directed work which would necessitate entering upon the rest of the building, which was in the possession of third persons: held, that the award was bad.

This was a motion to set aside an award made by an umpire in an arbitration under section 7 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1891. Messrs. Lewis were the owners of a building, No. 21, Moor-lane, in the City of London, of which the basement, ground floor, and first floor were let on leases for different terms of years as cloth and toy warehouses, the second, third, and fourth floors containing printing works, which are "non-textile factories" within the meaning of section 93 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878. The London County Council, as the sanitary authority of the district in which No. 21, Moor-lane was situate, conceived that these factories were not furnished with adequate means of escape in case of fire. By the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, section 93, a part of a factory may for the purposes of the Act be taken to be a separate factory. Where a place situate within the close, curtilage, or precincts forming a factory is solely used for some purpose other than the manufacturing process or handicraft carried on in the factory, such place shall not be deemed to form part of that factory, but shall if otherwise it would be a factory be deemed to be a separate factory and be regulated accordingly. The Factory and Workshop Act, 1891, section 7, provides that every factory constructed after the date of the Act is to be furnished with a certificate from the sanitary authority of the district that the factory is provided on the storeys above the ground floor with such means of escape in case of fire as can reasonably be required under the circumstances of each case, and a factory not so furnished is deemed not to be kept in conformity with the Act of 1878. Further, with respect to all factories to which the foregoing provisions do not apply (including in that description the factories at the top of 21, Moor-lane), it is the duty of the sanitary engineer of every district from time to time to ascertain whether all such factories within their district are provided with such means of escape as aforesaid, and, in case of any factory not so provided, to serve on the owner of the factory a notice in writing specifying the measures necessary for providing such means of escape, and requiring him to carry out the same before a specified date, and thereupon such owner is, notwithstanding any agreement with the occupier, to have power to take such steps as are necessary for complying with the requirements, and, unless such requirements are so complied with, such owner is made liable to a fine not exceeding £1 for every day that such non-compliance continues. In case of a difference of opinion between the owner of a factory and the sanitary authority the difference is, on the application of either party, to be referred to arbitration, and the award is made binding on the parties thereto. The London County Council, being of opinion that these floors were not provided with proper means of escape in case of fire, served upon Messrs. Lewis a notice calling upon them to make such structural alterations in the building as should be requisite to provide the upper storeys with proper means of escape. Messrs. Lewis not agreeing with the demands of the London County Council, the matter was referred to arbitration. The arbitrators appointed an umpire who made an award directing among other things that a new staircase should be provided from the basement to the top floor, such staircase to be connected with all the floors by means of doors not less than 3ft. 3in. wide; that a proportion of not less than half of the windows facing Moor-lane on each floor should be made to open of sufficient height and width to allow a full-grown person to pass through in case of need. The award further contained particulars of the materials and manner of and in which the work was to be executed.

SIR B. T. REID, Q.C., Mr. MACMORRAN, Q.C., and Mr. J. R. ATKIN, for Messrs. Lewis, contended that the award was bad in that it required the owner to enter upon tenements in the possession of third persons with or without their leave or licence. The arbitrator had no jurisdiction to make any such award. "Turner v. Swainson" (1 M. and W., 572). It might be that unless the alterations were made the fine of £1 per day must be paid, but that was not the question here. The question was whether the owner could be compelled to enter and commit trespasses upon the premises of other persons in order to execute alterations. The Act of 1895 gave power to the owner to enter upon a factory or several factories where several existed in the same building; but where part of a building was and part was not a factory there was no power given to the owner to enter upon the part which was not a factory.

Mr. DALDY and Mr. EDWARDES JONES (Mr. Avory with them), for the London County Council, contended that the award was merely a statement of what was necessary for the safety of the building. By the Factory Acts the whole building was made a factory. They further contended that the only alterations to be made were such as were reasonable under all the circumstances of the case, and that the award should not be set aside, but remitted to the arbitrators that they might consider whether, under the circumstances, the alterations in question were reasonable.

The COURT held that the arbitrators or umpire had no jurisdiction to order the owner to enter upon the tenements unless the whole house were a factory. In this case there were two factories at the top of the house, but the rest of the building was not a factory. The award, however, would not be set aside, but remitted to the arbitrators with a direction to them to consider what alterations, if any, were reasonably requisite under all the circumstances of the case. As, however, the question of the arbitrators' jurisdiction had not been raised earlier, the award was remitted without costs.

BANCROFT V. HEATH.*

Insurance—Fire policy—Warranty—Breach—Material misdescription.

This was an action to recover a loss under a Lloyd's fire policy for £500 effected with the defendant and others, underwriters at Lloyd's, on the plaintiff's stock for 12 months from May 15, 1898, at certain premises in Manchester. The policy contained the following clause:—"Warranted same gross rate, terms and conditions, as and to follow the British Law which company has £1,750 on the block of brick buildings in which this risk is a portion of the same." During the currency of the policy a fire occurred at the premises, doing damage to the stock. The underwriters refused to settle the loss, on the ground that there had been a breach of the above clause. The fact was the buildings had formerly been insured with the British Law Office for £1,750. At Lady-day, 1898, the lease of part of the premises terminated, and a new policy for £1,350 was then effected with the British Law Office on the part of the buildings still held. Neither at the date of the acceptance of the risk nor at any time during the currency of the policy sued upon were the buildings insured for more than £1,350 with the British Law Office.

Mr. Pickford, Q.C., and Mr. George Rhodes appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. Theobald Mathew for the defendant.

MR. JUSTICE MATHEW, in giving judgment, having referred to the terms of the policy and having read the clause in question, said that the clause was not very scientifically framed, but it clearly indicated the intention of the parties. Such clauses were common in Lloyd's fire policies. The underwriters were not in a position to make inquiries as to the risk, but they were always willing to follow in the wake of other companies. As a general rule the clause covered the same interest and risk as the original policy, but in the present case the underwriters had been content with the stipulation that the existing insurance on the buildings should be applied to this risk, and the clause therefore ran "to follow the British Law which company has £1,750," not on the identical subject-matter and risk, those words having been struck out of the policy, but on the "block of brick buildings in which this risk is a portion of the same." Now, when this insurance was effected the buildings were not insured for £1,750. A lease of one portion had terminated, and a fresh policy for £1,350 had been taken out in respect of the portion remaining. During the currency of the policy sued upon, a fire occurred, and the underwriters objected to pay on the ground that the facts constituted a breach of a condition of the insurance, and this action was then brought. In the first place, it was contended on behalf of the plaintiff that the reference to the form of the insurance was only intended to secure the portion of the building where the plaintiffs' goods were—that the language was descriptive only, and that the misdescription was of no importance. His Lordship could not adopt that construction of the clause. The clause was a condition of the insurance, containing an allegation of existing facts bearing on the risk. According to the principle governing the question, there must be a strict compliance with the terms of the condition. The risk now sought to be covered by the policy was not that which was described in the policy. It was said that the difference was immaterial; in other words, that if the underwriters had known the real facts they would still have accepted the risk. But no question as to the materiality of the misstatement arose, and therefore the underwriters had on this point a good answer to the claim. Then it was said that the clause was qualified by the reference to the conditions of the British Law Office policy. The first condition of that policy provided that any material misdescription of any of the property insured or of the buildings containing the property, or any misstatement of a material fact affecting the risk, rendered the policy void. It was said that there was no material misdescription in this case, and that the stringent language in the clause in question was qualified by this condition in the original policy. In his Lordship's opinion the two policies were independent and stood apart, and it was not intended that the terms of the Lloyd's policy should be in any way qualified. Then it was said that the defendants were, in the circumstances of the case, precluded from relying on the clause. It appeared that an insurance agent at Bury, named Jackson, had been instructed by the plaintiffs to renew the insurance on their goods. The former policy contained a clause similar to the one in question, and Jackson, having made inquiries and having been informed that the insured buildings were the same, copied the clause from the former policy. Neither the plaintiffs nor the underwriters had been informed as to Jackson's inquiries. It was said that Jackson became the defendant's agent because his commission was deducted from the premium paid to the underwriters; that this method of payment stamped him as their agent. This method was adopted in the ordinary course of business for the convenience of all parties, and although the plaintiffs did not pay Jackson directly, they did so indirectly, and he was their agent. On all these points the plaintiffs' case failed, and there must be judgment for the defendant with costs.

PHARMACEUTICAL SOCIETY V. WHITE.*

Pharmacy Acts—Sale of poison—Seller, who is—Pharmacy Act, 1868, sec. 15.

A shopkeeper who transmits an order, from a customer for the purchase of a poison, to a properly registered vendor, receiving 25 per cent. of the price as commission, held not to be a seller within the meaning of the Pharmacy Act, 1868.

This was an appeal from the County Court Judge of Worcestershire. The action was brought under section 15 of the Pharmacy Act, 1868, to recover a penalty from the defendant White for selling a two-gallon drum of a certain weed-killer, which was admittedly a poison within that section, he not being a duly registered pharmaceutical chemist or chemist and druggist. It appeared that the defendant kept a florist's shop in Worcester, and that his practice with reference to the sale of the weed-killer, which was manufactured by the Boundary Chemical Company (Limited), of Liverpool, was this:—The defendant would take an order for the weed-killer from any one who came to his shop, receive the money, and give a receipt for it. He did not, however, keep the weed-killer in stock, but would send the order on to the Liverpool company, and the company would deliver the weed-killer. The defendant received 25 per cent. of the price of the weed-killer as his commission, accounting to the company quarterly for his receipts from the sale of the weed-killer and deducting the 25 per cent. It was admitted that the course of business above explained had been pursued with reference to the drum of weed-killer in question in the present case. According to the defendant's evidence, which the County Court Judge accepted, the defendant, on being asked for the weed-killer, had said that the purchaser might order the weed-killer direct from the company or that he, the defendant, would transmit the order. The learned County Court Judge gave judgment for the defendant, holding that under the circumstances the defendant was not the seller of the weed-killer within the meaning of section 15 of the Pharmacy Act, 1868.

Mr. CRUMP, Q.C., and Mr. GREY argued on behalf of the appellants that the defendant, though he was not acting as a principal, was the seller of the weed-killer within the meaning of the Act. They cited "Templeman v. Trafford" (8 Q.B.D., 397); "Pharmaceutical Society v. Wheeldon" (24 Q.B.D., 683); and "Pharmaceutical Society v. London and Provincial Supply Association" (5 App. Cas., 857).

Mr. Cavanagh appeared for the respondent.

The COURT, without hearing counsel for the respondent, dismissed the appeal.

MR. JUSTICE GRANTHAM said he had no doubt the learned County Court Judge was right on the facts in the case. The defendant was not the person who was managing the sale, but was merely a conduit pipe to introduce one person to another. The nature of the case might be illustrated by what might take place in a shop. Suppose a person went into a chemist's shop to buy rat-killer, that he saw a boy serving in the shop and told him what he wanted. The boy might then direct the purchaser to go to his master, who was serving at another counter, or offer to tell the master himself what the purchaser required. Then if the master, a qualified man, supplied the poison, it could certainly not be said that the boy was the seller. If so, how could it be said that a person who does not make the article, and keep it, but merely sends on orders for it, came within the section?

MR. JUSTICE CHANNELL delivered judgment to the same effect.

CHARNOCK V. MERCHANT.*

Criminal Law—Practice—Evidence—Criminal Evidence Act, 1898, sec. 1 (f)—Asking person charged as to previous conviction.
Conviction quashed.

This was a special case stated by justices, before whom the appellant, who was the master of a public elementary school at Leintwardine, in Herefordshire, was charged under section 1 of the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act, 1894, with assaulting a pupil at the school. On the hearing of the case the appellant was called as a witness on his own behalf, and in cross-examination the respondent's solicitor asked him whether he had been previously convicted of a similar offence. The appellant's counsel objected to the question being put, relying upon section 1 (f) of the Criminal Evidence Act, 1898, but the justices overruled the objection, and the appellant admitted that on a previous occasion he had been convicted of an assault on a boy under his charge. In the result the justices convicted the appellant. The justices stated that the answer of the appellant to the question above mentioned in no way affected their minds, as the fact of the conviction was well known to all of them, three of their number having adjudicated on the occasion when the appellant was so convicted. The questions for the Court were, first, whether the question as to the previous conviction was admissible; and, secondly, if not, whether the admission of the question invalidated the conviction.

Mr. Lynn and Mr. Organ appeared for the appellant; and Mr. Cecil Walsh for the respondent.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

MR. JUSTICE GRANTHAM said it was clear that the Act of 1898 applied to the case, although the Act of 1894 had itself provided for the calling of the defendant as a witness. The magistrates had therefore unfortunately allowed a question to be put to the accused which ought not to have been put. It might be that it did not affect the magistrates' minds; but that was not precisely what they said. The conviction must therefore be quashed.

MR. JUSTICE CHANNELL delivered judgment to the same effect.

EWING AND LAWSON V. HANBURY AND CO.*

Contract—Mistake—Contract in writing—Mistake of one party as to price—Rectification refused.

This was an action to recover the price of work done. The plaintiffs were boilermakers carrying on business in Glasgow. The defendants were the owners of a patent for the construction of an instrument used in the business of malting, called a malting-drum. The defendants, being desirous of having some plates fashioned and drilled for the purpose of their instrument, approached the plaintiffs with a view to their undertaking the work. The plaintiffs were supplied with a specification, and they wrote to the defendants offering to do the work "at the rate of 30s. per cwt.," the plates to be supplied by the defendants. The defendants answered by letter referring to the plaintiffs' quotation of 30s. per cwt. and accepting the offer. The plaintiffs commenced the work, and when they had completed rather more than half they sent in their bill. On receipt of the bill the defendants said that there had been a mistake, that they had never intended to agree to pay 30s. per cwt., that they had meant to pay 30s. per ton. Negotiations were commenced with a view to making a fresh contract, but nothing came of them, and eventually this action was commenced, in which the plaintiffs claimed payment at the rate of 30s. per cwt. The defendants made a payment into Court on the basis of what they considered a reasonable price for the work, and they counterclaimed to have the contract rectified by substituting the word "ton" for "cwt." The plaintiffs gave evidence to the effect that their offer of 30s. per cwt. was based upon calculations made by them as to the cost of the work. Their price was high, but that, they said, was due to the fact that they were very busy at the time, and that the specification required extraordinary accuracy. Expert witnesses were called to speak as to what would have been a reasonable price.

Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. A. H. Spokes

appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Abel Thomas and Mr. H. Tindal Atkinson for the defendants.

MR. JUSTICE MATHEW, in delivering judgment, said that the evidence showed that a reasonable price to charge for the work would have been from £6 to £8. The price quoted by the plaintiffs was most extravagant, but the figure which the defendants insisted that they were thinking of—namely, 30s. a ton—was preposterous. The plaintiffs had acted in good faith in making their offer; they knew they were asking a high price, but they thought that they would have to cut it down. The defendants, however, accepted the offer on the very terms in which it had been made. In so doing they no doubt made a mistake. What then was the position? On behalf of the plaintiffs it was said that although the parties might not be ad idem as to value, they were ad idem as to the terms of the contract, and that the defendants had not been misled by a misrepresentation of the plaintiffs', who were therefore, it was contended, entitled to recover the price named in their letter. The defendants said that if the plaintiffs knew or had the means of knowing that the defendants were not meaning to pay 30s. a cwt., the contract ought to be set aside. But even supposing that the plaintiffs did know that, they were entitled to assume that they were dealing with some one who knew as much about the business as they did. The defendants themselves were uncertain as to how far the plaintiffs' charges were excessive. A number of cases had been cited in which the Court of Chancery had rectified deeds or contracts on the ground of mistake. But in those cases the Court was able to ascertain what was the actual contract which the parties had intended to enter into, and the Court had then rectified the instrument which did not carry out the parties' intention. In this case, however, the only contract was that contained in the plaintiffs' letter and in the defendants' acceptance of the plaintiffs' offer. The authority which contained the law applicable to this case was "Smith v. Hughes" (L.R., 6 Q.B., 597), and his Lordship had no hesitation in saying that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover on the basis of the contract price. There would therefore be judgment for the plaintiffs.

A bedstead held to be included in the word "bedding" in sec. 147 of the County Courts Act, 1888, and to be therefore exempt from distress.

This was a case stated by a metropolitan police magistrate upon a complaint preferred to him by the appellant. The question was whether the word "bedding" in section 147 of the County Courts Act, 1888, which is incorporated in the Law of Distress Amendment Act, 1888, included the bedstead so as to make that article exempt from distress. The section, so far as is material to the case, is as follows:—"Excepting the wearing apparel and bedding of such person or his family and the tools and implements of his trade to the value of £5 which shall to that extent be protected from such seizure." The complaint was that the respondent unlawfully took from the appellant a bedstead by unlawful distress. The magistrate dismissed the complaint, holding that the bedstead was not within the meaning of the exception in the Act.

Mr. FOA, on behalf of the appellant, contended that "bedding" included the bedstead. He cited Dr. Johnson's dictionary, and read passages from Chaucer, Shakespeare, and Dryden, and a passage from Mr. Rudyard Kipling's latest poem, "The Absent-Minded Beggar" — "They put their sticks and bedding up the spout."

Mr. RANDOLPH, for the respondent, contended that bedstead meant the frame-work on which the bedding was supported and that it could not therefore be considered as part of the bedding. He cited Webster's dictionary.

MR. JUSTICE CHANNELL said that the question in this case was not whether the bedstead was commonly included within the meaning of the word bedding. The word bedding was far more frequently used in a sense not including the bedstead. The question, however, was in what sense the word was used in the Act. The Act excepted from liability to distress the wearing apparel and the bedding of the tenant. That meant the bedding of the particular person in question, whatever it was and however inappropriate it might be for the purpose. It meant the sleeping accommodation of the person in question, that was to say, whatever he used for that purpose. If the person used a mattress only, that would be his "bedding" within the Act. So also if he used a bedstead in addition to a mattress or even without a mattress, that, too, would be included in his bedding. The Act was fairly capable of that construction. As the man in this case used a bedstead as well as a mattress, the bedstead formed part of his sleeping accommodation and was privileged from distress.

MR. JUSTICE BUCKNILL concurred.

The appeal was accordingly allowed, and the case was sent back to the magistrate with an expression of their Lordships' opinion.

1867, and for an injunction. Section 32 of the Metropolitan Fire Brigade Act, 1865, provides that every waterworks company to which the Act applies "shall provide at the expense of the (Metropolitan) Board (of Works) (of whom the London County Council are the successors), in any mains or pipes within the metropolis, plugs (declared in the Metropolitan Water Act, 1871, to include hydrants and other apparatus for a supply of water from the company's pipes in case of fire) for the supply of water in case of fire at such places, of such dimensions, and in such form as the Board may require, and the Fire Brigade shall be at liberty to make such use thereof as they may deem necessary for the purpose of extinguishing any fire." Section 4 of the London County Council (General Powers) Act, 1894, provides that "it shall be lawful for the Council to enter into and carry into effect any agreement with the companies supplying water in London and the vestries and district boards of works in London, or any of them respectively, with respect to the use of fire hydrants for flushing and other purposes," and that the company owning the main or pipe with which the hydrant is connected and the local authority (if any) to whom the hydrant belongs shall be a party to such agreement. Section 37 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, provides that the waterworks companies shall, "in all the pipes to which any fire-plug shall be fixed" "provide and keep constantly laid on, unless prevented by frost, unusual drought, or other unavoidable accident, or during necessary repairs, a sufficient supply of water for the following purposes (that is to say) for cleansing the sewers and drains, for cleansing and watering the streets, and for supplying any public pumps, baths, or washhouses. . . ." The hydrants to which the actions more particularly referred were situated in Dalston-lane, Queen's-road, Downs-road, Wells-street, and Brooksby's-walk. In and between the months of July and September, 1897, these streets were in course of being paved and channelled, and the defendants from time to time, without having asked for, or obtained, the consent of the Council, used and allowed those who were engaged in paving and channelling the streets to use the hydrants for the purpose of obtaining from the defendants' main a supply of water for the operations. The hydrants were provided by the defendants under the provisions of section 32 of the Metropolitan Fire Brigade Act, 1865, and were repaired at the expense of the Council or their predecessors, and they were of a pattern specially selected by the Council or their predecessors to meet the requirements of the fire brigade. The questions for the opinion of the Court were :—(1) Whether hydrants, fire-plugs, and apparatus provided by the defendants pursuant to section 32 of the Metropolitan Fire Brigade Act, 1865, and (or) section 34 of the Metropolitan Water Act, 1871, or pursuant to either of those sections, may in the absence of any agreement under the London County Council (General Powers) Act, 1894, lawfully be used for any purpose or purposes in addition to the supply of water for extinguishing fires. And if the Court should answer the preceding question in the affirmative, (2) whether such additional user is limited to the purposes specified in section 37 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, or 'to any and what other purposes; (3) whether such additional user may take place without the consent of the London Council thereto; (4) whether such right of user is confined to the defendants themselves, or may with the permission of the defendants be exercised by persons other than the defendants.

Mr. ENGLISH HARRISON, Q.C. (Mr. J. H. Dugdale with him), for the Council, contended that the Council were entitled to the exclusive user of the hydrants for the purpose of extinguishing fires, and referred to sections 38 to 43 of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, in support of his proposition, as well as to the section set out above.

MR. CRIPPS, Q.C. (Mr. R. B. D. Acland with him), for the defendants, contended that there was nothing in any of the Acts referred to which restricted the powers of the defendants with regard to the use of the hydrants. He cited a passage from the judgment of Lord Esher, M.R., in "Moore v. Lambeth Waterworks Company" (17 Q.B.D., 462, at p. 465).

MR. JUSTICE BRUCE said that he was clearly of opinion that the first of the questions they were asked to decide ought to be answered in the affirmative. The section of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, and other Acts referred to in the argument imposed certain obligations upon the waterworks companies, but there was nothing in them limiting the powers of the companies in respect to the use of their own water. With regard to the remainder his Lordship answered (2) in the negative, (3) in the affirmative, and (4) in the negative.

MR. JUSTICE PHILLIMORE said that he was of the same opinion. Various obligations were imposed upon the waterworks companies, one of which was to provide plugs (now hydrants) at the expense of the Metropolitan Board of Works (now the London County Council). They were bound to allow water to be drawn from their pipes by means of such hydrants free of charge. There was a further obligation to allow the hydrants to be used for the purpose of flushing the sewers and cleansing the streets. All these were obligations, and the only inference that could be drawn from the provisions was that there were no other obligations imposed on the waterworks companies, the whole matter being created by statute. It was sought by the plaintiffs to say that there was implied a further highly burdensome obligation upon the companies—that they were not to be allowed to use the hydrants for any other purpose than that of extinguishing fires. He did not agree with that proposition. There was nothing in the case which suggested that any mischief would arise by reason of the use by the defendants of the hydrants for the purpose for which they had used them. The hydrants belonged to the waterworks companies subject to their user by others. Independently of the statutes the companies would have control over them. There being no restriction in the statutes with regard to their right to use them the plaintiffs' claim failed.

Judgment was accordingly given for the defendants.

NEWPORT UNION ASSESSMENT COMMITTEE V. YSTRADYFODWG AND PONTYPRIDD MAIN SEWERAGE BOARD.*

Rating—Sewers—Sewer partly above partly below ground—Whole sewer held rateable.

This was a special case stated by the quarter sessions of Monmouth on an appeal by the sewerage board (the respondents in this Court) against an assessment to a poor-rate made for the parish of Rumney in the appellants' union. The facts were as follows:—The respondents are the governing body of a united drainage district consisting of part of the urban district of Ystradyfodwg and the urban district of Pontypridd constituted by a provisional order of the Local Government Board, confirmed by the Local Government Board's Provisional Orders Confirmation (No. 7) Act, 1885, for the purpose of carrying into effect a system of drainage for the above-mentioned urban districts.

*Reported by A. F. JENKIN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Pursuant to the powers vested in them by the provisional order, the respondents designed and constructed and have since always maintained a sewage carrier for the use of the two districts and have erected, made, maintained, and worked such works, machinery, and plant as were required for conveying the sewage of the districts to the sea. The total length of the sewage carrier is about 17½ miles, whereof nearly 2½ miles passes through or over land in the parish of Rumney, which land (excepting such part as forms part of the foreshore of the Bristol Channel) was, previously to the construction of the sewage carrier, and still is, rated to the poor-rate. The construction of the sewage carrier within the parish of Rumney is as follows:—182 yards of iron pipes carried on concrete arches above the surface of the ground, 1,021 yards of pipes laid below the surface and ordinary level of the ground, 1,890 yards carried below the surface of the ground but covered by an artificial embankment of varying height which rises above the level of the adjacent lands, and 1,246 yards of pipes (hereinafter called the outfall) passing partly over and partly beneath the surface of the foreshore of the Bristol Channel. In connexion with the outfall, certain works have been erected by the respondents. For the purpose of obtaining money for making and maintaining the sewage carrier and the necessary works appurtenant thereto, the respondents, in accordance with the provisions of the Public Health Act, 1875, borrowed the sum of £156,000, to be repaid with interest by equal annual instalments extending over 30 years. Under the Local Government Board's Provisional Orders Confirmation (No. 8) Act, 1896, the respondents obtained powers enabling them, with the consent of the Local Government Board, to agree to allow the sewers of the council of any county borough or district to communicate with the sewage carrier vested in the respondents. In pursuance of these powers agreements had, previously to the date of the assessment appealed against, been made with the Dinas Powis Urban District Council, the Caerphilly Urban District Council, and the Cardiff Corporation, whereby the sewage of the districts under the control of the said local bodies was to be received in and carried away by the sewage carrier of the respondents upon payment to the respondents by the said local bodies of sums levied upon the respective rateable values of their districts. The respondents were assessed to the rate appealed against in respect of that portion of the sewage carrier, with the outfall and appurtenances thereof, which is situate in the parish of Rumney, at £800 gross estimated rental and £700 rateable value. It was proved before the quarter sessions that, as far as the parish of Rumney is concerned, the sewage carrier conveys the sewage from distant towns, places, or houses through the parish, and that there is no connexion to or with the sewage carrier from any lands, houses, or buildings in the parish. It was also proved that the embankment varied in height from 18in. to 6ft. above the ground through which it passed; that it was covered throughout by a mound of earth which was grassed over except where a footpath runs over the top of the mound and where manholes are placed; that it was not separated by any fence from the adjoining land, and that cattle had full access upon and across it throughout its entire length. It was also proved that the land upon which the embankment lies was previously to the formation of such embankment assessed to the poor rate, and that the land remained so assessed, no change having been made by reason of the making of the embankment in such assessment. The quarter sessions held that such portions of the sewage carrier as lay under the surface of the ground or in the embankment were not liable to be rated, but that the gross estimated rental of the other portions of the carrier in the parish of Rumney was £145 (of which £40 was the gross estimated rental of the outfall and works in connexion therewith), and that the rateable value was £105. The quarter sessions accordingly allowed the appeal subject to the present case.

Mr. Bosanquet, Q.C., and Mr. Morton Brown appeared for the appellants; and Mr. Cripps, Q.C., Mr. Boyle, Q.C., and Mr. Ram, Q.C., for the respondents.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

MR. JUSTICE CHANNELL said that he had come to the conclusion that the appeal ought to be allowed. The subject was one of some difficulty, and there was some difficulty about the facts. The way was, however, to some extent cleared by the judgment of Lord Herschell in "London County Council v. West Ham Overseers" (L.R. [1893], A.C., 562). It appeared from that judgment that the exception with regard to sewers was quite anomalous. It had to be considered whether or not the construction in question in the present case came within that exception. It was necessary, therefore, to consider first the nature of the exception, and, secondly, whether the facts brought the particular construction within it. The exception was spoken of in "Leicester Corporation v. Barrow-on-Soar Union" (63 L.J., M.C., 176) by Mr. Justice Wright as being an exception in favour of "ordinary underground sewers" or "simple sewers." It seemed, so far as could be gathered from the language of Lord Herschell, that where the surface remained rateable just as it was before the sewer was laid, but there was an underground structure not at all affecting the surface or the rateability or value of the occupation of the surface, then, if that underground structure was used as a sewer, it might not be rateable. It was therefore important to see if the structure did interfere with the surface. It was found in the present case that the surface was still occupied, that it was still rated, and, in fact, rated at the same value as before the structure was made. There was, however, no finding that the structure did not affect the occupation, and from the nature of the thing it could not be that the structure, though grassed over, did not interfere at all with the occupation of the land and did not at all lower its rateable value, though there might be various reasons why the rating had not in fact been altered. It must therefore be taken that there had been some interference with the surface, and that was one of the tests as to whether the case came within the exception. To put it shortly, he was not prepared to hold that this was an ordinary underground sewer. Further, this contrivance was one continuous structure; at one part of its course it consisted of iron pipes on concrete arches, at other parts it consisted of a mound grassed over. The part on concrete arches was so similar to the structure in question in the West Ham case that the quarter sessions very naturally found themselves unable to distinguish it from that structure, and they accordingly held it rateable. That being so, what Mr. Justice Collins, as he then was, said in "Leicester Corporation v. Barrow-on-Soar Union" was applicable. He said:—"It is impossible to discover a special part and say that as to that part alone it is to be taken as an independent sewer." So here, as this structure was above ground in some places and underground in others, it could not be held that in one man's field it was rateable and in another's not. His Lordship was therefore prepared to hold that this structure did not come within the exception in favour of ordinary underground sewers or simple sewers, or whatever the anomalous exception might most exactly be described as being. The order of quarter sessions would be quashed, and the rate would therefore stand.

MR. JUSTICE BUCKNILL concurred.

HADDOCK V. HUMPHREYS.*

Master and Servant—Master's liability to servant—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, sec. 7—"Factory"—Factory and Workshop Act, 1895, sec. 23—"Wharf," what is.

This was an appeal from an award of the Judge of the Lancashire County Court, sitting at Liverpool, in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. The applicant was the widow of a workman who had been killed by an accident in the course of his employment. The employers were Messrs. W. and T. Humphreys, who were carters. At the time of the accident the deceased man was engaged in the work of removing a log of timber from a pile of logs and loading it on one of the respondents' carts, the respondents having arranged with a firm of builders, who had bought the log, to remove it from the place where it was stored. The only question in the case was whether the place where the timber was stored was a wharf, so as to come by virtue of section 23 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895, within the definition of "factory" contained in section 7 of the Workmen's Compensation Act. The locus in quo was a timber-yard, which was distant about 150 yards from the water of the Canada Dock, at Bootle. Alongside the water was a large space called the timber-quay, which stretched back from the water for a distance of nearly 150 yards, and beyond this, running parallel with the water, was a cart-road, which was used by the public. On the further side of this road was a line of offices, to each of which was attached a yard. These offices and yards were leased by the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board to various timber merchants. It was in one of these yards that the timber in question was stored. The area comprising these offices and yards was enclosed by a wall and gates. On the further side of this area ran a highway called Regent's-road, and beyond this again there were similar offices and yards. The County Court Judge held that the locus in quo was not a wharf, and made an award in favour of the employers. The applicant appealed.

MR. BLACKWOOD WRIGHT appeared for the appellant, and urged that the learned County Court Judge in effect treated "wharf" and "quay" as being identical. But section 23 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895, spoke of "every dock, wharf, quay, and warehouse"; and each of these words ought to have a distinct meaning given to it. He contended that a quay was a place for discharging cargo and a wharf was a place for storing cargo. He referred to "Hall v. Snowden, Hubbard, and Co." ([1899], 2 Q.B., 136).

MR. JOSEPH WALTON, Q.C., and Mr. LESLIE SCOTT, for the respondents, argued that the County Court Judge was right in holding that this place was not a wharf. A wharf might be a store, but a store need not be a wharf. A wharf, according to its ordinary meaning, was a place alongside water used for unloading. The only difference between "wharf" and "quay" was that "quay" was a species of "wharf." They referred to the Century Dictionary, in which "wharf" is defined as follows:—"A platform of timber, stone, or other material built on a support at the margin of a harbour or a navigable stream, in order that vessels may be moored alongside, as for loading or unloading, or while at rest. A wharf may be parallel with and contiguous to the margin, when it is more especially called a quay; or it may project away from it, with openings underneath for the flow of water, when it is distinctively called a pier."

The COURT (LORD JUSTICE RIGBY dissenting) dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said the question was whether this place was a wharf or a timber yard. The County Court Judge held that it was a timber yard and not a wharf, and he thought the County Court Judge was right. In his opinion the word "wharf" implied some connexion with water, and he could not think that it could include a yard which was cut off from a quay in the way in which this yard was cut off. If it could, then he saw no reason why it should not also be held to include the yards on the further side of Regent's-road. He thought the appeal should be dismissed.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY said he was unable to arrive at the same conclusion as his learned brethren. In his opinion the word "wharf" did not necessarily imply anything to do with water. It was derived from an Anglo-Saxon word, and there were similar words in cognate languages. It seemed to mean a place for the reception of goods, and not specially a place for the unloading of goods. He thought that the place in question was a wharf.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS said he was of opinion that the County Court Judge was right. He thought the only safe standard to apply to the interpretation of the words used in section 23 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895, was to give each of these words its ordinary popular meaning. Any attempt to refine on the meanings of these words seemed to him to be likely to be fraught with difficulty. In a previous case they had given the word "dock" its popular meaning, "Hennessey v. McCabe" (16 The Times Law Reports, 77). And so here he thought they ought to give "wharf" its popular meaning. In his opinion the locus in quo here could not be described as a wharf at all. It was contiguous to a wharf, but it was a place in which an individual timber merchant was entitled to store timber. He did not doubt that if it had been roofed over it would have been a warehouse; but it was not a wharf.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL V. THE BRIGHTON AND HOVE CO-OPERATIVE SUPPLY ASSOCIATION (LIMITED).*

Highway—Nuisance—Unreasonable user of highway—Business premises—Obstructing road and footway with vans—Interference with public rights.

This was an appeal against a decision of Mr. Justice Kekewich's (reported in The Times of March 15 last). The action was brought by the Attorney-General on the relation of James Pack, a lodging-house-keeper, of 21, Lansdowne-street, Brighton, for an injunction to restrain the defendants, who carry on business in the same street, from causing a nuisance to the public and to the plaintiff by an alleged unreasonable user of the street, through blocking it with carts and vans, and causing an offensive smell by allowing accumulations of droppings from their horses. The plaintiff complained that the defendants used the street for loading and unloading their vans, so that not only the roadway but also the foot pavement was obstructed from early in the morning to late at night. In the result the question became only one as to the right of the public generally to restrain the alleged nuisance, the plaintiff abandoning any claim for private damage. Mr. Justice Kekewich said that the question was whether there had been an unreasonable user by the defendants of the highway, every one being entitled to a reasonable use of it. An unreasonable user amounted to a public nuisance. In the present case, for all practical purposes, six vans of the defendants were more or less drawn up in the street throughout the day, the horses being turned round at right angles to the vans, the tail end of which was next to the defendants' premises. Other vans were in the street as well, taking up considerable room. When the defendants' vans took up half the street for practically the whole day, his Lordship could not say that this was a reasonable use of the highway. It was said that the defendants could not carry on their business without using the street as they had done, but if they could not carry on their business without making an unreasonable use of the highway they must go to some other premises where they could load and unload their vans without causing an obstruction. His Lordship granted an injunction restraining the obstruction, by the defendants, of the street and the pavement, but he held that the case as to nuisance by smell had failed. The operation of the injunction was suspended until after the second motion day in (last) Michaelmas sittings, in order to afford the defendants an opportunity of making arrangements to comply with the injunction. If he were satisfied that the defendants were doing their best to comply with it, he would attend to an application by them for a further extension of time. The defendants must pay the costs of the action, and, so far as the relator himself was concerned, as he had abandoned any claim to damages, the action must be dismissed. The defendants appealed.

Mr. Warmington, Q.C., and Mr. A. Beddall were for the defendants; Mr. Macmorran, Q.C., and Mr. E. A. Parkyn, for the relator, were not called upon.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said that it seemed to him impossible to reverse the decision, though a verbal correction must be made in the formal judgment which had been drawn up. The evidence showed that the defendants carried on a large business in a street a little less than 20 feet wide. They blocked up half the street for some distance by having there as many as six vans loading and unloading in the day time. There was no obstruction at night, but during the day there were in every hour half a dozen vans loading and unloading, so that the passage of carriages along the street was seriously obstructed to such an extent that persons avoided the street. On the facts it was impossible not to say that there was an obstruction in fact, and prima facie this was a nuisance in law. The passage was, in fact, obstructed over the whole width of the street. Of course, if a single cart stopped at a house for the purpose of loading and unloading it must cause some obstruction, but this would not necessarily amount to a nuisance. The difficulty was in drawing the line. The defendants' case was that they were carrying on a lawful business and in a reasonable manner, and, looking only at their business, it appeared to be perfectly reasonable. The question was, What was the consequence of the reasonable exercise of their right conflicting with the right of the public? His Lordship would take the law to be as it was laid down in 1805 in "The King v. Russell" (6 East, at p. 430), where the Court said:—"It should be fully understood that the defendant could not legally carry on any part of his business in the public street to the annoyance of the public; that the primary object of the street was for the free passage of the public, and anything which impeded that free passage without necessity was a nuisance; that if the nature of the defendant's business were such as to require the loading and unloading of so many more of his wagons than could conveniently be contained within his own private premises, he must either enlarge his premises or remove his business to some more convenient spot. But the Court could not be parties to any compromise for his using the street as his own for any part of his business." It came to this in substance—that in a doubtful case the private right to carry on a business must yield to the public right of user of a highway. It was difficult to draw the line, and it was a question of degree. But, when the obstruction was carried to such an extent that people avoided the street, it was utterly unjustifiable.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS agreed because he regarded the decision of the learned Judge as a decision of a question of fact as to which evidence was before him. He should not have agreed if the decision had been of a question of law resulting from the evidence. The decision was one of great importance to all populous towns, and his Lordship would not wish it to be said that there was a decision of the Court of Appeal that it was never lawful to do the particular acts which the defendants had done. Such a decision would be a serious blow to commercial interests. That there was a physical obstruction of the street by the defendants was obvious, but the action could not be maintained by merely showing that there was a physical reduction or displacement of the space temporarily available. It must be shown that this was not consistent with the lawful use of the highway. A highway was, no doubt, primarily meant for the passing and repassing of the public, but it was also intended that those who passed along it should be able to stop and load or discharge goods. It was no more unlawful to stop at a house in a narrow street than at a house in a wide street. His Lordship did not think there had ever been a conviction on an indictment for an excessive user of a lawful right as distinguished from an unlawful user of a highway, and the Courts had expressly asserted the right of access to premises abutting on a highway if it were properly exercised. On the other hand, it could not be said that no amount of user would constitute a nuisance if it consisted of an aggregate of lawful acts. In all such cases all the circumstances must be taken into consideration, and under the circumstances of the present case his Lordship agreed with Mr. Justice Kekewich that the defendants' user of the street was unreasonable.

LORD JUSTICE ROMER concurred. A tradesman was entitled to a reasonable use of the highway for the purpose of loading and unloading goods at his premises, but a user amounting to an appropriation of the highway for the purposes of his business would be unreasonable. The use made by the defendants of the street amounted to such an appropriation—making the street, in fact, part of their premises—and considerable inconvenience had been caused to the public, who were ceasing to make use of the street because of the inconvenience.

LANCASHIRE ASYLUMS BOARD V. MANCHESTER CORPORATION.*

Rating—Agricultural Rates Act, 1896—Rate for Asylum Board—Apportionment—Rateable value—54 Vict., c. xx.

The Lancashire Asylums Board, in estimating the amount required by them annually from the county of Lancashire and the county boroughs therein, should divide it between them in proportion to their respective rateable values as ascertained under sec. 33 of the Local Government Act, 1888, in accordance with their local Act (54 Vict., c. xx.), which is untouched by the Agricultural Rates Act, 1896.

Decision of the Divisional Court (15 The Times L.R., 220) reversed.

This was an appeal from the judgment of the Divisional Court (Mr. Justice Bruce and Mr. Justice Ridley) upon a special case; reported in 15 The Times Law Reports, 220; [1899] 1 Q.B., 759. The following facts are taken from the judgment of the Court below:—The question raised by this case was whether during the continuance of the Agricultural Rates Act, 1896, the Lancashire Asylums Board ought to divide the amount yearly required to be raised for their purposes in proportion to the rateable value of the county and the county boroughs as ascertained by the Local Government Act, 1888, section 33, or in proportion to the assessable value of the same as ascertained by the Agricultural Rates Act, 1896, and the regulations of the Local Government Board issued under that Act. By the Lancashire County (Lunatic Asylums and other Powers) Act, 1891 (54 Vict., Cap. XX.), a board was constituted called the Lancashire Asylums Board, to which were transferred the lunatic asylums of that county and of certain county boroughs, including Manchester, and it was provided by section 23 that all expenses incurred by them in the execution of their duties should be paid out of a fund to be called "The Asylums Fund." Section 24 deals with the raising of this fund, and is as follows:—"The Board shall before the first day of March in every year estimate the total amount required to be raised by contributions for the ensuing year, and shall divide that amount between the county and the county boroughs in proportion to the respective rateable values (as ascertained under section 33 of the Local Government Act, 1888) of the county and the county boroughs, and shall add to the amount apportioned to the county boroughs the sum of £4,000, or such other sum as may from time to time be fixed by agreement or by arbitration in manner provided by this Act, and referred to as 'the added sum.' The amount so apportioned, together with the added sum, shall be the aggregate amount required to be contributed by the county boroughs and shall be contributed by them respectively in proportion to their respective rateable values ascertained as aforesaid. The balance of the amount required to be raised by the Board shall be contributed by the county council." Section 33 (2) of the Local Government Act, 1888, provided for the appointment of a joint committee appointed by the counties and the county boroughs for the ascertainment of the respective rateable values and gave them certain powers. Under these powers, from 1891 to the passing of the Agricultural Rates Act, 1896, the amounts required to be contributed were calculated upon the respective values of the county and county boroughs as ascertained by section 33 (2), and the Lancashire Asylums Board, under section 26 of their Act, sent precepts to the county council and the borough councils for payment of the amount to be raised by each of them respectively. It was not their duty to find the rateable values, but to take them as found by the authorities, and to divide the total amount required in accordance with those values. But by the passing of the Agricultural Rates Act, 1896, a different set of circumstances was constituted, out of which the present question arose. For the Asylums Board it was argued that it was now their duty to take as the basis of the division to be made by them the "assessable value" of the county and county boroughs as specified by the Rating Act of 1896 in place of the rateable values as calculated under the Local Government Act, 1888. For the city of Manchester, on the other hand, it was contended that these "assessable values" had no operation except for the levying of rates, and that, as the Asylums Board was not an authority levying rates, they ought to base their calculations on the "rateable values" found as they were before the passing of the Agricultural Rates Act, 1896, which, as they contended, operated upon the amount so apportioned to each council after it was so apportioned, and not before. The difference brought about was considerable in effect; for, if the contention of the Asylums Board was right, the amount found as due from the borough councils must be largely increased in comparison with that left to be raised by the county, while, on the other hand, the boroughs, which for the most part contain little agricultural land, would receive but a small annual grant from the Local Government Board. Since the Act of 1896 came into operation the county rate basis had been altered accordingly by the authorities, and the Asylums Board had in fact made their calculations upon the new basis instead of on the "rateable values," as they were ascertained before that Act. By section 1 of the Agricultural Rates Act, 1896, the occupier of agricultural land in England was liable to pay one-half only of the rate in the pound payable in respect of other hereditaments. By section 2, in respect of the deficiency which would arise in the produce of rates made by the "spending authorities," there was to be paid by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue to the "local taxation account" a sum which was to be paid out to each spending authority. The "spending authorities" were defined by section 9 of the Act, but did not include the Lunatic Asylums Board. By section 3 any spending authority requiring to raise from two or more parishes a sum by rate was to deduct from the amount to be raised the sum issuable to them in respect of their share in the annual grant, and to raise the net amount, after making such deduction, in proportion to the assessable value of those parishes, and such assessable value was to be the rateable value of each of the parishes reduced by an amount equal to one-half of the rateable value of the agricultural land in the parish. The effect of this was to give the relief to the agricultural land by assessing it at half its value instead of assessing it at the full value, and allowing the ratepayer to pay at half the rate in the pound. Section 4 dealt with the amount of the annual grant issuable as stated above, which amount was to be ascertained under section 4 and section 6 by returns made to the Local Government Board by the spending authorities of the sums received by them in the year next before the passing of the Act. Section 5 dealt with the preparation of valuation lists and the basis or standard for any county rate or borough rate, and provided that the value of agricultural land should in each case be stated separately from that of other hereditaments, and that the total rateable value of the agricultural land should be stated separately from the total rateable value of the other hereditaments in each parish. This was a necessary provision to carry out the purpose of section 3. By section 6 (3) the Local Government Board had power to make regulations for carrying out the Act. Section 9 defined "rate" as a rate "the proceeds of which are applicable to public purposes and which is leviable on the basis of an assessment in respect of the yearly value of property, and includes any sums which, though obtained in the first instance by a precept, certificate, or other instrument requiring payment from some authority or officer, is or can be ultimately raised out of a rate as before defined." Regulations were issued by the Local Government Board under the Act providing for the returns required and various other matters of detail not material to this case. It was then ordered, by way of carrying into effect the provisions contained in section 5 of the Act, that the valuation list was to be made in a particular form shown in the schedules, with a separate column showing the rateable value of the agricultural land (if any) contained in any hereditament, and that the lists were to be in this form instead of in the form provided by the Union Assessment Committee Act, 1862, for every rate to be made hereafter. Finally, as to the county rates, it was ordered by Article XVII. that county councils and other councils whose duty it was to make for the purposes of any rates a basis or standard of valuation which would not contain particulars of separately-rated hereditaments, but only the total rateable value of each parish, shall cause a basis or standard of valuation to be prepared in the form set out in schedule Z. It was further ordered that, notwithstanding anything contained in the County Rates Act, 1852, or in any other Act, from March 31, 1897, the values of the several parishes as shown in the column of such basis or standard or column headed "assessable value," &c. (that was to say, column 5 in the above schedule), "shall during the continuance of the Act be the basis, standard, or valuation for the levying of the county rates or any other rates leviable by the council according to the assessable value of the several parishes on which the same is levied, unless or until the council shall make a new basis, standard, or valuation in manner provided by law." Upon the Agricultural Rates Act, 1896, coming into operation a joint committee of the county of Lancaster, formed as required by section 33, subsection 2, of the Local Government Act, 1888, prepared a basis or standard for county rates in accordance with Article XVII. and schedule Z of the regulations under the Act. The amounts required by the precepts sent by the Asylums Board to the county council and to the councils of each of the county boroughs had since the Agricultural Rates Act, 1896, came into operation been calculated upon the values ascertained as regards agricultural land upon its assessable value, being one-half of its rateable value, and upon other land and buildings at their rateable value as calculated at the time when the Act of 1896 came into operation. The Asylums Board estimated the amount to be raised by contributions for the ensuing year, and divided that amount between the county council and the county boroughs in proportion to the respective values thereof as above stated with the addition of the sum required by section 24 of the local Act. The council of the city of Manchester paid to the treasurer of the Asylums Board the amount which the council would have had to pay if the total amount had been divided between the county council and the county boroughs in proportion to the respective rateable values thereof as calculated at the time when the Act of 1896 came into operation. The Asylums Board brought an action to recover the balance—£357 9s. 5d.—alleged to be due. The questions for the opinion of the Court were whether the Asylums Board, in dividing the total amount required by it to be raised by contributions during the continuance of the Agricultural Rates Act, 1896, was to divide that amount between the county and county boroughs in proportion (1) to their respective assessable values under the Act of 1896, or (2) according to their rateable values as calculated before the Act. The Divisional Court answered question 1 in the affirmative and question 2 in the negative. The Corporation of Manchester appealed.

*Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. Macmorran, Q.C., and Mr. Ryde appeared for the appellants; Mr. Cripps, Q.C., and Mr. R. Cunningham Glen appeared for the respondents, the Asylums Board.

The COURT, having taken time to consider, delivered judgment, allowing the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH read the following judgment of the Court:—The question which has arisen between the Lancashire Asylums Board and the Corporation of Manchester is whether the Asylums Board, under section 24 of a local Act called the Lancashire Lunatic Asylums Act, 1891, is to divide between the county of Lancashire and the county boroughs of that county the contribution which the Asylums Board annually requires in order to defray the expenses of the county lunatics in proportion to the "rateable values" of the county and county boroughs, as was the case prior to the passing of the Agricultural Rates Act of 1896, or in proportion to the "assessable values" of the county and county boroughs to be found in the later Act. The Corporation of Manchester asserts that the question of the division of the contributions to be made between the county and the county boroughs is not touched by the Agricultural Rates Act, 1896, though the method of rating the county and county boroughs is thereby altered. The Asylums Board on the other hand asserts that what was once "rateable value" is now no more, and that, as regards the division which the Board is to make, "assessable value" has taken the place of "rateable value," so long as the Agricultural Rates Act of 1896 is in existence. The point is one which makes a considerable difference to the Corporation of Manchester—and indeed to the other county boroughs in Lancashire—as regards the amount it can be annually called upon to contribute towards the expenses necessary for maintaining the county lunatics. Prior to the Agricultural Rates Act, 1896, matters stood thus: By the County Rate Act, 1852, sections 2-21, justices in counties were to prepare a basis or standard for fair and equal county rates, rateably and equally according to the full and fair annual value of the property within their respective limits, and were to order and direct a fair and equal county rate according to such basis or standard. By section 33, subsection 2, of the Local Government Act, 1888—which is the Act which created certain boroughs, county boroughs (of which Manchester is one), and which established county councils and joint committees of counties and county boroughs—it was enacted, "Where for the purpose of calculating any contributions . . . it is necessary to ascertain the rateable value of both a county and a county borough, such rateable value shall be ascertained and fixed by a joint committee composed of representatives of all the councils concerned, and such committee shall for that purpose have all the powers and jurisdiction of quarter sessions and of a committee of justices appointed under the County Rate Act, 1852, and the Acts amending the same." The object, I apprehend, of appointing this joint committee was that it might see that the rateable values of the county and county boroughs were fairly adjusted. In the year 1891 the county of Lancashire obtained special legislation by means of a local Act, entitled the Lancashire County (Lunatic Asylums and Other Powers) Act, 1891, whereby a Lunatic Asylums Board for the County Palatine of Lancaster was created, which Board was to provide asylum accommodation and to carry out other matters as a local authority under the Lunacy Act, 1890. By section 34 of the local Act it is enacted that, for the purposes of that Act, the rateable value of the county and of the county boroughs shall be their rateable value as ascertained and fixed for the time being by the joint committee appointed under section 33 of the Act of 1888. By section 23 of the local Act all expenses incurred by the Asylums Board in the execution of its duties are to be paid out of a fund called the Asylums Fund, and any deficiency in that fund is to be raised by contributions to be made by the county and county boroughs in accordance with the provisions of the Act. By section 24 of the local Act it is enacted that the Board shall before the first day of March in every year estimate the total amount required to be raised by contributions for the ensuing year, and shall divide that amount between the county and county boroughs in proportion to the respective rateable values as ascertained under section 33 of the Local Government Act, 1888. By section 26 of the local Act it is enacted that, for the purpose of obtaining payment of the sums to be contributed by the county and the county boroughs respectively, the chairman of the Board shall before the 1st day of March in every year send to the county council and to the council of each county borough a precept for payment of the amount to be contributed by the county or county borough as the case may be. Although I have had to refer to many sections in different Acts, down to this it is perfectly plain that the division which the Asylums Board has to make of the contributions which it requires from the county and county boroughs was to be in proportion to their respective rateable values. This division and the sending of the precepts was the only thing the Asylums Board had to do as regards the money to be obtained from the county and county boroughs under the local Act of 1891. The Board was in no way concerned in rating or levying a rate either upon the county or county borough. Has, then, this division been altered by the Agricultural Rates Act, 1896, which was an Act to last for five years from March 31, 1897, from which date the Act was to come into operation? This Act is an Act by which the occupiers of agricultural land are for five years to be exempted from the payment of half the rates which they would otherwise have had to pay upon such lands, and it is the rating of agricultural land, in my opinion, which is dealt with by this Act. If the division of the contributions by the Asylums Board between the county and county boroughs is to be made in proportion to the "assessable values" mentioned in the Agricultural Rates Act, 1896, and not in proportion to the "rateable values" as prescribed by section 24 of the local Act of 1891, the way in which this Act of 1896 would operate to the detriment of the county boroughs is as I will now explain by means of hypothetical figures. Assume a county to consist, as to one half, of county boroughs having no agricultural land therein, and, as to the other half, of agricultural land. Assume the rateable value of the county boroughs to be £100,000, and of the agricultural land to be £50,000, and that the Asylums Board requires a contribution of £10,000 for the county lunatics to make up a deficiency in the asylums fund. Before the Agricultural Rates Act, 1896, upon these figures the county boroughs would have had to contribute to the Asylums Board twice as much as the occupiers of agricultural land in the county and no more, for the rateable value of the county boroughs would be just double that of the agricultural land; but, as since the Agricultural Rates Act, 1896, the occupiers of agricultural land have only to pay half the rates which they would otherwise have had to pay on these lands, this half of the rates not paid by the occupiers of agricultural land has to be borne by the county boroughs, when the Asylums Board divides the contributions it requires between the county and county boroughs. In other words, if the division for contributions is to be made upon "assessable values" under the Agricultural Rates Act, 1896, and not upon "rate-able values" as enacted by section 24 of the local Act of 1891, the county boroughs of Lancashire will have to pay one half more to the Asylums Board than they otherwise would have done. The question, therefore, is, What is the division the Asylums Board has now to make between the county and the county boroughs? Is it the same as under the local Act of 1891, and before the passing of the Agricultural Rates Act, 1896—i.e., in proportion to the "rateable values" of county and county boroughs; or in proportion to the "assessable values" as found in the Agricultural Rates Act, 1896, so that the words "rateable values" in section 24 of the local Act of 1891 are now to be read differently from what they would have been undoubtedly read when the Act of 1891 was passed and for five years afterwards? It will be observed, when considering the scope of the Agricultural Rates Act, 1896, which is a general Act, that nowhere in it can be found any express repeal of any part of the local Act of 1891, and, what is more, nowhere in the Agricultural Rates Act, 1896, is the local Act of 1891 so much as mentioned. The local Act is left precisely where it was at the time it was passed, and for the best of all reasons, as it appears to me; for the local Act of 1891 in no way embraces either the rating or levying of rates either in a county or county boroughs by the Asylums Board, with which the Agricultural Rates Act, 1896, irrespective of the Asylums Board, now deals. The learned Judges in the Queen's Bench Division felt this difficulty in their way, for they say:—"It is true the precise position and duties of the Lancashire Asylums Board are not dealt with by the Agricultural Rates Act, 1896"—I say not so much as mentioned or dealt with at all—"but we cannot, therefore, exclude it from an Act of so general intention." The general intention of the Agricultural Rates Act, 1896, is to take off from occupiers of agricultural lands one half of their rates for a period of five years; but how does that alter the division the Asylums Board is to make, when the division by the Asylums Board is not dealt with by the Agricultural Rates Act, 1896, from first to last? The Agricultural Rates Act, 1896, is entitled as being an Act to amend the law with respect to the rating of the occupiers of agricultural land in England and for other purposes connected therewith. By section 1 it exempts the occupier of agricultural land from paying the whole rate, as he theretofore had done, and limits his liability to half of the rate, and it enacts that the deficiency thereby created is for five years to be made up by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue. It is clear, and indeed it is admitted by Mr. Cripps for the Asylums Board, that section 3 of the Agricultural Rates Act, 1896, has no reference to this case, and I might have passed it by; but I think I should point out that the section only deals with the levying of the rate by persons entitled to do so, that is, by the spending authority, which the Asylums Board is not, and it has nothing to do with the division of contributions required by the Asylums Board. Subsection 2 of section 3 is only for the purposes of section 3, and therefore admittedly does not apply. But this is how it is argued for the Asylums Board. It is said that section 5 of the Agricultural Rates Act, 1896, enacts that in every valuation list and the basis and standard of any county rate the value of agricultural land shall be stated separately from that of any building or other hereditaments, and that the total rateable value of agricultural land in each parish shall be stated separately from the total rateable value of the buildings and other hereditaments, and that, by section 6 (3) of this Act, the Local Government Board, for the purpose of ascertaining the deficiency and for the separation of value of agricultural land from buildings and other hereditaments, and generally for carrying into effect this Act, is to make regulations, and that these regulations coupled with section 5 alter the division of contributions which the Asylums Board is to still make under section 24 of the local Act of 1891, and that the division by the Asylums Board is now to be made upon the "assessable value," and not upon the "rateable value" under that section. How section 5, which applies to the rating of agricultural lands separately from buildings and other hereditaments, can be held to touch the division the Asylums Board is to make, I do not see, and the regulations are for the levying of the rates, and not for the division of contributions. Article XVII. of the regulations and the form in schedule Z when read show this to be so. Column 2 in schedule Z deals with the net annual value of each parish according to the basis, standard, or valuation in force at the passing of the Act of 1896—i.e., rateable value beyond a doubt. And columns 3 and 4 deal with net rateable value divided between agricultural land and buildings and other hereditaments not being agricultural land. And by column 5 "assessable value" of a parish is one-half of the amount of agricultural land added to the amount of the other hereditaments other than land. These provisions were necessary to carry out the scheme of exonerating the occupier of agricultural land from paying the whole of the rate based upon the rateable value of this land, which before the Agricultural Rates Act of 1896 he had to pay, that being the object of the Act; and in my judgment neither section 5 nor the regulations under the Act of 1896 have anything to do with the division the Asylums Board has to make under section 24 of the local Act of 1891. There is a well-known rule which has application to this case, which is that a subsequent general Act does not affect a prior special Act by implication. That this is the law cannot be doubted, and the cases upon the subject will be found collected in the third edition of "Maxwell on the Interpretation of Statutes," at pp. 242-3, and I need not refer to them. Applying this rule to the present case how does the general Act of 1896 affect the special legislation of 1891? Surely, it does not do so at all. For the reasons above I am of opinion that the "rateable values" upon which the Asylums Board were to make the division for contributions under section 24 of the local Act of 1891 have not been touched by the general Act of 1896, and that the first question put to us must be answered in the negative, and the second in the affirmative, and that this appeal must be allowed with costs here and below.

THE SAVOY HOTEL COMPANY (LIMITED) V. THE LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL.*

Shop Hours Act, 1892—Employment of young persons—Duration of employment—Savoy Hotel and Restaurant.

This was a case stated by a metropolitan police magistrate upon a complaint made on behalf of the respondents that the appellants unlawfully employed in the Savoy Hotel and Restaurant a young person named Arthur Knight for longer than 74 hours in one week, contrary to section 4 of the Shop Hours Act, 1892, and failed to keep exhibited the notice required by the same section. The questions were (1) whether the Savoy Hotel and Restaurant was a shop within the meaning of the Shop Hours Act; and (2) whether Arthur Knight was wholly employed as a domestic servant within section 10 of the Act. Section 9 provides that "'shop' means retail and wholesale shops, markets, stalls, and warehouses in which assistants are employed for hire, and includes licensed publichouses and refreshment houses of any kind." Section 10 provides that nothing in the Act shall apply to "any person wholly employed as a domestic servant." The case stated that the hotel was licensed to be kept as an inn for the sale of intoxicating liquors under the Act of 9 Geo. IV., c. 61, and the Acts amending the same. Intoxicating liquors were supplied to the public in the hotel and in the restaurant grill and dining-rooms, whether they were guests staying in the hotel or not. There was no bar or counter for the sale of intoxicating liquors. Arthur Knight was 15 years of age, and was employed at the Savoy Hotel as a page boy in the general service thereof for 89 hours a week. He slept in the hotel. He assisted in dusting the reception rooms in the early morning, but was principally employed as a messenger, taking up messages and sending off telegrams and messages for persons staying at, or using, the hotel and restaurant. The magistrate held that the hotel was such a licensed publichouse as fell within the definition of the word "shop," and that Arthur Knight was not wholly employed as a domestic servant within section 10, and convicted the appellants.

Mr. Avory appeared for the appellants; and Mr. Daldy for the respondents.

MR. JUSTICE CHANNELL said that the first of the questions involved in the case was not free from doubt, but, on the whole, he was of opinion that the appeal should be dismissed. The object of the Act was to restrict the employment of persons under a certain age from being employed for too long hours. This had already been done in regard to factories, and the Legislature intended by this Act to extend the same provisions to other businesses. In the body of the Act they used the word "shop" and in the definition clause they defined "shop" to mean certain things and to include others. The meaning of that was that the Legislature desired to include things which, though within the mischief aimed at by the Act, were not in the ordinary sense shops. The things added to the meaning of "shop" were "licensed publichouses and refreshment houses of any kind." It was true that this hotel was not an ordinary publichouse, but it was covered by the words "of any kind," and the employment of young persons in a grand hotel like this was just as much within the mischief aimed at by the Act as that in an inferior publichouse. With regard to the magistrate's finding that the boy was not wholly employed as a domestic servant, that was a finding of fact and the Court would not disturb it.

MR. JUSTICE BUCKNILL gave judgment to the same effect.

The appeal was accordingly dismissed.

THE ORNEN.*

Ship—Collision—Regulations of 1897 for Preventing Collisions at Sea, Art. 21—Construction.

Art. 21 construed to mean that the vessel which has to keep her course and speed is to do so until the other vessel cannot avoid a collision without the assistance of the vessel which is bound to keep her course and speed.

This was an appeal by the defendants from the judgment of Sir Francis Jeune, and there was also a cross-appeal by the plaintiffs, the learned President having held both vessels to blame for a collision. The case was reported in The Times of July 10. The action was brought by the owners of cargo lately laden on board the steamship Carola to recover damages sustained by them by reason of a collision which occurred between the Carola and the defendants' steamship Ornen in the Cattegat about 11 p.m. on July 23, 1898. The plaintiffs' case was that they were the owners of a cargo of timber lately laden on board the Swedish steamship Carola. The Carola at the time of the collision was on a voyage from Sandarne to Grimsby. She was on a north-west-by-north magnetic course, making about nine knots. In these circumstances the masthead light of the Ornen was seen about one to two miles distant and about a point on the starboard bow. Shortly afterwards the green light of the Ornen was also seen. The vessels continued to approach green to green, and the helm of the Carola was slightly starboarded. The Ornen suddenly opened her red light, and, coming on, with her stem struck the starboard side of the Carola, doing her such damage that she shortly afterwards sank, and the plaintiffs' cargo was wholly lost. The defendants' case was that the Ornen, a Swedish steamship of 745 tons net, manned by a crew of 21 hands, was on a voyage from Sunderland to Stockholm with a cargo of coal. The Ornen was on a south-south-east-half-east magnetic course, and was making about nine knots. In these circumstances the masthead light of the Carola was seen three or four miles off and slightly on the port bow. Soon afterwards the red light of the Carola came into sight on about the same bearing, and the helm of the Ornen was slightly ported and then steadied. The vessels approached red to red until they were about one-and-a-half to two miles apart, when the Carola shut in her red light and opened her green. The Ornen was kept on her course. When about half-a-mile off the Ornen blew one short blast on her whistle, showing that she was porting her helm. The Carola answered by one short blast, but, instead of porting, she was seen to be swinging apparently under a starboard helm. The engines of the Ornen were stopped and ordered full speed astern, but before they could be put astern the Carola came across the bows of the Ornen and the collision occurred. The President came to the conclusion that the Carola was to blame, but he also found that the Ornen was to blame for not having stopped and reversed her engines sooner instead of waiting until the last moment. The result was that both vessels were to blame. By Article 18 of the Regulations of 1897 for Preventing Collisions at Sea :—"When two steam vessels are meeting end on, or nearly end on, so as to involve risk of collision, each shall alter her course to starboard, so that each may pass on the port side of the other." Article 19 :—"When two steam vessels are crossing, so as to involve risk of collision, the vessel which has the other on her own starboard side shall keep out of the way of the other." Article 21 :—"Where by any of these rules one of two vessels is to keep out of the way, the other shall keep her course and speed. Note.—When, in consequence of thick weather or other causes, such vessel finds herself so close that collision cannot be avoided by the action of the giving-way vessel alone, she also shall take such action as will best aid to avert collision." Article 22 :—"Every vessel which is directed by these rules to keep out of the way of another vessel shall, if the circumstances of the case admit, avoid crossing ahead of the other." Article 23 :—"Every steam vessel which is directed by these rules to keep out of the way of another vessel shall, on approaching her, if necessary, slacken her speed or stop or reverse."

Mr. ASPINALL, Q.C., and Mr. C. STUBBS, for the defendants, said that the learned President found that the defendants' case was in substance correct, and they contended that, as the vessels were crossing vessels, by Article 19, inasmuch as the Carola had the Ornen on her starboard side it was her duty to keep out of the way of the Ornen; and by Article 21 it was the duty of the Ornen to keep her course and speed, which she did, until the risk of collision became imminent, when her engines were stopped and reversed. She therefore did everything that was required of her by the rules and by good seamanship. The Ornen was therefore not to blame.

Mr. CARVER, Q.C., and Mr. MAURICE HILL, for the plaintiffs, contended that the vessels were not crossing vessels within the meaning of Article 19, and that therefore that article did not apply. According to the finding of the President the vessels were meeting nearly end on, and that being so, no subsequent manœuvre would make them crossing vessels within the meaning of the article. Further, if the crossing article did apply, then the Ornen had violated Article 21 by not keeping her course and speed. They also contended upon the cross-appeal that the President was wrong in finding the Carola to blame.

The COURT dismissed the appeals.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that as regards the cross-appeal, in his opinion it was impossible to say that there was not ample evidence upon which the President could find that the Carola was to blame. The President held the Carola to blame for starboarding her helm instead of porting it, and persisting in that course until the collision occurred. The President also found that the Ornen was to blame for not having stopped and reversed her engines when she saw the Carola's green light. Mr. Justice Barnes had put a construction upon the rules in "The Ranza" (Shipping Gazette, Dec. 13, 1898), that the vessel which had to keep her course and speed was to do so until the other vessel could not avoid a collision without the assistance of the vessel which had to keep her course and speed. He (the Lord Justice) adopted that construction. Therefore, assuming that these ships were crossing ships, though the Ornen had by the rules to keep her course and speed, the question was whether she did not do so too long. The Court came to the conclusion that the period between the whistle of the Ornen and the collision was at the most one minute, and they were advised by their assessors that the point of time before the collision at which the Carola could have of herself avoided the collision was more than a minute. Therefore the President was right in holding that the Ornen was also to blame.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY and LORD JUSTICE COLLINS concurred.

IN RE THE DUKE OF NORFOLK'S PARLIAMENTARY ESTATES—DUKE OF NORFOLK V. LORD HERBES.

Settled Land Acts—Scheme for improvements—

Approval of trustees—Settled Land Act, 1882.

Trustees of settled land may approve a scheme for improvements submitted to them by the tenant for life before they have capital moneys actually in hand, and may reimburse the tenant for life the money advanced by him for the purposes of the scheme out of capital moneys subsequently received.

This was an application by the Duke of Norfolk which raised a new and important question under the Settled Land Act, 1882—viz., whether trustees for the purposes of the Act can approve a scheme for improvements submitted to them by the tenant for life before they have capital moneys actually in hand, and further in the event of a scheme having been approved under such circumstances whether they may reimburse the tenant for life the money advanced by him for the purposes of the scheme out of capital money subsequently received. It appeared that schemes for the improvement of the Parliamentary estates had from time to time been submitted by the Duke to his trustees and approved of by them when they had either no capital money in hand available, or not enough to pay for the works proposed by these schemes. The Duke had accordingly found the money necessary for carrying out the various schemes, and as the trustees now had capital money in hand the object of the present application by the Duke was to get repaid by his trustees the various sums of money advanced by him for the purpose of completing and paying for the proposed works when completed.

Mr. Ingle Joyce and Mr. John Dixon appeared for the Duke; Mr. Levett, Q.C., and Mr. J. M. Stone appeared for the trustees.

MR. JUSTICE BYRNE said,—This case raises an important question under the Settled Land Act, 1882, and one which does not appear to have been the subject of reported decision; it is, whether or not trustees for the purposes of the Act may approve a scheme for improvements submitted to them by the tenant for life before they have moneys in their hands available for the proposed expenditure. There is a second question, which falls for decision in case the first should be answered in the affirmative—viz., whether or not, when a scheme has been approved under such circumstances, and the improvements have been executed and paid for by the tenant for life in anticipation of moneys becoming afterwards available for the purposes of the approved scheme, the trustees are entitled, either with or without the approval of the Court, to reimburse the tenant for life the moneys so expended. The trustees may not apply capital moneys in their hands in or towards payment for improvements unless prior to the execution of the work a scheme has been submitted to and approved by them. There are no words in the Act in terms negating the right of trustees to approve of a scheme in anticipation of moneys coming to their hands, but I have to consider the scope and provisions of the Act to see whether or not such a right is conferred upon them. It has already been determined in the case of "In re Millard's Settled Estates" ([1893] 3 Ch., 116) that a prospective order cannot be made by the Court authorizing payment by the trustees for work to be done under an approved scheme out of moneys not in their hands at the time when the order is asked for. This was a decision of the Court of Appeal turning upon section 26 (2) (iii.) and it was recognized by the Master of the Rolls in his judgment that there are no negative words to say the Court cannot make such an order, but he points out that under the other clauses of the same subsection the trustees cannot pay except upon certificates, which cannot be given prospectively, and takes that as an indication that it was never intended that the Court should make a prospective order, and he states that he cannot find in the Act anything which authorizes the Court to make prospective orders of the kind. This case does not decide the point now before me, although it has an important bearing upon it from the reasoning adopted, and I will mention particularly one passage in the Master of the Rolls's judgment where he says at page 120:—"What is wanted is protection—that is, protection for those interested in the land; and as practical men we know that to authorize a thing to be done is a very different thing from approving it when it has been done." It was urged on behalf of the tenant for life, and it is the fact, that in "Re Millard" the schemes had been approved by the trustees, and it was never suggested in argument, or in the judgments, that such approval was not within the power of the trustees, although the point, if a sound one, would have afforded a complete answer to the application; and the observation is of great weight, though it must not be pressed too far, as the point does not appear to have been suggested or argued and it may have been passed by as immaterial, having regard to the construction placed by the Court upon the clause of the subsection under which the order was sought for. The case of "In re Marquis of Bristol's Settled Estates" [(1893], 3 Ch., 161) was on an application made under section 15 of the Act of 1890, and determined that a prospective order could not be made under that section to take effect upon moneys which might thereafter arise, but in the course of his judgment Mr. Justice Kekewich, in considering the meaning of section 26 of the Act of 1882, makes some observations at the foot of page 166 showing that in his view the use of the words "to be expended" points to moneys in hand, and he says:—"It seems to me there would be very great difficulty in holding that if expenditure were sanctioned now, there being no money out of which that could be made, there would not be a charge which would have to be raised in the same way as any other charge on the land." To some extent this line of reasoning is applicable to an objection to a construction of the section which would give a power to approve a scheme in anticipation of subsequent receipt of moneys, as there would undoubtedly be grave difficulty, to say the least of it, in the way of refusing a subsequent order for payment on proper evidence that the moneys had been expended in accordance with the scheme previously approved, especially having regard to the fact that the scheme to be submitted under section 26 (1) must show the proposed expenditure for the execution of the improvement. "In re Tucker's Estate" [(1895], 2 Ch., 468), also an application under the Act of 1890, deals with the principle upon which the Court ought to exercise its discretion in respect of allowing the tenant for life to be reimbursed moneys he has expended without first submitting any scheme, and the observations which have been referred to of the Master of the Rolls and Lord Justice Lopes, in that case about the duty of a tenant for life to submit a scheme must be read in view of the fact that it does not appear by the report that there were no capital moneys available at the time the tenant for life made the expenditure. I do not think that section 2, subsection (9), or section 33 of the Act really afford any assistance in the matter, and I only mention them to show that they have not been overlooked. Capital money arising under the Act shall, "when received," be invested in any of the modes pointed out by section 21 of the Act including (iii.) in payment for any improvement authorized by the Act. The words "when received" point to the expression "capital money arising under the Act" being used as including money to arise at a future date, and I do not see any good ground for limiting it so as to exclude moneys which may arise at a future time, though not receivable immediately or within any given period. Section 22, subsection (1), provides that capital money shall, in order to its being invested or applied as aforesaid, be paid either to the trustees of the settlement or into Court at the option of the tenant for life and shall be invested or applied by the trustees or under the direction of the Court accordingly, and subsection (2) provides that the investment or application by the trustees shall be made according to the direction of the tenant for life; section 25 describes improvements authorized by the Act, and then section 26 deals with the procedure to be adopted where the tenant for life is desirous that capital money shall be applied in or towards payment for an authorized improvement. The tenant for life may submit for approval to the trustees or to the Court, as the case may require, a scheme for the execution of the improvement. I do not think that I ought to put so narrow a construction upon section 26, subsection (2), as to hold that it means that the capital money must be actually in the hands of trustees before a scheme is approved by them or upon section 26, subsection (3), that it means that the money must be actually in Court before a scheme is approved, and indeed I think it is clear that a literal construction to that effect is impossible, and I may refer to section 22, subsection (7), which shows that securities for capital money are not capital moneys although they may be converted into money which shall be capital money arising under the Act. I think it would be a reductio ad absurdum to say that, there being thousands of pounds of what had been capital moneys invested in Consols and in Court or in the hands of trustees, it is necessary as a preliminary to the approval of a scheme that the Consols should be converted into actual cash. Then it is suggested that if there is money receivable under an existing contract either presently or in the near future, or if there be securities in Court or in the hands of trustees capable of being immediately converted into cash, the amounts so receivable or capable of being turned into cash may in effect be regarded as money in Court, or in the hands of the trustees, as the case may be, so as to be in substance and effect moneys in Court or in hand; but I feel the difficulty that the moment a departure is made from the supposed literal construction the matter is very much at large, and I do not see where to draw the line. Is it to be drawn at money immediately payable under a contract, money payable by instalments under a contract, money to be paid in a year or in two years or in 20 years? I was much impressed by the argument that if trustees or the Court may approve a scheme before capital moneys are available the tenant for life and the trustees or the Court may be really committing the estate to an expenditure before the period arrives at which a judgment ought to be exercised, and section 53 of the Act and the observations of the Master of the Rolls and of Mr. Justice Kekewich, that I before quoted, are appealed to in support of this argument. But I think the true answer is to be found in this. The scheme of the Act is to give wide powers to the tenant for life and to give power of consent to trustees upon the footing that they will act fairly in the exercise of their respective powers, and that neither trustees nor the Court will sanction schemes which are improvident nor which will unduly fetter any discretion which ought to be exercised at a later date, and there is always this safeguard that tenants for life and trustees joining in improvident schemes or not acting with a due regard to the interest of the remainder-men are running the risk of the possible establishment of a personal liability against themselves. The Act is framed for honest folk, and what are considered sufficient safeguards and protection are provided for the parties interested. I think the observation of the Master of the Rolls is to be read with regard to the subject-matter of the case before him, and that he is dealing with the case of safeguards provided by the Act before payment can be actually made, and not with the case of approval of a scheme. I can see many considerations weighing against the contrary view. Suppose, for example, a tenant for life is desirous of selling a portion of his estate with the special object of effecting what he considers a great improvement upon the remainder of it. I think it would be most unfortunate if he should be obliged first to sell and then to find that the trustees did not approve of his scheme. Upon the whole case and a consideration of the terms of the Act I have come to the conclusion that a scheme may be approved, although there are not at the time capital moneys in the hands of the trustees for carrying it out. Upon the second question I am of opinion that, if after a proper scheme has been duly approved the tenant for life, with the knowledge of the trustees, bona fide expends money for the purpose of and in accordance with such scheme, early expenditure being for the advantage of all parties interested, there is no prohibition to be found in the Act against the trustees, when they have capital money in their hands, adopting his expenditure and recouping him what he has actually spent, subject to the proper certificate being obtained. The question of what might happen should the tenant for life die after his expenditure and before recoupment and another tenant for life succeed and direct the moneys to be applied in some other way does not arise for decision and I, therefore, express no opinion about it. I ought to add that in the present case there is not the faintest suggestion that the several schemes, the payments in anticipation by the tenant for life, and the repayments by the trustees have been otherwise than prudent and for the advantage of all persons interested.

IN RE GOSLING—GOSLING V. SMITH.*

Charity—Charitable Bequest—Validity—Bequest for pensioning off clerks.

The late Mr. Bennett Gosling, who died in May, 1855, bequeathed by a codicil a sum of £1,890 6s. 4d. Consols standing in his own and his brother Robert's names, "the produce of different sums of money invested by me at different times in our joint names," to be invested in the names of trustees to be fixed upon by the partners in the firm of Goslings and Sharpe at the time of his death, to form a fund to be called the "Superannuation Fund" for the purpose of pensioning off the old and worn-out clerks of the firm of Goslings and Sharpe; and the testator then said he trusted that the partners in the said firm would in consideration of such bequest add and set apart a sum of money in addition to such bequest, in order that a beginning might be made for forming such a fund. In 1896 the superannuation fund by additional gifts and accumulations of dividends amounted to, or was represented by, £5,567 India Three per Cent. stock and a considerable sum of cash. In June, 1896, the firm of Goslings and Sharpe was amalgamated with the firm of Barclay and Co. (Limited); and in consequence of this amalgamation, some difficulties had arisen as to the proper objects and distribution of the fund. The present trustees now applied to the Court by originating summons for the determination of the following questions:—(1) Whether the gift made by the codicil of the late Mr. Gosling, as set out above, was a good charitable gift; and (2) if such gift were a good charitable gift, whether a scheme ought not to be settled for the administration of the fund, or whether the fund ought not to be applied cy-près for charitable purposes.

Mr. Walters appeared for the trustees.

Mr. HOWARD WRIGHT represented the residuary legatee, and contended that the gift was not a good charitable gift and therefore void.

Mr. ROWDEN, Q.C., and Mr. MACSWINNEY, for a clerk in the firm at the date of the amalgamation, argued that, there being no public element in the gift, it was not charitable.

Mr. MULLIGAN, Q.C., and Mr. FRANK RUSSELL, for a clerk who was in the firm at the time of the testator's death, contended that the sole object of the gift was to benefit the clerks in the firm at the time of the testator's death.

Mr. Methold and Mr. Hall Hall for other parties.

Mr. INGLE JOYCE, for the Attorney-General, argued that the gift was a charitable gift, and therefore good.

MR. JUSTICE BYRNE said that amongst the other charitable objects enumerated in the statute of Elizabeth the "aged" and "impotent" are especially mentioned; in his opinion, "old and worn-out" clerks came within this description, and he thought, moreover, having regard to the phrase "pensioning off," and to the frame of the gift, that poor clerks of the firm and those unable properly to provide for themselves and their families were intended to be benefited. His Lordship also said he thought it clear that the benefits of the gift were intended to extend to persons who might not become clerks until after the testator's death, and who might be absolutely unknown to him. So long as the gift was in favour of a section of the public, if within the scope of charitable gifts, it was a charitable gift; and the fact that the section of the public was limited to persons born or residing in a particular parish, district, or county, or belonging to or connected with any special sect, denomination, guild, institution, firm, name, or family did not of itself render that which would be otherwise charitable void for lack of sufficient or satisfactory description, or take it out of the category of charitable gifts. For these reasons, his Lordship held the gift to be a good charitable gift, and, after some further discussion, directed a scheme to be settled for the administration of the fund.

PANNELL V. CITY OF LONDON BREWERY COMPANY (LIMITED) AND OTHERS.*

Landlord and Tenant—Covenants—Breach—Re-entry—Notice.

When, after a notice specifying several alleged breaches of covenant, the lessor fails to prove one of such breaches, the notice is not thereby rendered bad in respect of the other two.

This was an action by the freeholder of The Denmark, a publichouse at Camberwell, against the assignees of the lease and their tenants, to recover possession of the property on the ground of breaches of covenants in the lease. The lease was dated October 10, 1868, and contained a proviso for re-entry on breach of covenant. The defendants denied that there had been any breach, and, among other defences, contended that the notice given by the plaintiff specifying the alleged breaches and requiring the defendant company to remedy the same was insufficient.

Mr. H. Terrell, Q.C., and Mr. Gilks were for the plaintiff; Mr. Astbury, Q.C., and Mr. G. F. Mortimer for the defendant company; and Mr. George Cave and Mr. R. Edmondson for the other defendants.

*Reported by W. COWELL DAVIES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

*Reported by F. EVANS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

MR. JUSTICE BUCKLEY, in delivering judgment, said that the notice was given on January 31, 1899, and the writ was issued on June 5, 1899, and, therefore, a reasonable time for making the repairs had been given. After describing the property and its boundaries, and stating the effect of the lease, his Lordship said the notice referred to a number of alleged breaches (some of which were not now relied on by the plaintiff), including the non-repair of fences and the omission to do certain painting. The plaintiff had, however, failed to prove any breach of covenant as to the painting, but, as that alleged breach was mentioned in the notice, Mr. Astbury contended that the notice, being bad as to that, was bad altogether. The argument came to this—that if three different breaches of covenant were mentioned in a notice under section 14 of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, and the lessee was required to remedy them, and then it turned out that only two of the breaches had taken place, the notice was bad in respect of all three matters. If that was the law, it was very inconvenient, for it would necessitate sending a separate notice for each breach of covenant. Section 14 of the Act of 1881 said, “A right of re-entry or forfeiture under any proviso or stipulation in a lease, for a breach of any covenant or condition in the lease, shall not be enforceable, by action or otherwise, unless and until the lessor serves on the lessee a notice specifying the particular breach complained of.” If the notice specified the breach which had occurred and the breaches which had not occurred the lessor had, in his Lordship’s opinion, done what the statute required and something more. Then was the matter covered by the authority of reported cases? Some of these were decided before 1892 when the section was amended by section 2 of the Conveyancing Act, 1892. “Skinner’s Company v. Knight” ([1891], 2 Q.B., 542) decided that the compensation payable under section 14 of the Act of 1881 did not include the costs of a solicitor and surveyor consulted as to preparing the notice, but the law on this head had been altered by the Act of 1892. In “Lock v. Pearce” ([1893], 2 Ch., 271) the notices were given in 1891, and not only stated the breaches of covenant and required payment of compensation, but also required payment of the solicitor’s and surveyor’s charges, and at p. 280 the present Master of the Rolls said:—“It is true that he asked for £2 2s. for the surveyor’s fees, and there is a case which decides that he could not recover them; but in fact he told them what compensation he wanted. The notices are as good as any notice could be.” That was a decision of the Court of Appeal that a notice which required the lessee to do something which he was not compellable to do was not for that reason a bad notice. It was said that the contrary had been decided in “Horsey Estate (Limited) v. Steiger” ([1899], 2 Q.B., 79), but the observations of the Lord Chief Justice at p. 92 of the report meant not that the notice was bad, but that the proceedings on the notice were bad. The action in that case was commenced two days after service of the notice, and the time allowed was held to be unreasonable. In the present case, in his Lordship’s judgment, the notice was not bad. The case was distinguishable from “In re Serle” ([1898], 1 Ch., 652), which did not appear to decide the point now before the Court, but to be a decision as to the insufficiency of the particulars of the breaches. His Lordship then discussed the evidence with reference to the alleged breaches still relied on, and held that there were no breaches on which the plaintiff could rely.

The action was dismissed with costs.

STEWARDS AND CO. (LIMITED) V. THE QUEEN.*

Contract—Agreement—Construction—Acceptance of tender.

This was a petition of right, in which Sir R. Reid, Q.C., Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. T. J. Bullen appeared for the suppliants; the Solicitor-General and Mr. R. B. D. Acland for the Crown.

By the petition £27,386 17s. 4d. was claimed as damages for breach of contract under the following circumstances. In 1895 the Lords Commissioners for the Admiralty were engaged in erecting a new breakwater termed Portland New Breakwater, and invited tenders “for the supply of cap and roach stone, now lying in rough stacks in quarries, in such quantities and at such times as may be required by the Admiralty. . . . contractors to state the approximate quantity of stone they are able to supply.” The suppliants sent the following tender:—“We . . . do hereby agree to deliver cap and roach stone (rough), approximate amount two million tons (it is believed that a considerably larger amount is obtainable, but as the amount required is not stated we have not verified this), in accordance with specification for the sum of 4d. per ton.” The tender was accepted in these terms:—“Gentlemen,—I have to acquaint you that your tender, dated September 7, 1895, is accepted for the supply for the new breakwater at Portland of about 2,000,000 tons or such quantity as may be required of cap and roach stone (rough) in accordance with a specification. . . .” On December 23, 1897, the superintending civil engineer wrote:—“As the Admiralty have entered into a contract with Messrs. W. Hill and Co. for the completion of the new breakwater works, will you please note that the Admiralty will cease to draw stone from your stone heaps after January 15 next. From that date all work will be carried on by the contractors subject to any arrangement they may make with you.” By January 15 the suppliants had only supplied 254,985 tons, 8cwt., 2 quarters of the stone, and they claimed that they were entitled to damages for loss of profit on the remainder of the two million tons and expenses. For the suppliants it was contended that it would be absurd to construe the contract as meaning that, while they were bound to supply up to a maximum of two million tons, the Admiralty might take as little as they chose. “Required” must mean “required for the construction of the breakwater.” For the Crown it was contended that the form of invitation for the tender showed that it was not intended to take all the stone from one contractor. As to the interpretation of the contract “Burton v. the Great Northern Railway Company” (9 Ex., 507) and the Great Northern Railway Company v. Witham” (L.R.9, C.P., 16) were cited. These cases showed that a contract might be unilateral, one party being bound to supply what was required, though the other was not bound to require anything. “Hamlyn v. Wood and Co.” ([1891], 2 Q.B., 488) was also cited. It cannot be said that, in this contract, the Admiralty impliedly agreed to go on buying their breakwater in order to take the suppliants’ stone. Yet that contention was necessary for the suppliants’ case.

Mr. WALTON having replied,

HIS LORDSHIP said that it was perfectly clear the Admiralty had expressed their willingness to take whatever amount the suppliants were able to supply and the suppliants had bound themselves to supply up to 2,000,000 tons. “Required” no doubt meant “required for the construction of the breakwater,” and whether it was required or not did not depend on whether the Admiralty wanted it or chose to have the work done by another contractor. He gave judgment for the plaintiffs, the question of the amount of damages standing over.

*Reported by H. G. SNOWDEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

BESTELL V. NYE.*

Building contract—Architect—Certificate as to work done—Liability.

Where a building contract provided that the price was to be paid on the architect's certificates from time to time, and that his final certificate was to be conclusive evidence that the builders were entitled to receive payment; held that an action would not lie against the architect for negligence in issuing such certificate.

This was an action against an architect, in which the plaintiff sought to recover money alleged to have been received by the defendant to the plaintiff's use, also damages for the defendant's negligence. The defendant was employed by the plaintiff as architect in connexion with the building of a bungalow for the plaintiff in Sussex. The terms of the employment of the defendant were contained in certain letters which passed between the parties, from which it appeared that the defendant was to be paid by the plaintiff for "plans, specifications, and supervision of works" 5 per cent. upon the amount of the expenditure, travelling and out-of-pocket expenses to be charged extra. In accepting the defendant's offer in these terms, the plaintiff wrote that the charge was to be an inclusive charge covering everything. The defendant entered upon the work. He prepared a specification on which tenders were obtained, and included therein a provision that surveyor's charges for bill of quantities should be 2½ per cent. on the amount of the estimate, and for drawings, &c., £10 10s. The defendant himself prepared a bill of quantities, and obtained a tender from some builders at Brighton, for the erection of the bungalow for £1,790. The tender was accepted and a contract was signed by the plaintiff, which provided that the price should be paid by instalments upon the defendant's certificates, and that his final certificate should be conclusive evidence that the builders were entitled to receive payment of the final balance. The work was completed and the plaintiff paid the contract price, together with the cost of certain extras on the defendant's certificates. The defendant was paid by the builders 2½ per cent. on the contract price for taking out the quantities and the ten guineas for the drawings. The plaintiff alleged that the receipt of these payments by the defendant was a breach of the defendant's term of employment, and was, alternatively, a secret profit made by the defendant in the course of his employment. The defendant contended that the ordinary course of business had been followed, and that the plaintiff was fully aware that the cost of taking out the quantities was not included in the defendant's charges for acting as architect to the work. The second head of the plaintiff's claim was for damages for negligence on the part of the defendant. The plaintiff's case was that the defendant had omitted to check the builder's accounts with due skill and diligence, and had passed as extras works included in the contract and had certified for sums improperly passed. These allegations were denied by the defendant. Since the action was begun the plaintiff had died, and his executors had been substituted as plaintiffs.

Mr. Bray, Q.C., and Mr. E. Morten appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Boxall and Sir Lennox Napier for the defendant.

MR. JUSTICE MATHEW, in giving judgment, said that the defendant alleged that the terms of his employment by the plaintiff were that his charges were only to cover the ordinary work of an architect, apart from the work of taking out the quantities. The course of business with regard to taking out quantities was that the builder employed some one to take out the quantities. The builder affixed his own prices to the quantities, and he added to the amount of his tender the fee of the quantity surveyor, and in the event of the tender being accepted that fee was included in the first certificate given by the architect. It was not usual in London for the builder to employ the architect to take out the quantities, but it was said that in the country it was permissible and that it was not considered that there was anything objectionable in that course being followed. In the present case the defendant, who was the architect to the work, acted as quantity surveyor, and the amount of his fee was included in the sum for which the defendant, as architect, gave his first certificate. Some time afterwards the plaintiff discovered that this had been done, and he claimed the benefit of the payment on the ground that by the terms of the employment the defendant's charge was to be an inclusive one. On the other hand, the defendant said that the agreement contained in the correspondence was confined to his ordinary duties as an architect, and that the builder might, if he had chosen, have employed any one else to take out the quantities, which, it was admitted, was a necessary thing to be done. His Lordship came to the conclusion that the agreement between the plaintiff and the defendant did not cover the cost of taking out the quantities; but his Lordship felt compelled to add that he did not think that the defendant had acted as an honourable man, because he had concealed from the plaintiff the fact that he was making this arrangement. The plaintiff was unfortunately now dead, but the learned Judge was satisfied from the correspondence that the defendant did not disclose to the plaintiff the arrangement with the builder as to taking out the quantities. It was conceivable that if the plaintiff had known of it he might have disapproved. With regard to the other part of the case, the damages were claimed on the ground that the defendant had been negligent in issuing his final certificate. The defendant was sued for negligence only; there was no imputation of fraud. The defendant's answer to the charge of negligence was that he had relied on the word of the builder, but his Lordship was satisfied that the defendant had not held the scales impartially, and had been guilty of negligence which had benefited the builder at the expense of the plaintiff. The question was, Could damages be recovered from the defendant in these circumstances? His Lordship was clearly of opinion that damages were not recoverable. It was not necessary to refer at length to the authorities on the subject. There was the case of "Tharsis Sulphur Company v. Loftus" (L.R., 8 C.P., 1), the case of an average adjuster: "Pappa v. Rose" (L.R., 7 C.P., 525), the case of a broker; and the case of "Stevenson v. Watson" (4 C.P.D., 148). The principle of law applicable to the case was that when two men employed a third to settle a dispute they were bound by what he decided. The parties were supposed to have satisfied themselves as to the third person's skill and care, and they were not allowed to say, after his decision had been given, that he had acted negligently or with want of skill. The result was that there must be judgment for the defendant, but without costs.

Company—Winding up—Jurisdiction of the Court
—Power to order production of documents—
Discretion—Companies Act, 1862, sec. 115.
Decision of Wright, J. (ante, p. 93), affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice Wright's (reported ante, p. 93). The liquidator of the above-named company, which was in voluntary liquidation, applied under section 115 of the Companies Act, 1862, for production by the surveyor of taxes of the Bradford First District of three balance-sheets of the company which, while it was a going concern, had been left with him for income-tax assessment purposes. He declined to produce the balance-sheets, and was supported in his objection by the Board of Inland Revenue, which passed a resolution as follows:—"In the opinion of the Board of Inland Revenue, who have duly considered the question, the production of the documents referred to in the summons . . . would be prejudicial and injurious to the public interests and service." A minute of this resolution was proved by the secretary to the Board. It was intended to use these balance-sheets upon a misfeasance summons against the officers of the company. In support of the application it was contended that the liquidator represented the company which had issued the balance-sheets, and that no objection could be raised to the company itself seeing them. It was further contended that the objection ought to be made personally by the head of the objecting department. Mr. Justice Wright said that, though there might be cases in which the Court could require the principal officer of the department to come into Court and prove that the production of the documents sought to be produced would be against public policy, the usual practice was to accept the certificate of the Board. No ground had been shown for overruling the objection, and in the exercise of the discretion conferred upon him by section 115 of the Companies Act, 1862, he declined to order the production of the documents. The liquidator appealed.

Mr. P. Wheeler appeared for the liquidator; and Mr. Danekwerts, Q.C., and Mr. Rowlatt for the Board of Inland Revenue.

The Court dismissed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said that the language of section 115 of the Companies Act, 1862, showed that a person who applied for production of documents under that section had no absolute right to an order. It had been decided over and over again that under that section the Judge had a discretion, and that if the Judge had considered the matter and had exercised his discretion the Court of Appeal would not interfere. He did not say that the Court of Appeal had no jurisdiction to interfere with the exercise by a Judge of first instance of his discretion, but prima facie the Court ought not to interfere. The appeal should be dismissed.

LORDS JUSTICES VAUGHAN WILLIAMS and ROMER concurred.

Ship—Salvage—Towage—Agreement—Reasonableness of agreement—Salvage award reduced—Costs.

This was an appeal by the defendants from the judgment of Mr. Justice Bucknill, reported in The Times of December 13 last. The action was brought by the owners, master, and crew of the steamship Tintore to recover salvage for services rendered to the defendants' steamship Kilmaho, her cargo and freight, off the north-west coast of Spain on September 26 and 27 of last year. The Tintore was a Spanish steamship of 1,326 tons gross register with a crew of 29 hands, and about 5 45 p.m. on September 26, when in latitude 45° 8' N., and longitude 8° 36' W., in the course of a voyage from Barcelona to Liverpool with a cargo of fruit and wine, she fell in with the Kilmaho exhibiting signals of distress. The Kilmaho was a steamship of 2,155 tons gross register with a crew of 20 hands. About 9 a.m. on September 26, when in latitude 45° 22' N., and longitude 8° 28' W., in the course of a voyage from Seville to Glasgow with a general cargo, she struck some submerged wreckage with her propeller and broke off the blades. The Kilmaho set what sails she could and endeavoured to make for Ferrol, which was about 90 miles distant. When the Tintore came up it was agreed that she should endeavour to tow the Kilmaho to Ferrol for £2,000, and a written agreement to that effect was entered into. The Kilmaho was made fast, and the towage commenced about 9 30 p.m. During the towage the weather was heavy and the Tintore sustained severe damage. The hawsers parted about 5 a.m. on September 27. The vessels were again made fast about 7 15 a.m., and the towage continued for another 15 minutes, when the hawsers again parted. Neither vessel had then any ropes left which were fit for towage. At this time the Kilmaho had been towed 50 miles, and was 40 miles from Ferrol and about 20 miles off the Spanish coast. The captain of the Tintore offered to take off the crew of the Kilmaho, but this was refused. It was then agreed that the Tintore should proceed to Ferrol and send assistance, and the master of the Kilmaho entered into a written agreement undertaking to pay £2,000 for all the services of the Tintore. The captain of the Kilmaho stated in his evidence that he protested against the agreement, but felt bound to sign it on account of the position of his vessel; the captain of the Tintore denied this. The Tintore then proceeded to Ferrol, which was reached about 2 30 p.m., and information of the position of the Kilmaho was given to the British Consul and a telegram sent to her owners. At 4 35 p.m. the Tintore left Ferrol in search of the Kilmaho, but failed to find her, and proceeded on her voyage for Liverpool. The Kilmaho was ultimately picked up by the steamship Tudor and brought safely by her into Ferrol on the night of the 23rd. The value of the Tintore was £10,800, of her cargo £7,200, and of her freight £600, in all £18,600. The value of the Kilmaho was £24,150, of her cargo £4,125, and of her freight at risk £323, in all £28,602. Mr. Justice Bucknill gave judgment for the plaintiffs for the £2,000 claimed.

Mr. F. LAING, Q.C., and Mr. LAURISTON BATTEN, for the defendants, contended that under the first agreement, which was a salvage agreement, nothing became due, success being essential to a claim under a salvage agreement. If services rendered under a salvage agreement were, though not successful, of some benefit to the ship in distress, then the Court would award something on a quantum meruit. But in the present case, when the second agreement was made the Kilmaho was in a worse position than when the first agreement was made, as she was out of the course of other vessels and much nearer to a rocky and dangerous coast, and this the learned Judge had found. Therefore the services rendered under the first agreement could not be taken into account as part of the consideration for the second agreement. Nothing being due under the first agreement, the master of the Kilmaho, being an agent of necessity, had no authority to bind his owners by the second agreement to pay anything for the services already rendered under the first agreement. Therefore, if those services formed part of the consideration for the second agreement, the master had no authority to bind his owners. That being so, the sum of £2,000 was an outrageous sum for merely going into Ferrol and sending assistance to the Kilmaho. The evidence of the master of the Kilmaho was to the effect that he signed the second agreement under protest, alleging that the sum was exorbitant and that the agreement would not be binding, but the position of the Kilmaho was such that he had no option but to sign it. This, no doubt, was denied by the master of the Tintore. The agreement was therefore made under duress. The Court would award some reasonable sum for the services rendered under the second agreement, taking into account the fact that the services only lasted a few hours, whereas the salvage services rendered by the Tudor occupied a much longer time, and only £1,500 was paid to her. They referred to "Kennedy on Salvage," p. 32; "The Cheerful" (11 P.D., 3); "The Benlarig" (14 P.D., 3); "The Mark Lane" (15 P.D., 135); "The Rialto" ([1891] P., 175); "Akerblom v. Price" (7 Q.B.D., 129); "The Medina" (2 P.D., 5).

MR. ASPINALL, Q.C., and MR. SUTTON TIMMIS, for the plaintiffs, contended that, apart from any agreement, the services rendered by the Tintore were very considerable, and, in looking at the proper amount to award, the Court would take into consideration the value of the Kilmaho, her freight, and cargo—namely, over £23,000. Secondly, the learned Judge had found, as a fact, that there was no duress in signing the second agreement. The first agreement—to tow to Ferrol—not having been performed the plaintiffs could not recover the agreed sum of £2,000 under it. Still, the evidence showed that the services rendered under that agreement conferred a benefit on the Kilmaho, as she was 50 miles nearer to Ferrol when the towing ceased, where she would be more likely to meet with other vessels and be in a better position than if she had not been towed. The learned Judge really found that a benefit had been conferred upon the Kilmaho by the towage, and he took that fact into account in awarding £2,000. The law was clear that where services rendered under a salvage agreement were not entirely successful, if benefit was conferred by them the Court would award a quantum meruit. "The Aztec" (3 Asp. Mar. Cas. (O.S.), 326); "The Hestia" ([1895] P., 193).

The COURT allowed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that when the Tintore had towed the Kilmaho about 50 miles she was able to tow her no longer. It was not denied that, if the Kilmaho had been benefited by the towage services already rendered, she would have been entitled to some reward, though not to the agreed sum of £2,000. It was a question of fact whether the Kilmaho was left in a better position than when the towage began. It seemed to him that the learned Judge in the Court below came to the conclusion that the position of the Kilmaho was worse at that time than at the beginning of the towage. She was left on a lee shore out of the track of vessels with a nor-west wind blowing. In these circumstances nothing could have been recovered in respect of the services rendered up to that time. The second agreement was then made to the effect that the Tintore should go into Ferrol, about 40 miles away, give notice of the situation of the Kilmaho, and seek assistance for her. For those services the sum of £2,000 was to be paid. Was that an exorbitant sum to pay for those services? In his Lordship's opinion it was an exorbitant sum for those services. It was suggested that part of the £2,000 was for the towage services already rendered. The answer to that suggestion was that the master had no authority to pledge his owners' credit for past services for which the owners were not liable. Therefore the owners of the Tintore were not entitled to recover the £2,000, but they were entitled to something, and in the circumstances the Court thought that £500 would be a proper sum.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY and LORD JUSTICE COLLINS concurred.

MR. LAING asked for the costs of the appeal. This Court had decided in "The Gipay Queen" ([1895] P., 176) that the general rule was not to allow costs to an appellant in a salvage case who succeeded in reducing the amount of the salvage award, but that it was not a hard and fast rule. Where the award was considerably reduced, as in the present case, the general rule did not apply, and the successful appellants should be allowed their costs.

MR. ASPINALL contended that the general rule to allow no costs should apply.

The COURT said that as the award had been reduced from £2,000 to £500 the appellants ought to have the costs of the appeal, the costs in the Court below not being interfered with.

CAVILL V. AMOS.*

Local Government—Hackney carriage—Unlicensed carriage—"Plying for hire"—Town Police Clauses Act, 1847 (10 and 11 Vict., c. 89), sec. 45.

Held, on the facts, that there had been no plying for hire.

This was a special case stated by two justices for the borough of Harwich, before whom an information was heard, laid by the respondent and charging the appellant, under section 45 of the Town Police Clauses Act, 1847, with permitting an unlicensed carriage belonging to him to be used as a hackney carriage plying for hire within the borough. The material facts were these:—The appellant was a cab proprietor at Harwich and owned licensed and unlicensed carriages, acting himself as driver, and employing others as drivers. On June 17, 1899, the appellant drove a landau licensed as a hackney carriage to the cabstand opposite the pier. On the arrival of a passenger steamer, the drivers on the stand solicited the passengers in the usual manner as they came off the pier. A party consisting of nine gentlemen walked along the cabstand and tried to obtain a hackney carriage to accommodate them all. In this they were unsuccessful, as there were no hackney carriages on the stand licensed to carry more than five persons. The appellant said to one of the party, named Jackson, "Will you go for a drive to-day?" Jackson answered, "We all want to go together; if you have a carriage to take the lot of us, we will have it." The appellant said, "I have one at my stables; if you like you can come and see it." Five of the party then got into the appellant's licensed carriage and he drove them to his stables without making any charge therefor, the remaining four of the party following on foot. The whole of this time the appellant was wearing his badge as a licensed driver. On arriving at the stables the appellant transferred the horse from the hackney carriage to an unlicensed wagonette. The whole party got into the wagonette and the appellant (having previously removed his driver's badge) drove them out, returning again to the stables in about two hours and a half. On these facts the justices held that although, if the appellant had remained in his stables and been hired from there without any touting or soliciting, such a hire would no doubt have been lawful, he had, by wearing his badge and touting for customers on the pier, plied for hire and engaged himself to the party in question; and that he would not avoid the law and convert the engagement into a private hiring by merely transferring his customers (obtained by solicitation on a public cabstand) to an unlicensed carriage, which it would have been illegal for him to take on to such cabstand. The justices consequently held that there was a plying for hire within the meaning of the Act, and convicted the appellant.

Mr. C. E. Jones appeared for the appellant; and Mr. H. Tindal Atkinson for the respondent.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

MR. JUSTICE CHANNELL said there was no evidence upon which the justices could find a plying for hire. In ordinary cases, in order that there should be a plying for hire, the carriage itself should be exhibited. He thought, however, that a man might possibly ply for hire with a carriage without exhibiting it, by going about touting for customers. In this case, however, the appellant touted for customers for his licensed carriage. He did not solicit persons to go in the wagonette in the first instance. Consequently there was no plying for hire with the wagonette.

MR. JUSTICE BUCKNILL concurred.

STANTON V. BROWN.*

Landlord and Tenant—Ground Game Act, 1880—Agreement—Validity.

An agreement reserving all sporting rights to the landlord, though void as to ground game, is good as to other sporting rights.

This was a special case stated by two justices of Gloucestershire before whom an information was heard charging the respondent with trespass on a certain farm in pursuit of game. It was proved that the respondent was shooting partridges over the farm on the occasion referred to in the information. He, however, had obtained permission to shoot over the farm from the tenant, and contended that the tenant was entitled to shoot and permit others to shoot over it. The tenant was holding the farm as a tenant from year to year on the terms, so far as they were applicable to a tenancy from year to year, of an expired lease dated March 12, 1888, whereby the farm was demised to the tenant subject to a reservation to the lessor "of the exclusive right of the lessor and his friends to enter upon the said farm for the purpose of sporting or otherwise." The justices were of opinion that the reservation in the lease was an agreement, condition, or arrangement which purported to divest or alienate the right of the tenant to kill or take ground game, and was therefore void under section 3 of the Ground Game Act, 1880. They were of opinion that the reservation of sporting rights was inseparable in its terms, and that there was no authority to support the contention that it would be held to be good in part as to winged game and void in part as to ground game. They therefore were of opinion that the parties to the lease were thrown back upon their common law rights and that by the common law the tenant had the right to kill both the winged and ground game and could lawfully authorize the defendant to do so. They accordingly dismissed the information subject to the present case.

Mr. W. L. Richards appeared for the appellant.

The respondent did not appear.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

MR. JUSTICE CHANNELL said the case was quite clear. It was impossible to read section 3 of the Ground Game Act, 1880, which provided that "every agreement, condition, or arrangement which purports to divest or alienate the right of the occupier as declared, given and reserved to him by this Act . . . shall be void," as meaning that the agreement should be void in its entirety, and "Beardmore v. Meakin" (20 L.J., Notes of Cases, 8) showed that it did not mean that the reservation could not be void in its entirety either. One reason was that the section applied to agreements made before the Act as well as to agreements made after it; and it was impossible to suppose that the Legislature intended, in an Act conferring on occupiers the right of killing ground game, to destroy a reservation as to winged game. If the section did not effect that in the case of agreements made before the Act, it could not do it in the case of subsequent agreements. The respondent might have raised a much better defence on the ground of a claim of right ousting the justices' jurisdiction. But that point was not taken. The case must, therefore, be remitted to the justices with directions to convict.

MR. JUSTICE BUCKNILL concurred.

IN RE THE ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER CORPORATION.*

Master and Servant—Journalist—Dismissal—Notice—Reasonableness.

Held, on the facts, that a month's notice was reasonable.

This was a summons in a voluntary liquidation to determine whether a claim by Mrs. Aitken, the Scotch representative of the Gentlewoman, for 26 weeks' salary was well founded. The business of the above corporation was to carry on the Gentlewoman, an illustrated ladies' weekly sixpenny newspaper. Mrs. Aitken, apart from artists, was the sole representative of the Gentlewoman in Scotland. Mrs. Aitken's employment commenced in 1891, when the newspaper had recently been started. The terms of her employment were contained in a letter to her from the editor, dated June, 1891, and her answer to the editor's letter. The arrangement was to last in the first instance for three months. Mrs. Aitken was to provide a column at the rate of £1 1s. a column. The arrangement was modified, and the amount she received and the work she did were increased. The terms were finally arranged in April, 1896. The editor then wrote to Mrs. Aitken, proposing to put the financial relationship between her and the company on a new footing; he complained of certain charges, and added, "What I propose to do is to pay you 21s. per column for all matter we insert, and 31s. 6d. for all services and all petty-cash, stationery and postage-stamps being supplied. When from home by the editor's instructions, actual railway fares of course to be paid, and a daily allowance of 10s. to cover all expenses." This arrangement was accepted, with the alteration of 31s. 6d. to two guineas, with a minimum payment of three guineas a week. A settlement was come to monthly. In August, 1898, the editor wrote a letter, dismissing Mrs. Aitken. After making certain complaints, he wrote, "I therefore give you one month's notice to terminate your connexion with the paper, and as I prefer that you shall write no further word for it, I will send you a cheque equivalent to the amount of one month's dues, on receiving from you all papers, stationery, stamps, tickets of invitation, &c., which you now hold as our representative, and I shall be glad if you will do so at once." A tender of £12 12s. was afterwards made, but Mrs. Aitken claimed six months' salary. A resolution to wind up has since been passed.

Mr. GILMORE, for Mrs. Aitken, argued that a reasonable notice was six months.

Mr. MUIR MACKENZIE and Mr. ARCHIBALD READ, for the liquidator, contended not only that a month's notice was sufficient, but that there were sufficient grounds to dismiss Mrs. Aitken without notice.

Mr. MUIR MACKENZIE, however, in answer to the JUDGE, said the liquidator was willing to abide by the tender of a month's salary.

MR. JUSTICE COZENS-HARDY said he was not concerned to consider whether the company could have dismissed Mrs. Aitken without notice. He preferred not to approach that question. The company gave a month's notice, and tendered a month's salary. They were prepared to abide by that. That being so, all that he need consider was whether, under the circumstances, that was a reasonable notice. He thought it was. The payment was reckoned by the week, and made monthly. He saw no ground for saying that there was a contract for a yearly service. At the very outside a month's notice was sufficient. Mrs. Aitken would be allowed to prove for 12 guineas. He would allow no costs. The liquidator would get his costs out of the estate.

THE NATIONAL SPORTING CLUB (LIMITED) V. COPE.*
Licensing Acts—Offences—Sale without licence—Club.

The shareholders in a limited company carrying on the business of a club were composed chiefly of members of the club, but some were non-members.

Held, that the company could not sell intoxicating liquor to the club without a licence.

This was a special case stated by one of the metropolitan police magistrates on the hearing of certain informations laid against the appellant company under the Excise Acts for selling liquors and tobacco without the necessary licences. The material facts were as follows:—The appellants are a limited company duly registered and incorporated under the Companies Acts and carry on the business of a club at No. 43, King-street, Covent-garden, under the style of the National Sporting Club (Limited). The memorandum and articles of association of the company do not require that only members of the club shall be shareholders in the company; but the rules of the club require that every member of the club shall be a shareholder in the company. It was admitted that the company had no Excise licence for the sale of any intoxicating liquor or tobacco. The capital of the company is £16,000, divided into 6,500 preference shares of £2 each and 1,500 ordinary shares of £2 each. The preference shares (of which 3,442 have been issued) were originally allotted to members of the club but are now held partly by members and partly by non-members; the holding by non-members is only of such shares as were not repurchaseable by the club by reason either of their being the property of members who had resigned, or because, having been held by members of the club who had died, they had become the property of their representatives. The preference shareholders are entitled to receive out of the profits of each year a preferential dividend at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum. The whole of the ordinary shares were taken by the two vendors of the business in part payment of the purchase money, and dividends are only payable upon such ordinary shares out of the surplus profits, if any, on the year's working after the payment of the preferential dividend of 8 per cent. The business of the company was acquired from the two vendors, who became two directors of the company, for £8,500 cash and 1,500 ordinary shares at £2 each. The rules of the club enable members to introduce guests to the club. On ordinary nights, being nights other than the "entertainment nights" mentioned below, the practice is for a member introducing a guest to write his (the member's) and the guest's name in a book kept for the purpose. On "entertainment nights" (that is to say, on evenings when an athletic or some other display is being held in the theatre of the club) the practice is as follows:—Tickets are issued to members desirous of introducing guests, such tickets being taken from a book containing the counterfoils of the same, and no person is allowed to be admitted to the club on such occasions unless he produces to the officials of the club a ticket on the counterfoil of which is written the name of the guest and the name of the member introducing such guest. There are provisions in the rules of the club for preventing persons not being members of the club from paying for any refreshment or tobacco supplied to them in the club, and the same must be paid for by a member. These provisions are made in good faith and notices calling attention to these regulations are and were, on the occasions to which the informations referred, posted in the different rooms on the club premises. Strict instructions were given both on those occasions and at other times to the employees of the club to comply with this rule, and several persons, including an ex-inspector of the Metropolitan Police, were specifically employed to see that such rule was carried out. All intoxicating liquor and tobacco served upon the club premises is supplied to the company and paid for by the company's cheque, and the profit, if any, upon the sale of the same as well as all profits derived from carrying on the club go into the funds of the company and are distributed in dividend among the shareholders. On the evenings of April 24 and May 1, 1899, which were "entertainment nights," the respondent, who was an officer of Inland Revenue, acting on the instructions of his superiors, in company with H. M. Thorpe, also an officer of Inland Revenue, obtained admission to the club by means of tickets which had been obtained from, and the counterfoils of which were signed by, a member. On April 24 the officers Cope and Thorpe arrived about 9 p.m. At the door they handed in an envelope containing the tickets, and passed in downstairs, through a room used as a refreshment room, into a theatre. A boxing competition was going on. About 10 p.m. there was an interval, and they went into the refreshment room they had passed through. There is a bar on the left coming from the theatre with tables there. Thorpe ordered supper for two, half a bottle of claret, and a glass of gin and soda from a waiter. No question was asked as the officers entered as to their being members. They had signed no book. What Thorpe ordered was supplied and he paid the waiter. After that Cope ordered of the waiter two cigars and was supplied, paying 2s. After that the officers went to the bar. Cope ordered of the barmaid one gin and soda and one bottle of beer. She served the gin and was pouring the soda out, and as she was doing so she asked if Cope was a member, and without waiting for an answer finished pouring it out. Cope made no answer, but put down 2s. The beer was supplied, too. On May 1 the same officers went to the club again. Thorpe handed in the tickets. They were not asked any questions and signed no book. There was a boxing competition going on. At the interval about 10 the officers went into the refreshment room. Thorpe ordered supper, one gin and soda, and one lemonade and claret, and cigars of a waiter. They were supplied and Thorpe paid. The officers went to the bar and Cope ordered from the same barmaid as on April 24 one gin and soda and one bottle of Bass. She said, "Are you a member, Sir?" Cope said, "No." She said, "You know you are not allowed to pay," and did not supply the liquor. Having regard to the circumstances under which these officers were served and to all the evidence before him, and to the precaution against the service of non-members, the learned magistrate was of opinion that, for the purposes of this case, the respondent and his brother officer were in the position of members of the club, that they were, in fact, taken and assumed by the waiters and barmaid who supplied to them the refreshments, tobacco, and liquors as above stated to be members of the club, and under that assumption the officers were, in fact, supplied by the waiters and barmaid as members of the club. He thought that if the waiters or a barmaid had knowingly supplied non-members they would have acted beyond the scope of their authority in so doing. He found as a fact that they sold the liquors and tobacco to the officers thinking they were members; and he declined to deal with the case as one of a sale to non-members of the club. It was also proved, and the learned magistrate found as a fact, that the appellants on April 24 and May 1 made a practice of selling and did sell both intoxicating liquors of the kinds mentioned in the informations and tobacco to members of the club. The learned magistrate was of opinion, upon the evidence before him, that the appellant company was carrying on the business of a proprietary club, the goodwill and fixtures whereof the company had bought; that the company was a separate legal entity distinct from the club and also distinct from its shareholders; that the refreshments, liquors, and tobacco were the property of the company and not in any way the property of the members of the club; that the refreshments, liquors, and tobacco were sold by and for the company to the individual members of the club who were supplied therewith by the waiters and barmaid; that all the profits from the sale of the refreshments, liquors, and tobacco to members of the club, and from carrying on the club, were the property of, and received by, the company, and were divisible amongst the shareholders of the company as such according to their respective rights as such shareholders; that the managers, waiters, barmaid, and other servants employed in the club were the servants of the company; that there was no transfer of the property in any liquor or tobacco until the particular liquor or tobacco was supplied and handed to the member of the club ordering it, and who was in fact thereby bound to pay for it; and that such transaction of supplying and handing over the liquor and tobacco was a sale thereof. The learned magistrate accordingly convicted the company of two offences against 6 Geo. IV., c. 81, section 26, for retailing spirits without a licence on April 24 and May 1 respectively; of two offences against the same enactment for dealing in tobacco without a licence on the same dates; of two offences against 23 and 24 Vict., c. 27, section 19, for selling wine by retail without a licence on the same dates; and of one offence against 4 and 5 Will. IV., c. 85, section 17, for retailing beer without a licence. He, however, stated the present case.

Mr. Lawson Walton, Q.C., and Mr. Charles Mathews appeared for the appellants; and the Attorney-General, Mr. Danckwerts, Q.C., and Mr. Rowlatt for the respondent.

The COURT, without hearing counsel for the respondent, dismissed the appeal.

MR. JUSTICE CHANNELL said a good many cases had been cited and the principle of those cases had been discussed; but this case must be decided on its own special facts. The law as to purely members' clubs must be taken to be settled—namely, that for such clubs no licence is required. The form gone through, when a member obtained and paid for liquor, was held not to be a sale of liquor such as to make the licensing laws applicable, but to be merely a form of distributing common property. The case was treated as being analogous to the case of persons living together in the same house and ordering a cask of beer on a joint account, making an arrangement among themselves that each should pay for the beer drunk by him. That being the principle applicable to members' clubs, it was further held that the principle was not defeated by the fact that the property is vested for the purposes of convenience in trustees. In such cases the property was in the trustees, and the members of the club had certainly no legal property in the excisable articles. They had, however, an interest in them, and the case was treated as if the property had been in them, and the obtaining and paying for liquor by the members was treated as a mere distribution of property, in which they had a common interest. Mr. Lawson Walton might be right in saying that a corporation might be constituted of the members of a club which would stand exactly in the position occupied by the trustees in the ordinary case of a members' club. That was, it might be, established by "Newell v. Hemingway" (58 L.J., M.C., 46), though the case was possibly to be explained on the ground that the proceedings were against the manager, and not against the company. He would express no opinion on these points. Then as to the case of proprietary clubs, he would imitate the caution of Mr. Justice Wright. He would not say that a proprietary club might not be so constituted as to come within the principle applicable to a members' club. But in the ordinary case the proprietor managed the whole thing, the property was his both legally and in fact, and he made a profit out of the concern. It was impossible to bring that case within the principle applicable to members' clubs. In the case of a members' club it did not signify whether there was a profit or not, because the profits were applied in the general purposes of the club and the transaction was still only a distribution. But in the case of a proprietary club the question whether the proprietor is carrying on the concern for profit was important, as was brought out by the Irish case of "Lynam v. O'Reilly" ([1898] 2 I.R., 48). It was clear that, in the case of an ordinary proprietary club, there was a sale and a sale by retail of refreshments to the members; and he thought that was decided by "Bowyer v. Percy Supper Club" (L.R. [1893], 2 Q.B., 154), because, although Mr. Justice Mathew said he did not agree with the magistrate on a question of fact, it was not to be assumed that the case was decided on that ground, and he thought the judgments showed that it was not decided on that ground. It remained to deal with the present case. It was not a case in which the members of the club were incorporated into a corporation consisting wholly of the members of the club. If that had been so there would be much force in the argument that the corporation stood merely in the position of trustees, and that, though in law a corporation is a distinct legal entity from its members, the arrangement was merely a means of distributing among the members of the club and of the corporation, who would be identical, property in which they had a common interest. But here the company was not a mere incorporation of members of the club. There were outside shareholders. The company was therefore a legal entity which was not either in law or in fact identical with the club. To that outside body the property of the club belonged. Consequently the case was brought within the principle applicable to an ordinary proprietary club. True the proprietor was incorporated, but the corporate proprietor made profits and paid dividends. For the reasons he had given the case did not, in his opinion, come within the case of members' clubs, but was within that class of proprietary clubs where there is a sale from the proprietor to the members, both within the meaning of the Excise Acts and of section 3 of the Licensing Act, 1872.

HOPE V. WALTER.*

Specific Performance—Agreement for purchase of freehold property—Decree refused.

At the date of the contract for the purchase of freehold premises they were, unknown both to vendor and purchaser, being kept as a disorderly house. On this fact coming to the knowledge of the purchaser he would not complete.

Decree of specific performance refused.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice Cozens-Hardy dated March 17. The action was brought for specific performance of an agreement to purchase property which was described in the particulars of sale as "the eligible freehold property for investment comprising the brick-built corner house and shop." Then followed a description of the accommodation, and the property was described "as let on a quarterly tenancy under an agreement dated July 20, 1895, at a rent of £55 per annum." The action was brought by the vendors, who were trustees for sale. For the purpose of the action it was assumed that, at the date of the contract and for some time before, the property in question had been used for immoral purposes, and that in 1897 the tenant had been convicted for keeping it as a disorderly house. It was admitted that neither the vendors nor the purchaser were aware at the date of the contract of the improper use to which the premises were being put. The defendant resisted the claim for specific performance and counter-claimed for rescission of the contract upon the ground that the property was being used as a disorderly house. Mr. Justice Cozens-Hardy held, upon the authority of some observations of Vice-Chancellor Wigram in "Lucas v. James" (7 Ha., 410, 419), that inasmuch as both parties were ignorant of the existence of the nuisance there was no sufficient ground for refusing specific performance, and he gave judgment for the plaintiffs. The defendant appealed.

Mr. Eve, Q.C., and Mr. Tomlin were for the defendant; and Mr. Astbury, Q.C., and Mr. R. B. Yardley for the plaintiffs.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS felt rather strongly that this was a case in which it would be wrong to grant specific performance. It would be almost a scandal if the Court having the power to refuse the extraordinary remedy of specific performance were to thrust down the throat of an innocent person the obligation of becoming the buyer of a house kept as a brothel. It was true that the plaintiffs did not know of the character of the house they were putting up for sale or of the conviction of their tenant; and the same observation applied to the purchaser, who was no more to blame than the plaintiffs. But before the time for completion he found it out. It was said that upon the authorities the defendant's objection ought not to prevail. His Lordship was not prepared to say that the counterclaim by which the defendant sought to set aside the contract could be supported. He thought it could not. Nor was he prepared to say that the plaintiffs could not maintain an action for damages. But when the Court was asked to exercise its extraordinary jurisdiction, he thought that this was a case in which the Court ought to hold its hand. Apart from the legal aspect of the case the position of a man who became the owner of a disorderly house was not an enviable one; it was a position to which a stigma attached, and under the provisions of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, if he did not turn out the tenant he would be liable to criminal proceedings. To force such a position as that upon a man was contrary to those principles of justice and fairness by which this Court was always guided in the exercise of its jurisdiction. The only authority which had any bearing on the case was that of "Lucas v. James," but that case was entirely distinguishable. There the purchaser resisted specific performance on the ground that there was a disreputable house some doors off the premises he had contracted to buy. That was a totally different case from this. His Lordship based his judgment in this case upon the grounds that this Court would not compel a man to buy property which, if he took no steps to prevent it, would expose him as owner to criminal proceedings by reason of its state at the time of the sale, unless he knew or ought to have known of the state of the property. The appeal would be allowed.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS concurred.

LORD JUSTICE ROMER said that he felt more doubt on the subject than the Master of the Rolls, but was not prepared to differ from the other members of the Court.

THE SNARK.*

Negligence—Employment of contractor—Liability of principal—Salvage operations—Wreck not properly lighted.

Decision of Gorell Barnes, J. (15 The Times L.R., 170) affirmed.

This was an appeal by the defendants from the judgment of Mr. Justice Barnes, reported in 15 The

*Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Times L.R., 170; [1899] P., 74. The plaintiffs were the owners of the steamship Vesta, and the defendants were the owners of the barge Snark. The action was in personam to recover damages for injuries to the Vesta, owing to her having run upon the Snark, which had been sunk in the fairway of the Thames, off Cuckolds Point. The Snark, without any negligence on her part, had been sunk by a collision with a steamer on August 1, 1897, at about 12 15 a.m. The owners of the Snark employed a contractor named Forrest, who was called an "underwaterman" and was familiar with that class of work, being frequently employed by the Thames Conservancy, to raise the Snark for a fixed sum. Forrest went to the Thames Conservancy and gave them notice of the wreck, and on August 2 the Thames Conservancy sent a mark boat to the spot, for which the defendants paid them. Forrest then got his plant ready and relieved the Thames Conservancy of the task of marking the sunken barge, and on the next day the Thames Conservancy's mark boat was removed. Forrest was guilty of negligence in marking the barge, and in consequence the Vesta ran upon the sunken barge and was seriously damaged. The defendants contended that they were not liable for the default of Forrest, who was an independent contractor, and to whom the possession and control of the barge had been handed over. Mr. Justice Barnes held that, though the defendants had placed Forrest in physical custody of the barge for the sole purpose of raising it, they retained the possession and control, and that, therefore, they were liable.

Mr. F. LAING, Q.C., and Mr. LAURISTON BATTEN, for the defendants, contended that there was no duty on the defendants to raise the barge. They had a right to abandon it altogether. They had also a right to abandon possession of the barge to a contractor for the purpose of raising her, and the defendants would not be liable for the negligence of the contractor. The question of property was not material; the question was one of possession. The same principle must apply as in the case of the handing over of the possession of a barge afloat. In the case of a highway on land a person could not leave an obstruction upon it. But a person was not responsible for leaving a ship accidentally sunk at sea. In such cases as "Hardaker v. Idle District Council" ([1896], 1 Q.B., 335) the work which the contractor was employed to perform was itself dangerous work, and therefore it was held that the person could not escape liability by employing an independent contractor. In the present case the defendants employed Forrest to do a perfectly harmless thing—namely, to raise the sunken barge. The sunken barge was the danger, and not the raising of it. The case would be different if the defendants had employed Forrest to sink the barge. They also referred to "Rex v. Watts" (2 Esp., 675); "Brown v. Mallett" (5 C.B., 599); "White v. Crisp" (10 Ex., 321); "The Douglas" (7 P.D., 151); "The Utopia" ([1893], A.C., 492); "The Crystal" ([1894], A.C., 508); "Holliday v. National Telephone Company" ([1899], 2 Q.B., 392); "Beven on Negligence," second edition, vol. i., p. 493.

Mr. Carver, Q.C., and Mr. C. Stubbs, for the plaintiffs, were not called upon.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that the defendants entered into a contract with Forrest under which Forrest was to raise the sunken barge. The defendants did not in any way abandon their property in the barge. Forrest was guilty of negligence in connexion with the marking of the sunken barge, in consequence of which the Vesta, while navigating the river, ran upon the barge and was damaged. The question was whether the defendants were liable for the damage so caused. It was said that they were not liable because they had delegated the job and the proper lighting of the sunken barge to an independent contractor. The Thames was a highway, and, in his Lordship's opinion, Forrest was put to do work which was likely to cause injury to passing ships unless proper precautions were taken. This Court had in several cases, and notably in "Hardaker v. Idle District Council," laid down the law with regard to the liability of a person who employed an independent contractor to do certain work. In "Penny v. Wimbledon Urban District Council" ([1898], 2 Q.B., 212) Mr. Justice Bruce laid down the law thus:—"When a person employs a contractor to do work in a place where the public are in the habit of passing, which work will, unless precautions are taken, cause danger to the public, an obligation is thrown upon the person who orders the work to be done to see that the necessary precautions are taken, and that if the necessary precautions are not taken he cannot escape liability by seeking to throw the blame on the contractor." That case came to this Court on appeal ([1899], 2 Q.B., 72) and he (the Lord Justice) had adopted every word of that, and he desired to adopt it again. The present case fell directly within that rule of law. It was said that that rule did not apply in its unqualified terms to matters arising at sea or in a navigable highway like the Thames. No doubt there was this distinction, that if a barge was sunk in the Thames, it was in the power of the owner to abandon it and to refuse to have anything more to do with it. In such a case it seemed that the Thames Conservancy must, under their statute, come in and remove the obstruction. It seemed to his Lordship from the judgment of the Privy Council in "The Utopia" that, though it was in the power of the owner to abandon the sunken vessel, until he abandoned it he was liable in the ordinary way, and if the work to be done was such that he could not escape liability by delegating its execution to an independent contractor, he was liable for the negligence of the independent contractor. In "The Utopia" the Privy Council said that "the result of these authorities may be thus expressed. The owner of a ship sunk, whether by his default or not (wilful misconduct probably giving rise to different considerations), has not, if he abandon the possession and control of her, any responsibility either to remove her or to protect other vessels from coming into collision with her. It is equally true that so long as, and so far as, possession, management, and control of the wreck be not abandoned, or properly transferred, there remains on the owners an obligation in regard to the protection of other vessels from receiving an injury from her." Where was there any evidence that the owners of this barge had abandoned—or properly transferred—the possession, management, and control of the barge within the meaning of that decision? There was no such evidence. They employed Forrest to raise the barge for themselves. For these reasons, in his opinion, the judgment of the learned Judge was right.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY and LORD JUSTICE COLLINS concurred.

HAMILTON AND FLEMING.*

Solicitor—Liabilities—Personal undertaking.

Certain unstamped documents were allowed in evidence on the undertaking of the solicitor for the defendants (a company which shortly afterwards ent into liquidation) to pay the stamps and duties: held, that the solicitors were personally liable to carry out this undertaking.

This was an important application arising out of the fact that a solicitor had, in order to put in evidence unstamped documents on behalf of his clients, in accordance with the usual practice of the Chancery Division, given his personal undertaking to pay for stamps and duties to a large amount, and his client turned out solvent. The application was heard on Wednesday, 17th inst.

His LORDSHIP gave judgment as follows:—In a case two applications were made by shareholders seeking to have their names removed from the register of shareholders in the company on the ground substantially that the prospectus on the faith of which they had applied for shares contained statements which were false. The motions came on before me in July last. Witnesses were examined and cross-examined. Counsel for the company, in the course of the cross-examination of one of the applicant's witnesses, proposed to put in certain documents which were unstamped and which plainly required to be stamped. I pointed out the difficulty, having regard to section 14 of the Stamp Act, 1891. That section, so far as is material, is as follows:—"Upon the production of an instrument chargeable with any duty as evidence in any Court of civil jurisdiction in any part of the United Kingdom, or before any arbitrator or referee, notice shall be taken by the Judge, arbitrator, or referee of any omission or insufficiency of the stamp thereon, and if the instrument is one which may legally be stamped after the execution thereof it may, on payment to the officer of the Court whose duty it is to read the instrument, or to the arbitrator or referee, of the amount of the unpaid duty, and the penalty payable on stamping the same and of a further sum of one pound, be received in evidence, and all just exceptions on other grounds." Counsel thereupon communicated with his professional client, and, upon an undertaking being given by the company's solicitors to stamp a certain deed, the matter proceeded. His course was adopted with reference to several similar documents which the company's counsel desired to use in opposition to the case of the applicants. The deeds and documents thus tendered did not, in my opinion, assist the company. On the contrary, they helped the applicants. In the result I allowed the applications with costs. The solicitor, who was present in Court, seems to have been under the impression that he was not giving a personal undertaking, and he immediately endeavoured to be relieved from his undertaking. It is stated that to stamp the documents will cost several hundred pounds. When an application by the solicitors was made to me on July 25, ex parte, I declined to entertain it without notice being given to the company and to the Inland Revenue authorities. His application is reported in the "Weekly Notes for 99," p. 128. Certain communications have since taken place between the solicitors and the Inland Revenue authorities, but nothing more has been done. The orders are not and cannot be drawn up, although some months have elapsed. The applicants still remain on the register. Meanwhile, the company has been wound up by the Court on the ground of insolvency. Under these circumstances the applicants now apply by motion for directions that the orders made on the granting of the motions on July 21 may be drawn up forthwith, omitting from such orders the unstamped documents, the company's liquidator undertaking not to appeal from the orders, or in the alternative that the solicitors may be committed for contempt in making default in carrying out their undertaking to stamp the documents, or, as a further alternative, that the solicitors may be ordered to stamp such documents with the proper stamp duty within four days after service upon them of the order. The notice is served upon the company and its liquidator. They are willing to undertake to withdraw the pending appeals from my order, as they do not desire to prosecute those appeals. The other respondents are the solicitors who gave the undertaking and the Board of Commissioners for Inland Revenue. Notwithstanding the express language of section 14 of the Stamp Act, 1891, it is the settled practice to allow an unstamped document to be used upon the personal undertaking, not of the parties to the action, but of solicitors who are officers of the Court, to stamp it and to produce it so stamped before the order is drawn up. I have endeavoured to ascertain the origin of this practice. The earlier Stamp Acts, so far as my investigations have extended, do not contain any provision similar to section 14 of the Act of 1891. The Consolidation Act of 1854 (17 and 18 Vict., c. 83) only enacts in section 27 that every instrument liable to stamp duty shall be admitted in evidence in any criminal proceeding, although it may not be properly stamped. But by section 28 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, which received the Royal Assent two days later, it was enacted as follows:—"Upon the production of any document as evidence at the trial of any cause, it shall be the duty of the officer of the Court whose duty it is to read such document to call the attention of the Judge to any omission or insufficiency of the stamp, and the document if unstamped or not sufficiently stamped shall not be received in evidence until the whole or (as the case may be) the deficiency of the stamp duty and the penalty required by statute, together with the additional penalty of £1 shall have been paid." Section 29 gives certain consequential directions. These sections were repealed in 1870, and subsequently re-enacted in section 16 of the Stamp Act, 1870. This again was repealed and in substance re-enacted in 1891, the chief distinction being that the obligation now rests directly upon the Judge, and not upon any officer of the Court. I am indebted to Mr. Lavie, the Registrar, for a note of the case which I believe to be the origin of the settled practice to which I have referred. On the 20th of July, 1855, a cause of "Jennings v. Christopher" came on before Sir John Romilly on motion for judgment, and the following is an extract from the Registrar's minute, fol. 218:—"Collins proceeds to show his title. The agreement referred to. Mr. Roupell says it is not stamped. The solicitor tenders the money to the Registrar, who protests. Court reads the Act as to this clause, and is of opinion that, though under the clause in the Act making these selections applicable to all Courts of civil jurisdiction, this Act is applicable to this Court, yet that there is no officer of this Court now, unless it be the Clerk of Records and Writs, who answers the description of the officer of Court whose duty it is to read the documents, &c. Certainly not the Registrar. Mr. Blaxland, the solicitor for the plaintiff, undertaking that the proper stamp shall be paid and affixed, let this cause proceed. And at the end of the entry relating to the cause are the following:—See that memorandum is duly stamped before drawing up decree. The memorandum was duly stamped before it was entered in the order." It will be observed that the Court accepted the undertaking of the solicitor, without requiring any signature of the Registrar's book or other document. The advantages of the practice are obvious. It is not always easy to settle at once what is the amount of the stamp duty, and, moreover, it may well be that when the amount required is known the cash is not at the moment in Court. It would be in the last degree inconvenient and undesirable to direct an action to stand over in the middle of the trial in order that a document might be stamped. The Court, therefore, accepts the undertaking of its own officer that the document shall be stamped before the order is drawn up as satisfying the obligations of the statute. The Court looks to its own officer, and leaves that officer to claim indemnity from his own client. I am not aware of any difficulty having arisen until the present case. Sir John Romilly in 1862 refers to it as the ordinary course. See "Re Ward" (31 Beavan, p. 1), where he says, "The Court accepts the undertaking of solicitors to pay the penalty of not stamping an agreement and various other acts," and he proceeds to say:—"I am never informed whether they are performed or not, I have not the slightest doubt that they are performed in every case, but if it afterwards came to my knowledge that the act, without the performance of which the case could not have properly been heard, had not been performed, or that the money had not been paid, I should compel the solicitor, at the instance of anybody interested in the matter, to make good his undertaking or assertion on the faith of which the Court had acted; it is no answer to say that it was the duty of many other persons to look into the matter and see that the act was duly performed." See also "Seton on Decrees," 4th Ed., p. 26. In this state of circumstances it seems to me to be clear that an undertaking was given to the Court by the company's solicitor, acting through the member of their firm who was present in Court. This is not seriously disputed, for the application to be relieved from the undertaking pre-supposes that the undertaking was given. I think it is of the utmost importance that such an undertaking given by officers of the Court should not be released without the consent of the person or persons for whose benefit the undertaking was given. Those persons in the present case are the Commissioners for Inland Revenue. They, through their counsel, state that they have no power to waive the stamping of the documents, although they can and will in the present case waive penalties, and they insist for the protection of the Revenue that the undertaking given should be enforced. On the other hand, I think it is not just that the applicants, who have, by their own evidence, established a title to relief, should be prevented from obtaining relief by reason of the failure of their opponents or of their opponents' solicitors to stamp documents which were put in, not by the applicants, but by the opponents. If I make no order on the present motion, it may be that the applicants will have to pay several hundred pounds before they can get the order made by me in July last perfected. I think I shall be doing what is fair between the parties and right towards the Inland Revenue authorities by directing the order to be forthwith drawn up without entering the unstamped documents, the company undertaking to withdraw their appeals. I must order the solicitors upon their undertaking to cause these documents to be produced to Mr. King, the Registrar, at his room, properly stamped, within four days after service upon them of this order. It will be stated on the face of the order that the Inland Revenue Commissioners agree to waive penalties, and I shall expressly reserve liberty to the Commissioners to apply in case this order is not obeyed by the solicitors. The solicitors must pay the costs of the applicants of this motion. In point of form I think the motion should be headed "In the Matter of the Solicitors," and I direct it to be amended accordingly.

IN RE THE BERNICIA STEAMSHIP (LIMITED).*

Company—Memorandum of Association—Enlargement of.

Semble, the Court will sanction resolutions for the enlargement of the objects of a company under the Companies (Memorandum of Association) Act, 1890, only where there is no opposition to the petition.

This was a petition to obtain the sanction of the Court to resolutions that had been passed for the enlargement of the objects of the above company under the Companies (Memorandum of Association) Act, 1890. The company was formed to purchase and work a particular steamship, and on the sale or loss of that ship to acquire any other steamship. The statement of the objects in the original memorandum limited them in this way, "but there shall only be held one steamship at the same time." The company proposed to take power to hold and employ any number of ships. No shareholder opposed and the only creditor consented. The matter was argued Jan. 19 by Mr. Vernon Smith, Q.C., and Mr. A. Chitty on behalf of the company.

After stating the facts, MR. JUSTICE COVENS-HARDY said he thought this case was brought within the terms of the Companies (Memorandum of Association) Act, 1890, so that he had jurisdiction to make the order asked. But it remained to consider whether in his discretion he ought to make the order. He felt some difficulty because of the wide nature of the change proposed. It would turn a single-ship company into a company which might become owners of the whole fleet of the Cunard Company or of the P. and O. Company. Such a change was more usually and more properly effected by what was known as a reconstruction. When that course was adopted the Legislature had jealously guarded the interests of dissentient shareholders. No such protection was afforded under the Act of 1890. It seemed to him that the Court ought not to allow the Companies Act, 1862, to be evaded by means of an alteration in the memorandum of association. If, therefore, any shareholder had appeared to oppose the petition, he did not think he should have felt at liberty to confirm the special resolution. But there was no opposing shareholder. The only creditor consented. Nobody would be prejudiced. The heavy expense of reconstruction would be avoided. Under those circumstances he did not see any sufficient reason for refusing to make the order.

OVER V. HARWOOD.†

Vaccination—Proof of offence—Evidence, sufficiency of—Onus of proof.

This was a special case stated by six justices for the county of Surrey on the hearing of an information under section 31 of the Vaccination Act, 1867, charging the appellant with disobedience to an order made under that section and requiring him to cause a child of his to be vaccinated. On the hearing of the information the appellant was not present, but was represented by counsel. In order to prove the disobedience to the order the respondent, who was a vaccination officer appointed by the guardians of the Farnham Union, deposed that he had not received any certificate of successful vaccination of the child in question, nor any certificate that the child was unfit to be vaccinated, nor to be insusceptible to vaccination, and he produced the register of vaccinations kept by him. No evidence was submitted on behalf of the appellant, nor any other evidence on behalf of the prosecution. On behalf of the appellant it was submitted that the evidence given by the respondent was not sufficient proof that the appellant was guilty of the offence charged. On behalf of the respondent it was contended that the evidence adduced was sufficient proof that the appellant had not complied with the order requiring the vaccination of the child. The justices accepted the respondent's view, and convicted the appellant subject to the present case.

*Reported by D. FITZGERALD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

†Reported by A. F. JENKIN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. Schultess-Young appeared for the appellant; and Mr. Ryde for the respondent.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

MR. JUSTICE CHANNELL, after adverting to the manner in which the case was stated, said the substantial point, and the point intended to be raised, was whether there was, not sufficient evidence, for that was a question for the magistrates, but any evidence of disobedience to the order on the part of the defendant. The burden of proof was on the prosecution. It was not uncommon in modern Acts to insert provisions imposing the burden of proof on the defendant with reference to a negative. That, however, was not done in the case of the offence under consideration. Indeed, the words in the section, "or shall not be shown to be then unfit to be vaccinated, or to be insusceptible of vaccination," which seemed to throw the burden of proving unfitness for, or insusceptibility to, vaccination on the defendant, tended to show that it was not intended to throw the burden of proof on the defendant with reference to the matter now in question. How, then, was the fact that the child had not been vaccinated to be proved? It was a negative proposition. If the proceedings were of a civil character, that alone would throw the burden on the defendant. But that rule did not apply to criminal proceedings. Some evidence must, therefore, be given by the prosecutor, since the case did not come within the provisions of section 30 (2) of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, as to exceptions, provisos, excuses, and qualifications. It being then necessary that there should be some evidence that the child was not vaccinated, the question was what evidence was required. Very generally there was no way of proving a negative except by a presumption. In the present case there was machinery whereby if a child is vaccinated the fact has to be notified. If there was no notification, some one had omitted to do his duty. The fact, therefore, that there was no notification was, in his opinion, prima facie evidence of the negative proposition that the child was not vaccinated. It was said that it was not the best evidence that could have been adduced. But the Court had nothing to do with that. If the public vaccinator had been called, it would still have been necessary to rely on presumption. The justices might have refused to be satisfied with the presumption arising on the vaccination officer's evidence, and have required further evidence. But the Court could not interfere with their decision on that matter.

MR. JUSTICE BUCKNILL concurred.

MAUDE V. BROOK.*

Master and Servant—Master's liability to servant

—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897—"Scaffolding," what is.

Loose trestles, with boards laid across them to enable plasterers to get to the top of the walls and ceilings of a room, held to be "scaffolding" (Collins, L.J., dissenting).

This was an appeal from the award of Judge Greenhow, the Leeds County Court Judge, in proceedings to assess compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. The respondent, Ann Maude, was the widow of a workman, Jeremiah Maude, who at the time of the accident was in the employment of the appellant, J. Herbert Brook. The case raised two questions—first, whether the deceased man was employed in the "construction" of a building; and, secondly, whether the building was being constructed by means of a "scaffolding" within the meaning of section 7, subsection 1, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. The appellant, who was a master plasterer, was building two villas in November, 1898, and the deceased man was employed with other workmen on the inside plastering work of the villas. As will be seen below, it was disputed that the appellant was himself building the villas, but the Court said that it must be taken that the appellant was the builder. The villas were more than 30ft. high. To enable the plasterers to get up to the top of the walls and ceilings of the rooms loose trestles with boards laid across them were used. The trestles were about 4ft. high, and some of the workmen were at the time of the accident working on the trestles. The deceased man was on November 24, 1898, standing on the top landing of one of the houses, but not on a trestle, plastering the walls and smoothing the plaster down with a hand "float." By some means, of which no evidence was given, he fell over the staircase where the banisters had not then been put up and was killed. At the time of the accident the house had been roofed in, and the outside scaffolding had been taken down, but the inside plastering work had not been completed. The respondent having claimed compensation under the Act, the appellant in his answer stated that he denied liability to pay compensation upon the ground that "the employment of the said Jeremiah Maude was not an employment to which the Act applies." At the conclusion of the evidence before the County Court Judge it was submitted on behalf of the present appellant that there was nothing being constructed or repaired by means of a scaffolding; that the trestles and boards did not constitute a scaffolding; that the building was complete, the roof being on; and that plastering was not part of the construction of a house. "Wood v. Walsh" ([1899], 1 Q.B., 1,009) was referred to. The County Court Judge was of opinion that the plastering of the walls and ceilings of the unfinished house was part of its construction, and that the arrangement of trestles and boards, although inside the house, was a "scaffolding" within the Act. It formed a platform used by the workmen engaged in the higher plastering to reach their work. Although the deceased man was not using the scaffolding himself and did not fall from it, he (the County Court Judge) was of opinion that the deceased man died from injury by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment in a building exceeding 30ft. in height (which was not contested) which was being constructed by means of a scaffolding, and that his widow was entitled to compensation. He accordingly made an award in her favour for £296. The appellant gave notice of appeal upon the grounds:—(1) That the employment of the deceased was not an employment to which the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, applied; (2) that the appellant was not the undertaker within the meaning of the Act; and (3) that there was no evidence in support of the findings of the County Court Judge.

Mr. RUEGG, Q.C. (Mr. A. Powell with him), for the appellant, said that there was one ground of appeal—namely, that the appellant was not the “undertaker” within the meaning of section 7 of the Workmen’s Compensation Act, 1897. The point was that the appellant was not the builder of these houses, but merely a master plasterer who did the plastering work, and, therefore, did not come within the definition of “undertakers” in section 7, subsection 2, which meant, in the case of a building, “the persons undertaking the construction, repair, or demolition.” It was said that that point was not taken before the County Court Judge.

Mr. J. A. COMPTON, who appeared for the respondent, said that in his opening statement to the County Court Judge, as appeared from the Judge’s notes, he said that the appellant was building the two houses, and as that did not seem to be disputed no evidence was called upon it. The point was not specifically raised in the answer to the claim for compensation, nor was it taken before the County Court Judge. If it had been taken before the Judge, he was instructed that the respondent could have called evidence to the effect that the appellant was building these houses himself upon his own land.

Mr. RUEGG said that the answer of the appellant to the claim for compensation raised the point, because it raised every condition necessary to bring the employment within the Act, one of the conditions being that the employment must be by the person undertaking the construction of the building. It was not necessary to take it before the County Court Judge, because it lay upon the respondent to bring his case within the Act, and it was open now to the appellant to show that the respondent had not done so.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH.—We do not think that the appellant can raise that point now. It was open to him to raise it before the County Court Judge, but he did not do so. If he had raised it there the respondent could have called evidence with the view of showing that the appellant was himself building these houses. That being so, the point is not open now.

Mr. RUEGG said that the two other questions were whether, at the time of the accident, the building was being “constructed,” and, if so, whether it was being constructed by means of a “scaffolding.” It was not now contended that plastering could not be construction, it being a question of fact for the Judge in each case. But the building was not being constructed by means of a “scaffolding.” The Legislature never intended two trestles and a board across the top placed inside a room to be a “scaffolding.” The word “scaffolding” was used in its ordinary and popular sense as a structure of poles, uprights, boards, &c., fastened together. It must, as Lord Justice Collins said in “Hoddinott v. Newton, Chambers, and Co.” ([1899], 1 Q.B., 1,018), be interpreted by reference to the nature of the work for which the Legislature contemplated that it was to be used; that was, the construction, repair, or demolition of a building, exceeding 30ft. in height, as a whole. No one would in ordinary language say that these trestles and boards were a scaffolding. The danger contemplated was that incidental to dealing with a building more than 30ft. high by means of a scaffolding adequate to such a building. The learned Judge was therefore wrong.

Mr. A. POWELL followed on the same side. The scaffolding must be one necessary for the particular building under construction. The building 30ft. high was the dominating element. The scaffolding must be of such a height and of such a nature as to enable the building 30ft. high to be constructed. Why otherwise should a minimum height of 30ft. be fixed for the building?

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH.—I can put many conundrums upon this Act as good as that. (Laughter.)

Mr. POWELL said that it seemed that the provision as to the scaffolding and the building 30ft. in height came from the schedule to the Notice of Accidents Act, 1894, and section 23, subsection 2, of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS.—Would a board placed across two chairs in a drawing-room be a scaffolding? The Legislature could not have intended such an arrangement to be a scaffolding.

Mr. J. A. COMPTON, for the respondent, contended that there was evidence upon which the County Court Judge could find that the arrangement of trestles and boards was a scaffolding. It was a question of fact in each case for the Judge. It was necessary to have some sort of scaffolding in the room to do the plastering work, and as it was impossible to have an ordinary scaffolding with poles, an arrangement of trestles and boards was used. It was a mere question of convenience which was used. A plasterers’ scaffolding was well known in the trade. He referred to the definition of “trestle” in Webster’s Dictionary and in the Century and Imperial Dictionaries.

Mr. RUEGG, Q.C., replied.

The COURT dismissed the appeal, LORD JUSTICE COLLINS dissenting.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that they must take it that the appellant was the builder of these houses. They were not completed, and the deceased man was engaged in doing plastering work. In his opinion the County Court Judge was justified in holding that at the time of the accident the building was being “constructed.” The next question was whether the building was being constructed by means of a “scaffolding.” The Act required that the building should be 30ft. high, but there was nothing in the Act requiring the scaffolding to be 30ft. high, nor anything limiting the accident to a fall off the scaffolding. It had been held that it was immaterial whether the scaffolding was inside or outside the building. Suppose a house was being built by means of trestles and boards outside, with a ladder to give access thereto, would not a County Court Judge be entitled to find that the house was being constructed by means of a scaffolding? This Court had always refused to give a definition of the word “scaffolding.” The Court could only say in each case whether there was any evidence to entitle the County Court Judge to find that the arrangement was a scaffolding. It seemed to him that if trestles and boards were used outside a house for the purpose of constructing it, there would be evidence that the trestles and boards formed a scaffolding. He could not say as a matter of law that if they were used inside the house for the purpose of completing it they were not a scaffolding. There was nothing in the Act requiring the scaffolding to be one composed of poles and supports. Therefore he could not say that there was no evidence to justify the County Court Judge in finding that this arrangement was a scaffolding. A good many examples of possibly ridiculous results from so holding were put in the argument. All he could say was that in his experience of construing the Act during the last year and a quarter there had been some apparently ridiculous results following from the language used in the Act. But there was the Act. In his opinion the appeal should be dismissed.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY concurred. In his opinion, in construing the Act, they were not at liberty to confine the word “scaffolding” to the most usual form of scaffolding. A thing might be a scaffolding whether it was a usual or an unusual arrangement. A thing might scaffolding though no poles were used in JUSTICE COLLINS said that he regretted that he was not able to agree with his brethren. He could not do so entirely with his judgment in "Hoddinott v. Chambers, and Co." Having carefully reconsidered the matter, he adhered to what he had said in that case, and he did not think it necessary to repeat it. His safe rule was to give to the words in question their ordinary popular meaning. The words must be taken in their context. He could not think that a scaffold upon two trestles in a room came within the meaning of the word "scaffolding" as used in this section. He did not think that any ordinary uninstructed person would understand the word "scaffolding" to mean a scaffolding of poles and supports used in the construction, repair, or demolition of a building. In "Hoddinott v. Newton, Chambers, and Co." he accepted the responsibility of giving some meaning to the word "scaffolding" without attempting to define its exact meaning. In "Hoddinott v. Newton, Chambers, and Co." he attempted to state the considerations which he had taken into account in ascertaining whether a scaffolding was or was not a scaffolding. It was his opinion that his view was supported by the decision in "Wood v. Walsh" ([1899], 1 Q.B., 1,009). In that case, workmen, who were painting the outside of a building, used ladders for the purpose, and a board was placed across the end of one of the ladders, the board resting on a window-sill. If the trestles and ladders were a scaffolding in the present case, he did not think the arrangement in "Wood v. Walsh" was a scaffolding. Lord Justice A. L. Smith said that the ladder was not a scaffolding, as to the arrangement of a plank attached to a ladder whether it was a scaffolding was a question of fact, and the arbitrator found that it was not a scaffolding. In "Hoddinott v. Chambers, and Co." there was an arrangement of boards resting on ledgers secured to iron inside a building. Lord Justice A. L. Smith said that there was evidence that the arrangement was a scaffolding, though it was not necessary to decide whether it was or was not. He (Lord Justice Collins) was of opinion that it was not a scaffolding, and he thought that Lord Justice Bouverie took the same view as he did, because Justice said that the words construction, scaffolding, should not be considered separately together, for they had a mutual bearing upon each other. That case afforded some guidance as to the meaning of a scaffolding. The result of holding that the arrangement of trestles and boards to be a scaffolding was a strange indeed. It was admitted that the arrangement would cover the case of a workman employed in building away from the scaffolding. It must be as if a house was completed except the inside plaster, and if only one plasterer was on a board upon two trestles finishing the plastering of a room, a workman, who stumbled when going up, was injured, could claim compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act. That would be a strange result. The word "scaffolding" meant, in his opinion, one system of scaffolding, capable of being used for the whole of the building or the whole of the repair of the building. JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that he wished to make the observation. In "Hoddinott v. Newton, Chambers, and Co." he had merely said that, in his opinion, there was evidence upon which the County Judge was entitled to find that the structure was a scaffolding. So also in "Wood v. Walsh," he merely declined to interfere with the finding of the County Court Judge.

THE QUEEN V. THE JUSTICES OF SOMERSET.*

Justices—Appeals to quarter sessions—Notice of appeal.

Personal service of a notice of appeal to quarter sessions from a conviction under the Licensing Acts is not necessary.

In this case cause was shown against a mandamus calling upon the justices, sitting in quarter sessions, to hear and determine an appeal from a conviction under the Licensing Acts. Mr. John Talbot was convicted at the petty sessions held at Kilmersdon of unlawfully permitting drunkenness upon licensed premises. The information was preferred by Walter Rawlings, the superintendent of police for the division of Frome. On the day when the information was heard, Rawlings was away on his holiday, and he was represented at the hearing by the superintendent of a neighbouring division, a man named Rutherford. At the conclusion of the case, Mr. Talbot's solicitor informed Rutherford that he intended to appeal. Rutherford thereupon undertook to see that the notice of appeal duly came to the hands of Rawlings. On the day following, Rutherford left the notice of appeal at the police-station at Frome, with instructions that it should be brought to the notice of Rawlings. The notice was left in Rawlings's office awaiting his return, which did not take place until eight days after the conviction. On the hearing of the appeal, an objection was taken on the ground that the notice of appeal had not been duly served upon "the other party" in accordance with section 31 (2) of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, which requires that the appellant shall, "within seven days after the day on which the said decision of the Court was given, give notice of appeal by serving on the other party . . . notice in writing of his intention to appeal . . ." The justices, the chairman of whom was Sir Edward Fry, being of opinion that the service required by section 31 (2) was a personal service, refused to hear the appeal.

Mr. F. E. WEATHERS, in showing cause, referred to subsection 7 of section 31, which provides that "every notice in writing required by the section to be given by an appellant . . . may be transmitted as a registered letter by post in the ordinary way, and shall be deemed to have been served at the time when it would be delivered in the ordinary course of post," and argued that if this form of service were not adopted, the service must be personal. The service on Rutherford was not effective, because, though he acted as an advocate for Rawlings at the hearing at petty sessions, his representation of Rawlings ended with the hearing and he therefore had no authority to accept service on his behalf, see "The Queen v. the Justices of Oxfordshire" ([1893], 2 Q.B., 149).

Mr. GARLAND, in support of the rule, contended that personal service was not necessary. He cited "The Queen v. the Justices of Essex" ([1892], 1 Q.B., 490); "The Queen v. the Justices of Yorkshire, North Riding" (7 Q.B., 154); and "The Queen v. the Freemen of Leicester" (15 Q.B., 671). He stated that those cases were not cited to the justices.

The COURT made the rule absolute.

MR. JUSTICE CHANNELL said that the history of the case was that the cases cited in support of the rule were not brought to the attention of the Court below, and they had consequently held that personal service was necessary. In so holding they were wrong, and, as they had based their decision upon an erroneous point of law, the mandamus must go. If they had merely held that there was no service, this Court could not have interfered with their decision.

MR. JUSTICE BUCKNILL concurred.

THE LONDON, BRINGTON, AND SOUTH COAST RAILWAY COMPANY V. FAIRBROTHER.*

Justices—Jurisdiction—Bona fide question of right.

The Railways Regulation Act, 1840, enables justices to try a question of right arising in connexion with a prosecution for wilful trespass thereunder.

This was a case stated by justices of Surrey upon an information laid by the railway company (the appellants) against the respondent for trespassing upon premises, known as the station approach, at the appellants' station at Dorking, and for refusing to quit the same on being requested so to do by a properly-qualified official of the company, contrary to the Railways Regulation Act, 1840, section 16. The justices dismissed the information on the ground that they had no jurisdiction to hear it, the respondent having, as they found, raised a bona fide question of right. The respondent is a cab-driver, and on July 1 last he drove his cab up the approach road to a place in front of the booking-office and refused to go, saying that he had as much right to be there as any one else. At the hearing of the information it was alleged on behalf of the railway company that the road in question was a private road, and a conveyance was produced in support of their title. The solicitor who appeared for the respondent called no evidence, but contended that the road in question was one over which there was a public right of way. Section 16 of the Railways Regulation Act, 1840, provides, so far as is material to this case, as follows:—"If any person . . . shall wilfully trespass upon any railway, or any of the stations or other works or premises connected therewith, and shall refuse to quit the same upon request to him made by any officer or agent of the company, every person so offending . . . shall . . . when convicted before" a justice of the peace " (who is hereby authorized and required, upon complaint to him upon oath, to take cognisance thereof, and to act summarily in the premises), shall, in the discretion of such justice, forfeit to her Majesty any sum not exceeding £5. . . ."

MR. GEORGE ELLIOTT, on behalf of the railway company, contended that, as the Act which gave the justices jurisdiction was in such terms that it was impossible for them to hear and determine the information without trying the question of title, it necessarily conferred upon them the jurisdiction to try such question. He cited "Foulger v. Steadman" (L.R., 8 Q.B., 65).

The respondent was not represented.

THE MAYOR, &C., OF SOUTHEND-ON-SEA V. DAVIS.*

Local Government—By-law—Validity.

This was an appeal by case stated from justices of Southend-on-Sea. An information was preferred by the appellants against the respondent charging him with unlawfully using within the borough of Southend-on-Sea an organ worked by steam, contrary to one of the by-laws in force within the borough. The question raised by the case was whether the by-law under which the information was preferred was reasonable and valid. The by-law was as follows:—"No organ or other musical instrument worked by steam or other mechanical means, nor any steam whistle or steam horn, shall be used within the borough, provided always that this by-law shall not apply to any locomotive or steam engine in use on any railway within the borough nor to any steam whistle or steam trumpet within the meaning of the Factories (Steam Whistles) Act, 1878." The by-law was made under the provisions of the Southend-on-Sea Corporation Act, 1895, section 44 of which provides:—"The powers conferred upon the corporation by the Municipal Corporations Acts to make and enforce by-laws for the good rule and government of the borough shall be deemed to include the power to make and enforce by-laws to regulate, or if the council think fit to prohibit, the use of any organ or other musical instrument worked by steam or other mechanical means, or any steam whistle or horn within the borough, provided always that this section shall not apply to any locomotive or steam engine in use on any railway within the borough." The respondent is a travelling showman, and in September last he erected in a field within the borough a round-about worked by steam, to which was attached an organ, also worked by steam. The organ was in the centre of a field 116 yards from a public road, and played from 7 a.m. until 9 30 p.m. The justices held that the by-law was unreasonable and invalid, and on that ground refused to convict the respondent.

MR. MACMORRAN, Q.C. (with whom was Mr. Herbert Smith), for the appellants, argued that the by-law, being in the terms of the Act of Parliament, could not be impeached for unreasonableness.

MR. W. H. STEVENSON contended that the effect of the local Act was to empower the local authority to make such by-laws with respect to musical instruments worked by mechanical means as could be made under the Municipal Corporations Acts, and that such by-laws must accordingly be limited to the purpose of providing for the good rule and government of the borough. The terms of the by-law in question were large enough to include the case of a man amusing himself with a musical box in his private house. That was manifestly not required for the good rule and government of the borough, and the by-law was, therefore, invalid. He cited "Kruse v. Johnson" ([1898], 2 Q.B., 91).

The COURT allowed the appeal, remitting the case to the justices, with the opinion that the by-law was valid.

MR. JUSTICE CHANNELL said that section 44 of the local Act gave the local authority large powers with reference to mechanical musical instruments, and it was referred to the local authority to decide whether such musical instruments were a nuisance, and whether it was necessary to prohibit them. If the by-law had confined itself to steam organs, no one could have doubted its validity or reasonableness. He thought it was unfortunate that the proviso in favour of whistles on locomotives had not been extended to small mechanical instruments in private houses. But the omission to make such a proviso did not render the by-law unreasonable.

MR. JUSTICE BUCKNILL concurred.

HURBALL V. EVERITT AND SONS (LIMITED).*

Practice—Appeal—Security for costs—Arbitration under Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

Where an award was made in favour of the employers, but execution stayed pending an appeal, the Court refused to order security for costs.

This was an application by employers for an order for security for the costs of a workman's appeal from an award of a County Court Judge in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act.

MR. ROWLATT appeared for the employers in support of the application. The workman was without sufficient means to pay the employers' costs of the appeal if it was unsuccessful, and he was being assisted in these proceedings by a number of workmen.

MR. SYLVAIN MAYER appeared for the workman, who had made an affidavit stating that he was fighting the case on his own account. A point of law had been raised and argued at the hearing of the arbitration, and the County Court Judge, in making an award in favour of the employers with costs, had ordered a stay of execution pending an appeal, so that the point of law might be decided by the Court of Appeal.

The COURT dismissed the application.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said he thought this case ought to be treated as an exception to the general rule. The workman appeared to be without means to pay the costs if he failed in his appeal, but the County Court Judge had ordered a stay of execution pending an appeal, and had thereby, in effect, invited the parties to come to this Court to have a point of law determined. Under these circumstances he thought the workman ought to be allowed to appeal without giving security.

PALMER V. SNOW.†

Sunday Observance—29 Car. II., c. 7—Hairdresser.

A barber is not within the provisions of 29 Car. II., c. 7, against carrying on business on Sunday.

This was an appeal by case stated from the stipendiary magistrate for South Staffordshire. An information was preferred by the respondent against the appellant charging him that, being a tradesman of Wolverhampton, to wit, a hairdresser, he did exercise worldly labour, business, or work of his ordinary calling upon the Lord's Day, contrary to the provisions of the statute 29 Car. II., c. 7. The statute named (section 1) provides as follows:—"No tradesman, artificer, workman, or labourer or other person whatsoever, shall do or exercise any worldly labour, business, or work of his ordinary callings upon the Lord's Day or any part thereof (works of necessity and charity only excepted)." The appellant is a hairdresser and it was proved that on Sunday, September 24 last, he kept open his shop and shaved several customers and cut the hair of others. No articles were sold or purchased in the shop. The magistrate, being of opinion that the appellant had exercised his "calling" or "business" for gain or profit, and that he was a "tradesman," convicted him, fining him 2s. 6d. and costs.

MR. M. SHEARMAN, for the appellant, contended that the Act did not apply to barbers or hairdressers, inasmuch as they were not ejus dem generis with "tradesman, artificer, workman, or labourer." The business or profession of a barber, he said, was one that was well known and, at the date of the Act, was one of more importance than it was now, associated as it was with that of surgery. If the Legislature had desired to prohibit this business on Sunday, it would have expressly included it among the prohibited trades and occupations. Barbers were incorporated as a craft in the reign of Henry IV., and surgeons were enjoined for their protection against "blood letting" and the "feet or craft of barbery or shaving." A tradesman, he argued, was a person who dealt in goods in retail, and an artificer was one who worked upon raw materials. A farmer was not within the Act, "Reg. v. Silvester" (33 L.J., M.C., 79), nor was the owner of a stage coach, "Sandiman v. Breach" (7 B. and C., 96).

MR. DICKENS, Q.C. (Mr. William Shakespeare with him), for the respondent, contended that the appellant came within the words "artificer, workman, or labourer," being a person who earned his living with the work of his hands. He also contended that he was a tradesman in the sense that a blacksmith was a tradesman, because he plied a trade. He cited "Phillips v. Innes" (4 C. and F., 234).

MR. SHEARMAN, in reply, quoted a passage from Julius Caesar where the cobbler says:—"All that I live by is, with the awl. I meddle with no tradesman's matters."

The COURT allowed the appeal.

MR. JUSTICE CHANNELL said that all that was necessary for them to say in this case was that a barber was not a tradesman within the Act, because of the way in which the summons was framed. But the Court were not satisfied to base their judgment upon that point only, because it might in that case be assumed that they thought that the appellant's business came within some one of the remaining words. They did not, however, think so. The Act in question differed from the Scotch Act under which "Phillips v. Innes" was decided, because the Scotch Act began by saying that no ordinary labour or handicraft should be carried on on Sunday. If that provision had been in force in England the barber might have come within it. The English Act only related to certain specified persons. The words "or other persons whatsoever," as had already been decided, were to be read ejus dem generis with the preceding words. With regard to the word "tradesman" he was strongly of opinion that though the word tradesman might often be used as distinguished from gentleman or a professional man so as to include barber, yet that the word was not so used in the statute, but that it was intended to mean a person who carried on the business of buying and selling. "Artificer" meant somebody who made something. The remaining words "workman or labourer," though they might possibly apply to an assistant, involved the idea of a person employed by some one else and did not, therefore, apply to the appellant. The consideration urged by counsel that the business of a barber was when the Act was passed a well-known business and one of much more importance than it was at the present time lent additional force to the argument that a barber was not one of the persons to whom the Act was intended to apply.

MR. JUSTICE BUCKNILL gave judgment to the same effect.

SAFFERY V. MAYER.*

Gaming—Betting—Gaming Act, 1892—Partnership agreement to back horses.

In this case Mr. J. J. Saffery, as trustee of the estate of Claude Vautin, a bankrupt, claimed to recover the sum of £433 14s. 9d., the principal and interest due under three promissory notes for £150 each given to Vautin by the defendant Albert Mayer, of 13, Buckingham Palace-road. The defence was that the notes in question were given in respect of a gambling transaction, and therefore the plaintiff could not recover.

Mr. Atherley-Jones, Q.C., and Mr. H. Kisch appeared for the plaintiff; and Mr. Abinger was for the defendant.

The action, which was set down for trial under Order XIV., was before his Lordship on the 27th, and was reported in The Times of January 29. His Lordship reserved judgment.

Mr. ATHERLEY-JONES said that the parties in this case were on the point of coming to terms, and he suggested, therefore, that his Lordship should postpone giving judgment.

MR. JUSTICE DARLING said that as the matter was one of some public interest, he would give his judgment now, and the parties could come to what terms they liked afterwards. The action was brought by the plaintiff as trustee in the bankruptcy of Vautin against the defendant on three promissory notes. These notes amounted to £400, and the defence was that the notes were given in respect of a contract which was void under the statutes against wagering. The first statute to be considered was 8 and 9 Vict., c. 109, section 18, which ran as follows:—"And be it enacted that all contracts or agreements, whether by parole or in writing, by way of gaming or wagering shall be null and void: and that no suit shall be brought or maintained in any Court of law or equity for recovering any sum of money . . . which shall have been deposited in the hands of any person to abide the event on which any wager shall have been made." That being the law the cases of "Rosewarne v. Billing" (15 C.B., N.S., 316) and "Read v. Anderson" (10 Q.B.D., 100) were decided. In consequence of the decision in the latter case the Gaming Amendment Act, 1892, was passed, and that statute provided that "any promise, express or implied, to pay any person any sum of money paid by him under, or in respect of, any contract or agreement rendered null and void by the Act 8 and 9 Vict., c. 109, or to pay any sum of money by way of commission, fee, reward, or otherwise in respect of any such contract, or of any services relating thereto or in connexion therewith, shall be null and void, and no action shall be brought to recover such sum of money." The difference was that not only contracts to pay but promises to pay money under or in respect of any such contracts were rendered null and void. In this case the defendant Mayer thought he had discovered an infallible system for winning money by backing horses, and he imparted his discovery to Vautin and go Vautin to supply £500 for working the system, and both of them were to share in the profits. At first money was made and then it was lost. Vautin, after a time, wanted his money back, and he wrote on June 1, 1897, to Mayer asking if he was not right in saying that they entered this concern on joint account, and he wanted his share, £250, back again. His Lordship found as a fact that £500 was advanced by Vautin to a fund for the joint benefit of the defendant and himself, and was in the nature of partnership capital. The £100 subsequently advanced was a loan, and that of course the plaintiff could recover. His Lordship referred to the cases of "De Mattos v. Benjamin" (63 L.J., Q.B., 248) and "Tatam v. Reeve" ([1893] 1 Q.B., 44), and said that the question was whether the transaction came within the Act of 1892 as being "in respect of" a contract null and void under the earlier Act. He came to the conclusion that it did not come within the Act, and that the money was not paid "in respect of" any null or void contract. The money was paid in respect of an agreement between the parties that they should enter into a partnership to back horses. He therefore thought that Vautin would have been able to have recovered this money from the defendant if the action had been between them.

No application for judgment was made.

Order of Byrne, J. (15 The Times L.R., 358), varied.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice Byrne's, reported in 15 The Times L.R., 358. The question raised by this appeal was whether certain costs of the railway company incurred in defending an action in relation to the cost of constructing the line were working expenses of the railway or other proper outgoings in respect of its undertaking within section 4 of the Railway Companies Act, 1867. That section enabled judgment creditors of a railway company to obtain the appointment of a receiver, and, if necessary, of a manager of the undertaking of the company, and it continued as follows:—"And all money received by such receiver or manager shall, after due provision for the working expenses of the railway and other proper outgoings in respect of the undertaking, be applied and distributed under the direction of the Court in payment of the debts of the company, and otherwise according to the rights and priorities of the persons for the time being interested therein." On September 8, 1897, an order was made under this section upon the petition of the Great Central Railway Company, a judgment creditor, appointing a receiver and manager of the undertaking of the Wrexham Company, and directing the receiver out of the moneys to be received by him to pay the costs of all parties to the petition, and the order also directed inquiries as to the debts of the company, and as to rights and priorities, in accordance with the terms of the section.

No. 12.—VOL. XVI.

*Reported by H. B. HEMMING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Prior to this order an action had been commenced by the executors and trustees of Mr. Piercy, the contractor for the line, against the company for the balance of the cost of constructing the line, and on July 25, 1897, this action was referred to arbitration, and the arbitration was pending at the date of the receivership order. On November 22, 1897, upon the application of the Piercy trustees, an order was made giving them liberty, notwithstanding the order of September 8, 1897, to carry on the action and proceed with the arbitration, including liberty to the company to continue to attend the arbitration proceedings, but no order was made as to the company's costs. In March, 1898, the award was made and judgment was entered up in the terms of the award, which was to the effect that the company should pay to the Piercy trustees £23,643 cash, and also certain sums of stock and debenture stock, each party to pay his own costs. The effect of the award was that the claims of the Piercy trustees were cut down to a considerable extent. An application was then made by the company and its directors, and the solicitor for the company, that the costs up to September 8, 1897, and also subsequently thereto, incurred in the defence of the action and arbitration should be treated by the receiver as proper outgoings of the undertaking, and should be payable in priority to the claims of the debenture stockholders of the company. Mr. Justice Byrne said that the test to be applied in such cases was whether the costs incurred were "working expenses or other proper outgoings," without which the railway could not be carried on. In the present case his Lordship thought it was obvious that the undertaking could have been carried on just as well and effectually if the company had not resisted the claim made in the action. He did not say that it was not right for the company to resist the claim, or that the costs of so doing might not hereafter be properly provided for. But he held that these costs were not proper outgoings within the meaning of section 4. This application for the payment of these costs must therefore fail. The applicants appealed.

Mr. C. A. Russell, Q.C., and Mr. R. J. Parker were for the appellants; Mr. Neville, Q.C., and Mr. F. Thompson were for the Piercy trustees; Mr. Whinney was for the debenture holders; Mr. Mark Romer was for the Great Central Railway Company.

The appeal was argued on January 23 last.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said that the Railway Companies Act, 1867, contained no mention of costs, yet there must be power in the Court to give costs in proceedings under the Act, otherwise the costs of a petition for a receiver under section 4 could not be provided for. But ever since the passing of the Act orders had been made for the payment of those costs, and an order had been made in this case for payment of the costs of the petition. That section was passed upon the footing that the Court had jurisdiction to order payment of the costs of the proceedings thereby directed. If there ever was any doubt as to the jurisdiction of the Court to order payment of the costs of proceedings under an Act of Parliament where not expressly authorized to do so that doubt was removed by the Judicature Act, 1890, section 5, as explained in "In re Fisher" ([1894] 1 Ch., 450). The question in this case turned upon what was the real meaning of the order of November 22, 1897, giving the company liberty to continue to attend the arbitration proceedings notwithstanding the receivership order. In his Lordship's opinion the real meaning of that order was not merely that the company should attend the proceedings, but that it should fight the claim of the Piercy trustees on behalf of everybody instead of the claim being contested in Chambers. The award was made with the result that the claim of the Piercy trustees was considerably reduced, but the arbitrator made no order as to costs, leaving the parties to pay their own costs. The question was how were the costs of the company to be obtained. The company and its solicitor applied that these costs might be regarded as proper outgoings of the undertaking. Mr. Justice Byrne was unable to take that view, and this Court felt the same difficulty. These costs were certainly not working expenses of the railway, and, without going so far as to say, as Lord Justice Kay said, in effect, in "In re the Eastern and Midlands Railways Company" (45 Ch.D., 367, 378) that "other proper outgoings" meant the same thing as working expenses, it would be unhelpfully stretching the words of section 4 to say that proper outgoings included the costs of defending an action by the contractor for his charges in connexion with the construction of the railway. But having regard to the view already expressed as to the effect of the order giving the company leave to attend the arbitration proceedings, he was of opinion that the order of Mr. Justice Byrne should be varied by adding a declaration that the costs incurred by the company since the date of the receivership order in defending the action and the proceedings consequent thereon ought to be treated as incurred in the prosecution of the inquiries directed by that order and were incurred for the benefit of the debenture-holders and other creditors of the company, and ought to be paid, with the costs of the application, in priority to any future payments to such debenture-holders or other creditors.

STRAID V. TILLOTSON AND ANOTHER.*

Fishery—Salmon Fishery Act, 1873, sec. 22.

Taking fish which are in a dying condition, otherwise than with a properly licensed instrument, is an offence within the Salmon Fishery Act, 1873, sec. 22.

This was an appeal by case stated from justices of the West Riding of Yorkshire. An information was preferred by the appellant against the respondents charging them with taking trout by means other than a properly licensed instrument, to wit, by taking the same with their hands, contrary to section 22 of the Salmon Fishery Act, 1873, as extended to trout or char by section 7 of the Freshwater Fisheries Act, 1878. Section 22 of the Salmon Fishery Act, 1873, enacts, so far as is material to this case, that, in all fishery districts in which licenses are payable, "any person fishing for or taking, killing, or attempting to take or kill, salmon by any means whatsoever other than a properly licensed fishing weir, fishing mill dam, fixed engine, instrument, net, or device for catching or facilitating the catching of salmon, or assisting any such person in so doing, shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding £5." The respondent took from Eller Beck, a tributary of the river Aire, 20 trout (which were apparently poisoned, but still alive). They subsequently sold a portion of the fish, which were found to be unfit for food. There was not sufficient proof to show how the fish had become in a dying condition, or that, apart from taking the fish with their hands, the respondents had in any way been concerned in killing them. The justices were of opinion that, in the absence of evidence to connect the respondents with having poisoned the water, or with having in some way been concerned in killing the fish, the fact that the respondents were proved to have taken the fish out of the water with their hands did not, under the circumstances, constitute an offence, the fish being in a dying state at the time, and they accordingly dismissed the summons.

Mr. H. T. WADDY, for the appellant, said that, if it were held that the Act did not apply because the fish were in a dying condition, persons who took fish out of a river, which had previously been poisoned by other persons with whom they were in collusion, could not be proceeded against, in spite of the fact that they were clearly doing a thing which was within the mischief of the Act. He cited "Gazard v. Cooke" (55 J.P., 102).

Mr. WALTER STEWART, for the respondents, contended that the justices were right in holding that the Act did not apply, because the removal of dying fish from a stream, so far from being detrimental to the fishery, would be beneficial to the surviving fish.

The COURT allowed the appeal, remitting the case to the justices with the opinion that the taking of dying fish was within the Act.

MR. JUSTICE CHANNELL said that if the justices found that the respondents took the fish innocently, without having been concerned in poisoning them, they would be justified in treating the offence as one not requiring punishment; but he was of opinion, having regard to the argument of the learned counsel for the appellant, that the taking of dying fish was within the Act.

MR. JUSTICE BUCKNILL concurred.

LLANDUDNO URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL V. HUGHES.*

Hawker—Licence—Exemptions—Hawkers Act, 1888, sec. 3 (3)—Markets and Fairs Clauses Act, 1847, sec. 13.

This was an appeal by case stated from justices of Carnarvon. An information was preferred by the appellants against the respondent charging him that, after a market-place had been opened for public use within the limits of the district of the Llandudno Urban District Council, he did unlawfully expose for sale in a street within the limits aforesaid, and not in his own dwelling-place or shop, certain articles, to wit, potatoes, in respect of which tolls were authorized to be taken in the market, contrary to section 13 of the Markets and Fairs Clauses Act, 1847. The section referred to is as follows:—"After the market-place is open for public use every person other than a licensed hawkker who shall sell or expose for sale in any place within the prescribed limits, except in his own dwelling-place or shop, any articles in respect of which tolls are by special Act authorized to be taken in the market, shall for every such offence be liable to a penalty not exceeding 40s." It appeared from the case that the respondent was a person who followed the trade of selling and hawking potatoes, vegetables, and fruits, and had for many years followed that trade without holding a hawkker's licence, as he was authorized to do by section 3 (3) of the Hawkkes Act, 1888. In consequence of a notice published by the appellants on July 14, 1899, and before the alleged offence, he took out a hawkker's licence. The justices held that the respondent was within the exemption in section 13, and dismissed the information.

Mr. E. H. LLOYD, for the appellants, contended that, inasmuch as by virtue of section 3 (3) of the Hawkkes Act the respondent was not a hawkker, he could not make himself one by taking out a licence, and that he was, therefore, not a person exempted from the operation of section 13. He cited "Woolwich Local Board v. Gardiner" ([1895], 2 Q.B., 497) and "Openshaw v. Oakeley" (60 L.T., 929).

Mr. A. E. GRIFFITH, for the respondent, contended that his client had brought himself within the exemption.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

MR. JUSTICE CHANNELL said that he must hold that the respondent was a licensed hawkker within the meaning of the exemption, unless some clear reason were shown for the contrary. The reason shown was that in "Woolwich Local Board v. Gardiner" a person holding a pedlar's licence, who, by virtue of the Pedlars Act, 1871, was deemed to be a licensed hawkker, but who was in fact found to be acting not as a pedlar but as a hawkker, was held not to be within the exemption. But in that case the man was actually doing something in breach of his licence, whereas in the present case the respondent did what it was lawful for him to do under the Act. He was therefore entitled to the benefit of being a licensed hawkker.

MR. JUSTICE BUCKNILL concurred.

BURCHELL V. WILDE.*

Solicitor—Partnership—Dissolution—Right to use firm's name.

This was a motion for an interim injunction to restrain the defendants from carrying on business as solicitors under the name or style of "Burchell and Co." or under any other name or style of which "Burchell" or "Burchells" forms part. In 1874 the plaintiff, J. W. Burchell, was admitted a partner in the firm of "Burchells," and in the year 1882 a new partnership was constituted. The partners were W. Burchell, the elder, and W. Burchell, the younger, who subsequently ceased to be members of the firm, the defendant W. G. Wilde, and the plaintiffs J. W. Burchell and C. T. D. Burchell. They took the style of "Burchell and Co." By an agreement of June, 1893, the plaintiffs and the defendant W. G. Wilde agreed to continue in partnership as solicitors in continuation of their then partnership under the style of "Burchell and Co." at No. 5, the Sanctuary. The defendant W. Wilde was a son of the defendant W. G. Wilde, and there were provisions for his being admitted into the partnership under certain conditions. In the year 1899, differences having arisen, the partnership was dissolved as from December 9, 1899. Under the terms of dissolution the plaintiffs acquired the offices at the Sanctuary. Judgment was delivered.

Mr. Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Mr. Vernon were for the plaintiffs; Mr. Levett, Q.C., and Mr. Norton, Q.C., for the defendant William George Wilde; and Mr. Alexander, Q.C., and Mr. Napier for the defendant William Wilde.

MR. JUSTICE BYRNE said,—It is common ground that there was no express agreement as to goodwill or firm name, and that the rights of the parties upon the question I have to decide stand exactly as though there had been a simple dissolution by consent, no sale of goodwill or assets being contemplated and all parties intending to continue to practise, but nothing was said as to the style under which any of them should so practise. The plaintiffs, with a new partner, also named Burchell, are carrying on business at the old office as "Burchells and Co.," and the defendants (the defendant William Wilde having been taken into partnership by his father) as "Burchell and Co." Each side is willing to make some modification in the name so as to make the resemblance less close, but the plaintiffs claim themselves to use the name "Burchell" or "Burchells" and to restrain the defendants from using the word "Burchell" or "Burchells" in any way as part of their firm name. Notice of dissolution has been duly signed and gazetted, and independent circulars have been sent to every client of the old firm stating the fact and also giving notice of the constitution and places of address and assumed styles of the new firms. At the date of the dissolution the defendant W. G. Wilde was entitled to a larger share of the profits than any of his partners, and he had been a partner in the successive partnerships since 1882, when the style was changed from "Burchells" to "Burchell and Co." His Lordship, after referring to various authorities, including "Banks v. Gibson" (34 Beav., 566), and "Thynne v. Shove" (L.R. 45, C.D., 577) citing "Levy v. Walker" (L.R. 10, Ch.D., 436) and saying that "Levy v. Walker" was not to be read as determining that the purchaser of a business and goodwill is entitled to use the style of the old firm if that style includes the name of a living person, and if the use of it would expose the owner of such name to liability, continued:—Upon principle it is difficult to see why the rights of any partner upon a dissolution under circumstances like those in the present case in reference to the use of the firm name should be greater than the right of a purchaser who has bought the goodwill, and, having regard to the effect of more recent decisions, I think "Banks v. Gibson" must be read subject to the qualification that the use of the old name must not expose the other partners to liability. The plaintiffs' right to the injunction depends upon their establishing that any use of the word "Burchell" as part of the name of the defendant firm would expose them to risk. I cannot say that I am satisfied that any of the plaintiffs would be under any tangible risk of liability if the defendants were to practise as "Burchell, Wilde, and Son," especially if the plaintiffs were to use a style carrying their initials or were to take the name of "Burchells and Burchell" as I understand they are not unwilling to do. Upon the whole case, I think I ought to make no order on the motion.

The defendants having stated that they were willing to adopt the style of "Burchell, Wilde, and Co.," no order was made on the motion except that costs be costs in the action.

IN RE THE NORTH OF ENGLAND IRON STEAMSHIP INSURANCE ASSOCIATION.*

Company—Winding up—Jurisdiction—Company with no capital paid up or credited as paid up —Jurisdiction of High Court to wind up.

HIS LORDSHIP, in giving judgment, said,—This is a petition for the confirmation of a special resolution altering the memorandum of association of the North of England Steamship Insurance Association; jurisdiction is given by the Companies (Memorandum of Association) Act, 1890, to "the Court which has jurisdiction to make an order for winding up the company." The first question I have to consider is whether I have any jurisdiction to deal with the petition. The association was registered as an unlimited company in February, 1876. The memorandum of association contained three clauses. (1) The name of the company is the North of England Steamship Insurance Association. (2) The registered office of the company will be situate in England. (3) The object for which the company is established is the mutual insurance of iron steamships insured with the company by members of the company. This complied strictly with section 10 of the Companies Act, 1862. The company has no shares and no capital. It is, however, a company the winding up of which is plainly contemplated by section 79 of the Act of 1862, and under section 81 of that Act the Chancery Division of the High Court had jurisdiction to wind it up. But by section 33 of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, section 81 of the Act of 1862 is repealed and section 1 of that Act is substituted. That section is as follows:—(1) "The Courts having jurisdiction to wind up companies in England and Wales shall be the High Court, the Chancery Courts of the counties palatine of Lancaster and Durham, the County Courts, and the Stannaries Court." And the question arises whether there is now any Court competent to wind up a company which has no capital paid up or credited as paid up. Upon the whole I have come to the conclusion I cannot attribute to the Legislature the intention to render all companies formed under section 9 or section 10 of the Act of 1862 exempt from the jurisdiction of any Court and to leave companies formed under section 8 liable to be wound up. Section 32 (subsection 2) of the Act of 1890, which is as follows:—"In part IV. of the Companies Act, 1862, and in this Act the expression 'the Court,' when used in relation to a company, shall, unless the contrary intention appears, mean the Court having jurisdiction under this Act to wind up the company," assumes that part IV. of the Act of 1862 which is headed "Winding up of companies and associations under this Act" continues in full force. I think I am justified in holding that subsection 1 of section 1 defines the Courts which have jurisdiction to wind up all companies in England and Wales, except so far as cut down by the following subsections, and that subsections 2 and 3 apply only to companies formed under section 8 and which, therefore, possess a capital. The result is that the High Court has jurisdiction to wind up the association and, therefore, has jurisdiction to sanction an alteration of the memorandum of association. The question of jurisdiction being settled, I feel no difficulty in confirming the special resolution, the object of which is to enlarge the scope of the operations of mutual insurance. The order, therefore, will be as prayed.

Mr. O. Leigh Clare was for the petitioners.

THE SOUTH AFRICAN BREWERIES (LIMITED) v. KING.*
Conflict of Laws—Contract—Covenant in restraint of trade—Brewery in South Africa.

Held, that the contract was governed by the law of the South African Republic.

Decision of Kekewich, J. (15 The Times L.R., 442), affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice Kekewich's, reported in 15 The Times L.R., 442. It raised an interesting and important question of private international law—namely, whether an English contract entered into in a foreign country between a British subject resident there and an English company having its registered office in England, but carrying on its business solely in that foreign country—the contract being in respect of the business carried on there—should be governed by the English law or by the law of that foreign country. The facts were shortly these:—In 1890 the Natal Brewery Syndicate (South-East Africa) (Limited) was incorporated in England for the purpose of carrying on the business of brewers in the Transvaal, the colony of Natal, and elsewhere in South Africa. By an agreement, dated October 14, 1892, made between the syndicate (which was then carrying on its business at Johannesburg, in the Transvaal, and at Pietermaritzburg, in Natal) on the one part, and the defendant (a brewer and a British subject then resident in Nottingham) of the other part, it was agreed that the defendant should proceed to Johannesburg and serve the syndicate as brewer or otherwise in the business of a brewer carried on at Johannesburg and in Natal or elsewhere, at a salary of £300 a year, the agreement to be determinable by either party by notice in writing; and the defendant thereby undertook not to engage in any brewing business in South Africa within five years after the termination of the agreement without the sanction of the syndicate, and that in the event of the syndicate being taken over by any other company he would carry out that agreement with such other company on the terms and conditions contained therein. Thereupon the defendant went out to Johannesburg and carried on the management of the syndicate's brewery there until November, 1892, when the syndicate's undertaking was taken over by another English company, the South African United Breweries (Limited), which was formed and registered in England for that purpose. The defendant then continued in the employ of that company on the terms of the original agreement with the syndicate until April 11, 1895, when by an agreement of that date executed in South Africa and expressed to be made between the new company "or its successors" of the one part and the defendant, described as of "the Castle Brewery," Johannesburg, being the company's brewery, of the other part, the defendant agreed to serve the company for five years from October 1, 1894, determinable by the company alone, "as brewer or otherwise in their business carried on at Johannesburg and in the colony of Natal or elsewhere in South Africa," at a monthly salary of £54 8s. 4d. And the defendant agreed "not to engage in any brewing business in South Africa within a period of ten years after the termination of his engagement by the company, except with the consent in writing of the board of directors in London of the company." In May, 1895, the South African United Breweries (Limited) was reconstructed, and the whole of its undertaking was taken over by the plaintiffs, another English company, and the defendant continued in their employ as brewer upon the terms of the agreement of April 11, 1895. By notice in writing of March 3, 1897, duly served on the defendant, the plaintiffs determined that agreement, whereupon the defendant became concerned, it was said, in the promotion of a company registered in Scotland under the name of the "Durban Brewery Syndicate (Limited)" for the purpose of establishing a brewery at Durban, in the colony of Natal, under the management of the defendant, without the plaintiffs' consent, and he had, it was alleged, entered into an agreement with the Scotch company to manage its brewery at Durban for seven years. The plaintiffs then brought this action for an injunction to restrain the defendant from committing this alleged breach of his agreement of April 11, 1895. In his defence the defendant alleged that both the agreements of 1892 and 1896 were wholly void according to the law of the South African Republic as not having been executed before the Landdrost, and also that the restrictions in the agreement of 1895 were invalid both according to the law of the South African Republic and also according to the law of this country, as being greater than were reasonably necessary for the plaintiffs' protection, and as also being most oppressive towards the defendant. Mr. Justice Kekewich held that the contract was governed by the law of the South African Republic, and adjourned the further trial of the action to enable the parties to adduce evidence as to that law. The plaintiffs appealed.

Mr. Warrington, Q.C., and Mr. Younger, Q.C., were for the plaintiffs; Mr. Buckmaster was for the defendant.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said that the conclusion at which the learned Judge had arrived was unquestionably right. It was impossible to decide the rights of the parties under this contract without knowing what the law of the Transvaal was. Upon the construction of the whole of the contract his Lordship thought it clear that Johannesburg was the primary place to which the contract related, and, having regard to the fact that this contract was entered into at Johannesburg, in his opinion the clause now in question ought to be governed by the law of the Transvaal, and this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

LORDS JUSTICES VAUGHAN WILLIAMS and ROMER concurred.

BIRD V. PHILPOTT.*

Bankruptcy—Assets—Undischarged bankrupt trading—Surplus in first bankruptcy—Second bankruptcy.

This case raised important questions as to the rights of persons having transactions with undischarged bankrupts. The facts, which were not substantially in dispute, were as follows:—In 1885 the defendant Thomas Lovibond Templeman was in business as a plumber at Taunton, and in August of that year was adjudicated bankrupt. The defendant George Philpott was appointed his trustee in bankruptcy. A small dividend was paid to his creditors, but he did not receive his discharge. In 1891 he came to Slough and obtained employment as an engineer in the Great Western Railway Company. He also engaged in building operations, and purchased plots of land for that purpose without disclosing the fact that he was an undischarged bankrupt. In April, 1897, he became acquainted with the plaintiff, Mr. Walter Avery Bird, a solicitor at Uxbridge, who acted for him in some legal matters on the strength of a reference to his bankers. Subsequently Templeman requested the plaintiff to procure advances for him on the security of certain houses known as 1 to 4, Chard-villas, Montague-road, Slough. The plaintiff procured the advances from a Mrs. Payne, and himself advanced money to enable Templeman to purchase further plots of land and to continue his building operations. These advances were repaid out of mortgage money. In September, 1897, the plaintiff procured for Templeman a further advance of £600, out of which he subsequently purchased the land, on which he then proceeded to build, with the aid of further moneys advanced by the plaintiff for that purpose, the houses known as 5 and 6, Chard-villas. In May, 1898, Templeman also purchased three plots of land adjoining 5 and 6, Chard-villas, which plots were purchased with moneys provided by the plaintiff, who paid the deposit and subsequently provided the whole of the balance to prevent the forfeiture of the deposit. By a mortgage of June 17, 1898, Templeman gave the plaintiff a first charge over 5 and 6, Chard-villas, and the three plots of land to secure the sum therein named and any future sums that might become due and costs, and also a second charge over 1 to 4, Chard-villas. On September 30, 1898, Templeman was again adjudicated bankrupt, and the defendant Cecil Mercer was appointed his trustee and communicated to the plaintiff the fact that Templeman was already an undischarged bankrupt. The plaintiff then offered to pay the debts due under the first bankruptcy, but the defendant Philpott declined to accede, saying that the defendant Mercer, as trustee under the second bankruptcy, would be entitled to any surplus of assets in the first bankruptcy. The plaintiff, alleging that all the liabilities of Templeman to himself were incurred in order to enable him to acquire lands for building purposes and to build houses thereon and for obligations and costs connected therewith, claimed (1) a declaration that he was entitled to a first mortgage on 5 and 6, Chard-villas, and the three plots of land adjoining and to a second mortgage on 1 to 4, Chard-villas, to secure his various advances by virtue of the indenture of June 17, 1898; (2) further, or in the alternative, a declaration that he was entitled, on payment of the balance of debts, costs, and expenses incurred under Templeman's first bankruptcy, to have conveyed to him the property mentioned in the said indenture as security for the amount of principal, interest, and costs purporting to be secured by the said indenture.

Mr. Herbert Reed, Q.C., and Mr. E. W. Hansell appeared for the plaintiff; the Solicitor-General (Sir R. B. Finlay, Q.C.) and Mr. Muir Mackenzie for the defendants.

The plaintiff, examined by Mr. REED, said he had made inquiries about Templeman and the answers were satisfactory. Nos. 1 to 4, Chard-villas, were mortgaged to Mrs. Payne, and he deducted the advances he had made from the mortgage money. Templeman gave him a charge over these houses to secure his costs. He did not provide the purchase money for the site of 5 and 6, Chard-villas, but he made advances for the purpose of building. The conveyance of the three plots of land was handed to him on his paying the balance of the purchase money. That was subsequent to the date of the mortgage of June 17.

Witness was cross-examined by the SOLICITOR-GENERAL as to certain items in his account against Templeman.

Mr. REED said the case consisted of two parts—(1) as against Philpott, the first trustee; and (2) as against Mercer, the second trustee. As against Mercer, it was purely a question of law. Mercer claimed to be entitled to the property of Templeman subject only to the rights therein of Philpott. He contended that that claim was ill-founded. Bankruptcy was not a total conversion, it only took a man's property for certain purposes, and the surplus went back, after satisfaction of creditors, to the bankrupt. When the debts were paid there was a trust for the bankrupt. If there was a second bankruptcy the second trustee took by a new title and subject to mesne encumbrances. "Cook v. Sturgis "

(28 L.J., Ch., 345) and "Troup v. Ricardo " (34 L.J., Ch., 91) were authorities as to surplus of assets. Those were cases under the old Insolvency Acts, but there was no difference of principle on this point between those Acts and the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. Real estate in surplus went to the bankrupt's heir—"Charman v. Charman " (12 Vesey, 580) and "Banks v. Scott " (5 Maddock, 493), and a similar rule applied to personalty—"Ex parte King " (17 Vesey, 116). When the creditors were satisfied, voluntary settlements were no longer void as against the assignee—"Curtis v. Price " (12 Vesey, 103) and "Re Sims " (3 Manson, 340). The question of surplus was also discussed in three more modern cases—"Re Leadbitter " (10 Ch. Div., 388); "Re Sheffield " (Ibid., 435); and "Re Evelyn " ([1894] 2 Q.B., 302). As to the case as against the first trustee, Philpott, it was partly a question of law and partly of fact. The principle of "Meux v. Smith " (11 Sim., 410) applied to the case of the three plots of land. Plaintiff had supplied all the money for the purchase. In conclusion, counsel referred his Lordship to the following cases:—"Cohen v. Mitchell " (25 Q.B.D., 262); "New Land Development Association " ([1892] 2 Ch., 138); "Re Clark " ([1894] 2 Q.B., 393); "Re Clayton " ([1895] 2 Ch., 212); and "Hunt v. Fripp " ([1898] 1 Ch., 675).

The SOLICITOR-GENERAL said that as regards Mercer there was no conveyance of the surplus or possible surplus by the bankrupt in this case, but a mortgage of specific property. That property did not belong to the bankrupt, but had vested by operation of law in the first trustee. Therefore, the plaintiff could not take advantage of the principle involved in the cases cited by Mr. Reed, in which an expected surplus had been assigned by the bankrupt. All property, including after-acquired property, vested in the trustee. As regards the case against Philpott, the advances made in respect of 1 to 4, Chard-villas, had been repaid, and Templeman could not charge those houses for the plaintiff's costs, as the houses were not his property. Nos. 5 and 6, Chard-villas, were conveyed before the date of the mortgage under which the plaintiff claimed. The mortgage could have no effect, because it was completed after the property vested in the trustee of the first bankruptcy. In "Meux v. Smith," which had been said to apply to the three plots of land, the circumstances were quite different. There the money necessary to obtain the lease was provided by the plaintiff.

Mr. MUIR MACKENZIE followed on the same side.

After Mr. REED had replied,

Mr. JUSTICE FARWELL, after reciting the facts, said that the first question to be decided related to the title of Mercer. Speaking generally, the trustee took the bankrupt's property and nothing more. Here it was contended that, as there would be a surplus of assets in the first bankruptcy, provided that he held that after-acquired property belonged to the first trustee, the surplus ought to go to the second trustee. He could not take such a view. To do so would be to hold that a bankrupt could not deal with his property at all, and that was not supported by the authorities. The trustee took the estate of a bankrupt for a limited purpose only, subject to this—that he was trustee for the bankrupt of the residue, though the bankrupt could not intervene till it was known that there was a surplus and all his debts were paid. But he had a right to the surplus, which, if he so liked, he could dispose of by will or by deed inter vivos. The two cases cited from the Law Journal established what seemed to him to be the principles of bankruptcy law on this point. The Solicitor-General, however, had said that the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, was differently framed from the old Insolvency Acts. He did not think there was any real difference except in the machinery of vesting. Then the Solicitor-General had said that this was not a mortgage of surplus, but of specific property. That was to look only at the shell and not at the substance. The bankrupt could not be heard to say, "I have only mortgaged the surplus," and he did not see how any one who claimed through him could say so either. Therefore he could see no distinction on this point either, and must decide that the second trustee had no claim to the surplus, but only to the property of the bankrupt at the time of the second bankruptcy. The second question related to the title of Philpott. With regard to 1 to 4, Chard-villas, the charge for costs set up by the plaintiff was invalid as against the trustee, who became entitled to the houses as after-acquired property of the bankrupt. The plaintiff had no claim either as regards 5 and 6, Chard-villas, for they were not purchased with his money. The three plots of land raised a different question, as they were acquired by the bankrupt entirely with the plaintiff's money. He thought the facts in this instance were substantially within "Meux v. Smith," and he must hold that the plaintiff was entitled to a charge on those three plots. As the second trustee had taken over the property he must pay the costs.

LOGSDON V. TROTTER.*

Metropolis—Common lodging-house—Registration—Common lodging-house, what is.

This was an appeal by case stated from the decision of a Metropolitan Police magistrate. An information was laid by the appellant, on behalf of the London County Council, against the respondent charging him with keeping a house as a common lodging-house and receiving lodgers therein, which house had not been inspected and approved by the local authority and registered under the Common Lodging Houses Act, 1851. The house in question was known as the Victoria-home, and was situated at 177, Whitechapel-road. The question was whether the nature of the house was distinguishable from the Salvation Army shelters, which, in the case of "Logsdon v. Booth" (reported ante, p. 12), were recently decided to be common lodging-houses within the Act. The house was one of three homes the property of a body of trustees, one of whom was the respondent. The trustees established and carried on the homes under the terms of a deed whereby they agreed to hold certain property for the purpose of establishing and carrying on an institution called the "Emigrants' and Working Men's Home Association." The house in question was built in 1897. It contains accommodation for 128 lodgers—that is to say, it contains 128 single-bedded cubicles or bed-rooms, and certain rooms used in common. The building is not registered as a common lodging-house. Each cubicle contains one bed only, which is occupied exclusively by one man. Each cubicle is 6ft. 6in. long and 4ft. 6in. wide, and the walls are 6ft. 6in. high. Each lodger pays 6d. or 8s. a night according to the position of the cubicle which he occupies. He is entitled for those sums to the use of a cubicle and to the use of the common rooms. The lodgers can use a kitchen in an adjoining building for the purpose of cooking their food, though the practice is not countenanced by the trustees. Regard is paid to the moral and spiritual welfare of the lodgers, and efforts are made to help deserving lodgers to find situations and to assist them during illness. A certain number of the lodgers are of a better class than the "dossier" inhabitant of an ordinary common lodging-house, but substantially the lodgers are of the "dossier" description. The lodgers either buy their own food ready cooked, or they purchase it at a bar provided for the purpose and situated close to the building, or, as above mentioned, they bring it uncooked and cook it in the common kitchen of the adjoining building. Only men are admitted as lodgers. Men who are drunk and disorderly, or who are suspected of being criminals, or who are verminous are not admitted. Save as above all comers (being men) are admitted upon payment. The building is carried on at a profit, but such profit is devoted to the charitable objects of the trust. A considerable part of the sum required for the erection of the building and the purchase of the site was subscribed by friends of the institution as a gift. The magistrate, whose decision was given before the decision in "Logsdon v. Booth," dismissed the information upon the ground that the house was not carried on for the purpose of making a profit, but solely for the purpose of assisting the poorer classes of the population, and that the facts were unlistinguishable from the case of "Booth v. Ferrett" (25 Q.B.D., 87).

Mr. JELF, Q.C. (with whom was Mr. Ryde), appearing for the London County Council, relied on "Logsdon v. Booth" (reported ante, p. 129).

Mr. DALDY, for the respondent, contended that the house was distinguishable from the "shelter," the subject of consideration in "Logsdon v. Booth." In the first place, the class of people who frequented it was different. The trustees of the institution strove to assist a higher stratum of society than that struck at by the Salvation Army, and a selection was exercised of the persons who were permitted to use the house. Moreover, the fact that the lodgers did not cook their own food in the house was an important variation, because one of the recognized evils of common lodging-houses was the introduction, by the inmates, of unsound food. The meaning of a common lodging-house was a house where the inmates inhabited one common room, whereas in the house under consideration, though some of the rooms were used in common, yet each inmate had separate sleeping accommodation. "Langdon v. Broadbent" (37 L.T., 434) was cited.

Mr. JELF, in reply, said that the separate sleeping accommodation provided in the house did not obviate one of the principal evils which the Act was designed to provide against—namely, the risk of the spread of infectious diseases.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

MR. JUSTICE CHANNELL said that the case was one of some difficulty, but the Court had the advantage of a recent authority upon the subject, which dealt with the question whether one of the Salvation Army shelters was, within the meaning of the Act, a common lodging-house. He was at first struck by the similarity between that case and the present. If, however, the Court were merely to say that the facts of this case were so like the other that no distinction could be drawn, it would be starting upon a progress which might ultimately result in a decision that something was a common lodging-house which no one, using ordinary language, would so describe. It was necessary, therefore, to examine "Logsdon v. Booth" to see where the line was drawn and to see whether the present case crossed that line or not. Four things had been mentioned in the cases as tests to show what was a common lodging-house. One of these was applied in "Logsdon v. Ferrett" and was that the term did not include a house not carried on for profit. That theory was disposed of in "Logsdon v. Booth." Another of the tests suggested was that a common lodging-house meant a house which a low class of persons frequented—a class of persons who were likely to be dirty and diseased. That was a necessary element, but it was not conclusive. The element existed in the present case. It was true that efforts were made to raise the inmates out of that class, but it was found in the case that, though some of the inmates were better than the ordinary "dossier" class, yet substantially they were of that class. In "Langdon v. Broadbent" it was suggested that a common lodging-house meant a house open to all comers. That case, too, was referred to in "Logsdon v. Booth." If the decision meant that a common lodging-house was a place where all comers were received, it was merely negated by "Logsdon v. Booth," because the Lord Chief Justice said that a common lodging-house keeper might refuse to receive persons on various grounds. But if the decision was interpreted to mean in a wider sense that a common lodging-house was a house open to all comers, so that, in fact, persons who were dirty, diseased, or verminous were not excluded from it, then the fact that the house was so open to all comers remained an essential element to bring it within the mischief of the Act. And, in that sense, the house in question came within the definition. It was also suggested that a common lodging-house was a place where persons not previously known to each other inhabited a common room in the sense that they slept there, and the opinion of the law officers of the Crown, given shortly after the Act was passed, was referred to. The law officers did, in fact, describe a common lodging-house as a house where for short periods persons, strangers to each other, were allowed to inhabit a common room, and that must be taken to be a proper description. It was said that to "inhabit" a common room meant to sleep in a common room. It was not necessary to decide whether sleeping in the same bedroom was essential. It was necessary only to say that for a house to be a common lodging-house within the Act it must be a house where a certain class of persons were so congregated together as to create a risk of the spread of disease. Here, in this lodging-house, the people did associate in such a way that there was a risk of the spread of disease. The living rooms were used in common and the sleeping accommodation was not entirely separate. The divisions into cubicles were more for the sake of decency than with the object of preventing infection. The house was, therefore, a common lodging-house like the Salvation Army shelters. The difficulty in this case was that this institution was designed to help a superior class, and that greater conveniences were supplied, and a higher charge made, than in the case of the shelters. His Lordship hoped that the council would not unduly hamper the institution, because upon the facts as stated and upon a perusal of the regulations of the institution it appeared that the lodging-house was as well managed as if the Act had been enforced with regard to it.

MR. JUSTICE BUCKNILL gave judgment to the same effect.

Vaughan Williams and Romer,
L.JJ.) 1900.
Feb. 3.

IN RE GENERAL RAILWAY SYNDICATE—WHITELEY'S CASE.*

Company—Winding up—Contributories—Repudiation of contract to take shares—Misrepresentation.

On a summons for judgment under O. XIV. by a company against a shareholder for calls the latter filed an affidavit that he intended to counter-claim for rescission of the contract, on the ground of misrepresentation, and obtained leave to defend. Before the counter-claim was delivered the company was ordered to be wound up.

Held, that the shareholder had "taken proceedings" in time.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice Wright's, dated March 15, 1899. It raised an important question as to the effect of the rule that a shareholder who desires to repudiate his contract to take shares on the ground of misrepresentation must take proceedings for that purpose before the winding up of the company. On June 15, 1896, 5,000 £1 shares in the above-named company were allotted to W. A. Whiteley. On December 22, 1897, a call was made of 5s. per share, which was payable in the following January. On June 27, 1898, the company commenced an action against Whiteley to recover the amount of the call, and on July 12 served him with a summons for leave to enter final judgment under Order XIV. On July 15 Whiteley filed an affidavit in opposition to the summons, stating that he had been induced to apply for the shares by misrepresentation on the part of the company, and that he intended to counter-claim for rescission of the contract and to have his name removed from the register of members, and on July 20 he obtained unconditional leave to defend. On July 22 a petition was presented for the compulsory winding up of the company, and on August 3 a compulsory winding-up order was made upon the petition. In the meantime, on August 2, Whiteley put in a defence to the action, and delivered a counter-claim for rescission of the contract and rectification of the register and for an injunction to restrain the company from enforcing the calls. The liquidator having settled Whiteley on the list of contributories in respect of the 5,000 shares, Whiteley issued a summons asking that his name might be struck off the list, with leave to raise the question whether it was too late for him to set up a case of misrepresentation against the company. Mr. Justice Wright held that the counter-claim would not avail the applicant, because it was delivered after the presentation of the winding-up petition, and that the affidavit stating his intention to deliver a counter-claim was not a proceeding to rescind the contract, and a threat to take proceedings was not sufficient. Therefore, as the applicant had not taken proceedings to rescind the contract before the presentation of the petition, the application failed. The applicant appealed.

Mr. Upjohn, Q.C., and Mr. Whately were for the applicant; and Mr. E. Macnaghten, Q.C., and Mr. Peterson for the liquidator.

THE COURT allowed the appeal.

THE MASTER of the ROLLS said that the Court had to consider what was the effect of the practice under the Judicature Act upon the rule laid down before the passing of the Judicature Act as to the right of a shareholder to repudiate his contract when winding-up proceedings were imminent. No one quarrelled with the rule as stated in "In re the Scottish Petroleum Company" (23 Ch.D., 413) that a shareholder must take proceedings before the winding up to have his name removed from the register; but it was very difficult for Judges to frame language applicable to every possible case, and the real question was whether what was done here by the applicant was not equivalent to taking proceedings for removal of his name from the register. In his Lordship's opinion it was. Before the winding up an action was commenced by the company against the applicant for calls, and a summons was taken out under Order XIV. for leave to sign first judgment. What was the effect of that? There were two courses open to the applicant. He might commence a fresh action for rescission of the contract to take shares or he might put in a counter-claim. The latter course would not have been open to him under the old practice, and, although under the new practice he might still have commenced a fresh action, in his Lordship's opinion that would have been rather a vexatious proceeding in the circumstances. He took the alternative course; but he first applied for leave to defend, and he filed an affidavit which showed no defence at all, apart from the counter-claim, to have the contract rescinded. It was upon that affidavit that he got leave to defend. The difficulty arose from the fact that a winding-up petition was presented before he put in his counter-claim, but in his Lordship's opinion he had done all that was reasonably necessary to exercise his right to repudiate the contract. Whether the decision in "In re Cleveland Iron Co." (16 W.R., 95), where it was decided that a defence to an action for calls founded upon the right of the shareholder to be relieved from his contract was not a proceeding to repudiate the contract for the purpose of the rule above stated, went too far it was unnecessary to decide, though it would lead to some extraordinary results. But this Court was asked to extend the principle of that decision, which was a decision under the old practice, to what was done here under the new practice, which was quite different. He thought that that was wholly unjustifiable. The appeal would therefore be allowed.

LORDS JUSTICES VAUGHAN WILLIAMS and ROMER concurred.

BEIGHTHEIL AND YOUNG V. STEWART.*

Principal and Agent—Undisclosed principal—Liability of agent.

In this action the defendant was an architect engaged by building owners for the rebuilding of two public-houses, and he invited the plaintiffs to give estimates for lamps, referring in the letters to his "clients," but not naming them. The plaintiffs sent him estimates in his own name and in their letters referred to "your clients," and afterwards the defendant ordered the goods without stating that he did so as agent. The work being done, the invoices were sent by the plaintiffs to the defendant in the form "W. Stewart, Esq., Dr. to Beightheil and Young." Subsequently the defendant sent the plaintiffs his certificates for the amounts of the invoices, addressed to the builders, certifying that the plaintiffs were entitled to be paid so much by such builders. The builders declined to pay and the plaintiffs wrote them several times and then asked defendant to try and get them the money. Defendant then suggested that they should ask payment from the building owners, which they did, but payment was refused. They now brought this action against Mr. Stewart, the architect, to recover £91. When the action first came on for trial the learned Judge intimated his opinion that the builders ought to pay, and adjourned the hearing. Acting on this intimation the builders paid the plaintiffs £70, but declined to pay the balance of £21, alleging that they had not been paid that sum by the building owners.

Mr. ARTHUR POWELL, for the plaintiffs, contended that the defendant, though known to be an agent when the contract was made, was personally liable, because he had not disclosed the names of his principals, which were unknown to the plaintiffs till long afterwards, and he cited "Story on Agency," s. 291; "Thomson v. Davenport," 2 Smith's Leading Cases, 10th edition, p. 368; and the notes thereto.

Mr. MONTAGUE LUSH, for the defendant, contended that, as the plaintiffs were informed there were principals who were afterwards named, his client incurred no personal responsibility, and he further contended that by seeking payment from the builders the plaintiffs had elected to look to them and not to the defendant.

MR. JUSTICE BIGHAM was of opinion that the defendant, by making the contract in his own name without naming his principals, and without expressly excluding his liability, had made himself personally liable, and that by endeavouring to get the money from the builders and the building owners to whom the defendant had referred them they had made no election exonerating him. He thought the plaintiffs had done right in accepting the £70 from the builders since the last hearing, and though he still considered the builders were the persons ultimately liable who ought to find the money, he gave judgment for the plaintiffs for £21 and costs on the High Court scale.

A stay of execution was applied for but refused.

WEST AND WRIGHT V. NEWING.*

Assignment—Equitable assignment—Agreement to hand over cheques "as and when received"— —Liability of insolvent estate.

This was an action brought under Order XIV. to recover from the defendant, as administratrix of John William Newing, deceased, the sum of £39 0s. 6d., the price of flour sold, and to recover from the defendant, personally, the sum of £44 16s. 3d. In September, 1898, John William Newing, who was a baker, made the following contract with the plaintiffs:—"The Deaf and Dumb Contract.—In reference to above, my tender being accepted, I accept your offer of flour at prices as under, scaling 22s. 9d. per 20 stones, best second, in quantities of about eight to ten sacks per week, payment in one month. I also agree to endorse the cheques from the asylum and hand over to you as received by me in payment of the accounts." Flour was delivered by the plaintiffs under the contract between September, 1898, and March, 1899, when the sum now claimed was due to the plaintiffs. On March 23, 1899, Newing died, and the defendant, who is his widow, became administratrix with the will annexed. In May, 1899, the plaintiffs showed the contract of September, 1898, to the defendant, and, later in the same month, a cheque for £44 16s. 3d. was paid by the committee of the asylum to the defendant. The plaintiffs claimed the right to have the cheque endorsed to them, but the defendant refused to hand it over and held it for the benefit of the testator's creditors. The estate was insolvent.

Mr. FOHLER, for the plaintiffs, contended that the contract of September, 1898, constituted a good, equitable assignment of the cheque and that the defendant held it as trustee for them. He cited "In re Irving—ex parte Brett" (7 C.D., 419), and distinguished "Field v. Megaw" (L.R., 4 C.P., 661).

Mr. HERBERT SMITH, for the defendant, contended that the undertaking to endorse the cheques did not constitute an assignment but was a mere additional undertaking as to the manner of payment for the flour, on which an action for damages only could be maintained. If there were an assignment an action could be brought, after notice, against the asylum committee. This, he contended, could not have been done; nor could an action for money had and received be maintained against the defendant. He cited "Schroeder v. Central Bank" (34 L.T., 735), and "Hopkinson v. Forster" (L.R., 19 Eq., 74). The appointment could easily have been evaded by the testator getting the committee to pay him in cash, and was too vague. The agreement being an agreement to assign a cheque and not to assign a fund, no trust was created but only a personal right of action against Newing. "In re D'Epineuil" (20 C.D., 158) and "Tailby v. Official Receiver" (13 App.Cas., 523) were also referred to.

*Reported by J. E. ALDOUS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

*Reported by C. G. WILBRAHAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

MR. JUSTICE BUCKNILL gave judgment for £89 0s. 6d. against the testator's estate and, personally against the defendant, for £44 16s. 3d. He said that there was no doubt the parties to the agreement of September, 1898, intended to appropriate the cheques received from the asylum committee to the specific purpose of paying the plaintiffs for flour delivered. "In re Irving" was, in his opinion, an authority for saying that the agreement constituted an equitable assignment of the moneys as and when received from the asylum committee. The agreement was not an undertaking to pay out of the cheques received, but was, in the words of Chief Justice Bacon in the case referred to, "an undertaking to pay over the very fund itself."

JONES V. BARNETT.*

Vendor and Purchaser—Title—Purchase under order of the Court—Prior encumbrancer.

Sec. 70 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vict., c. 41), was only intended to cure irregularities, and does not apply to a case where an order has been made to sell land on the supposition that it belonged to A when it really belonged to B.

Decision of Romer, J. (15 The Times L.R., 235), affirmed.

This was an appeal against a decision of Mr. Justice Romer's (reported in The Times of February 27 last, and 15 The Times L.R., 235). The case raised an important question as to the extent of the protection given to a bona fide purchaser for value by section 70 of the Conveyancing and Law Property Act, 1881, when he has purchased under an order of the Court. The facts were as follows:—On May 31, 1894, one Isaac Jones, being indebted to Philip Jones, the husband of the plaintiff, Mary Jones, executed a deed whereby, after reciting the will and death of an uncle, one John Williams, and that Isaac Jones was one of the legatees named in the will and was indebted to Philip Jones in the sum of £350, and had agreed to assign to the plaintiff all his share, right, title, and interest under the will, he, the said Isaac Jones, thereby assigned unto Mary Jones, and Philip Jones thereby confirmed, all the share, right, title, and interest to which Isaac Jones in his right was then, or should, or might thereafter be entitled under the will to Mary Jones absolutely. Subject to a question whether the words of the grant operated to pass more than a life interest to the plaintiff in the freeholds, the property included a reversion expectant on the death of a life tenant in a leasehold shop and two freehold cottages at Aberavon, near Swansea. On February 26, 1895, the defendant obtained judgment against Isaac Jones for £450 in an action in the Queen's Bench Division of "Barnett v. Jones," and on March 14, 1895, by an order in that action, a receiver was appointed of Isaac Jones's reversionary interest in the above-mentioned freehold and leasehold property. On July 10, 1895, a petition was presented on behalf of Barnett before Mr. Justice Chitty entitled "In the Matter of Isaac Jones and the Judgments Act, 1864," praying a sale of the interest of Isaac Jones in the property of which the receiver had been appointed. By an order made on this petition on July 24, 1895, accounts were ordered to be taken of what was due to the petitioner under the judgment of February 26, 1895, of what interests of Isaac Jones had been delivered in equitable execution by the appointment of a receiver, an inquiry whether there were any and (if any) what liens, charges, or encumbrances on the interest in land of Isaac Jones, their amounts and priorities, and of those which were prior and subsequent to the receivership order, and which, if any, created subsequent to that order, were before the registration of that order created in favour of a purchaser for value; and it was ordered that Isaac Jones should pay what should be certified to be due within one month after the chief clerk's certificate, and it was ordered that, in default of Isaac Jones paying the amount so certified, his said interests in land should be sold, with the approbation of the Judge, free from all liens, charges, or encumbrances created subsequent to the order of March 14, 1895, except any such created in favour of a purchaser for value before the registration of that order. On January 20, 1896, the chief clerk certified that £509 19s. was due, that the property consisted of the leasehold shop and freehold cottages above mentioned, and that there were no charges or encumbrances on Isaac Jones's interest therein. Isaac Jones having paid no part of his debt, Barnett subsequently obtained an order authorizing him to bid for the property, which was put up for auction on December 16, 1896. Barnett was the highest bidder for £515, and by an order dated February 19, 1897, it was ordered that a person should be appointed to convey the interest of Isaac Jones in the houses to Barnett. The tenant for life died on March 16, 1897, and Barnett then took possession, and the deeds relating to the property were subsequently handed over to him by the executors of the will of John Williams. Neither Barnett nor his solicitors had any notice or knowledge of the assignment to the plaintiff until a letter came from the plaintiff's solicitor to Barnett's solicitor on April 15, 1897, claiming that the plaintiff, Mary Jones, was entitled to the property under the assignment of May 31, 1894. Section 70 of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881 (subsection 1), is as follows:—"An order of the Court under any statutory or other jurisdiction shall not, as against a purchaser, be invalidated on the ground of want of jurisdiction or of want of any concurrence, consent, notice, or service, whether the purchaser has notice of any such want or not." Mr. Justice Romer held that this section did not operate to give the defendant a better title to the property than that of the plaintiff, which was prior in date, and that her interest was not affected by the order for sale, and she was entitled to recover possession of the property. The defendant appealed.

Mr. Neville, Q.C., and Mr. W. F. Phillpotts were for the defendant; Mr. Bramwell Davis, Q.C., and Mr. T. B. Napier were for the plaintiff.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS thought there was no real difficulty in the case, unless the Court were asked to redraft section 70. In making the order for sale the Court supposed that it was dealing with an interest of Isaac Jones in the land. It turned out that the land was not his, and then it was said that the purchaser had obtained a good title by means of section 70. None of the cases already decided upon the effect of that section touched this aspect of it. The Court was now asked to go much further. The section was only intended to cure irregularities, and did not apply to a case in which an order had been made to sell land on the supposition that it belonged to A when it really belonged to B.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY said that section 70 was not intended to entrap the Court into dealing with property with which it had no idea of dealing.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS concurred.

SPENCER V. LIVETT, FRANK, AND SON, AND JOHN AIRD AND CO.*

Master and Servant—Master's liability to servant
—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897—Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, sec. 93—"Shipbuilding yard," what is—Ship repairing in dock.

This was an appeal from the award of the Southampton County Court Judge under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. The appellants, Messrs. Livett, Frank, and Son, were a firm of ships' chandlers who supplied stores to ships, and in addition they undertook the painting of ships. The applicant, Spencer, was a workman in their employment. The owners of the steamship Jelunga, which was at Southampton, employed Messrs. Livett, Frank, and Son to paint the inside of the ship, and for this purpose the ship was taken into the inner dock and moored alongside a quay. In order to paint her it was necessary to remove the ballast, and as Messrs. Livett, Frank, and Son did not do this class of work, Messrs. John Aird and Co. undertook to do it. Messrs. Livett, Frank, and Son lent some men, including the applicant, to Messrs. John Aird and Co., who paid the men so lent to them. The ballast was taken out of the ship's hold by means of a steam crane on the ship worked by the ship's crew, the crane hoisting a bucket and lowering it down into barges in the dock. The applicant was at the time of the accident working in the hold of the ship taking out the ballast, when the bucket which was being raised by the crane struck him and injured him. The applicant claimed compensation. Messrs. Livett, Frank, and Son, and Messrs. John Aird and Co. were made respondents upon the claim, and Messrs. Livett, Frank, and Son also claimed indemnity against Messrs. John Aird and Co. in case they were held liable to the applicant. The inner dock, where the ship was, was practically surrounded by warehouses, and cranes were placed at intervals along the dock quays for loading and unloading ships. The Jelunga was at the same time having some internal repairs done to her while in the dock by a firm called Day, Summers, and Co., and one of the witnesses said that it was a customary thing for Day, Summers, and Co. to do repairs to ships in this and any other dock. The County Court Judge found that at the time of the accident the applicant was solely in the employment of Messrs. Livett, Frank, and Son; that he was employed in and about the crane and machinery which were being used to discharge the ballast; that the dock in which the Jelunga was including the quay and all that part of the dock filled with water was a factory within the meaning of section 7 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897; that the ship's engine and crane used to discharge the ballast was a factory within the meaning of the Act; that it was the usual and ordinary course of business that ships should be repaired in the dock in question both as to the ship itself and as to her machinery; that the Jelunga was on this occasion in the dock for the purpose of repair and was actually in course of being repaired at the time of the accident; and that the ship's engine and crane were being used in the performance of work necessary to be performed for repairing the ship and painting the ship as described in the evidence. The learned Judge held that the dock was a "factory" within the meaning of section 7, subsection 2 of the Act of 1897, as the process of unloading the ballast into a barge came within section 23, subsection 1 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, it being unloading on to a dock; and he also held that by section 93 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, and Schedule 4, Part 2, the dock was a "factory." He accordingly awarded £40 to the applicant, and held that Messrs. Livett, Frank, and Son were not entitled to be indemnified by Messrs. John Aird and Co. Messrs. Livett, Frank, and Son appealed.

Mr. R. M. BAY, Q.C., and Mr. S. H. EMANUEL, for the appellants, contended that the Judge was wrong in holding that the dock was a "factory" within section 7 of the Act of 1897, which incorporated section 23 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878. The decision in "Hennessey v. McCabe" (16 The Times L.R., 77; 69 L.J., Q.B., 173) was not given when the County Court Judge gave his decision. That case was conclusive upon the point. They also referred upon this point to "Flowers v. Chambers" ([1899] 2 Q.B., 142). Nor was the dock a factory within section 93 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, which defined a non-textile factory as meaning any premises or places named in Part 2 of Schedule 4 to the Act, wherein steam, water, or other mechanical power was used in aid of the manufacturing process carried on there. Amongst the premises referred to in Part 2 of Schedule 4 was "shipbuilding yards—that is to say, any premises in which any ships, boats, or vessels used in navigation are made, finished, or repaired." The dock here was an ordinary loading and unloading dock, not a repairing yard.

Mr. CLAVELL SALTER, for the applicant, said that he was precluded by the decision in "Hennessey v. McCabe" from arguing that the dock was a factory within section 23 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878. But it was a factory within section 93 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, and Part 2 of Schedule 4 to the Act. The Judge had found that this dock was a place where ships were repaired. The dock therefore came within the definition of "shipbuilding yard," and as such was a factory within the Act, and therefore a factory within section 7 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. He also referred to section 7, subsection 3, of the Act of 1897.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that the present case was decided by the County Court Judge before the decision of this Court in "Hennessey v. McCabe." In that case the applicant, who was injured, was on board a ship lying in a dock, and was engaged in loading the ship with cargo from a lighter by means of a steam winch attached to the ship. This Court held that the case did not come within the Act. That decision, therefore, covered the present case so far as regarded section 23, subsection 2, of the Factory and Workshop Act of 1878. It was then said that the definition of a non-textile factory in section 93 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, applied to this dock. His Lordship could not see any manufacturing process carried on in this dock. That definition, however, referred to Schedule 4, Part 2, of the Act. That schedule included a "shipbuilding yard" as one of the places included in section 93. Shipbuilding yard was defined as meaning "any premises in which any ships, boats, or vessels used in navigation are made, finished, or repaired." Could it be said that this inner dock was a shipbuilding yard where ships were made, finished, or repaired? As Lord Justice Romer had suggested during the argument, if it were so, then one ship going into a dock for some repairs where there were 20 or 30 other ships loading or unloading would make the dock a "shipbuilding yard," and therefore a factory. That point also was untenable. The Act of 1897 therefore did not apply.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS concurred. He only wished to add that section 7, subsection 3, of the Act of 1897 was itself enough to show, if it were required, that the contention of the applicant was not tenable.

LORD JUSTICE ROMER concurred. With regard to the definition of "shipbuilding yard," in his opinion the Legislature contemplated premises where the business of making, finishing, and repairing ships was carried on.

CHAMBERS V. GOLDTHORPE.*

Building Contract—Architect—Certificate as to work done—Negligence—Liability.

This was an appeal from the Holmfrith County Court. The action was brought by Mr. J. T. Chambers, who is an architect, against Mr. Harrop Goldthorpe for fees. The defendant had employed the plaintiff to prepare plans for buildings he was then about to erect, and to superintend and measure up the work. The work was done by a contractor. The contract between the defendant and the contractor provided (Clause 20) as follows:—"A certificate of the architect, or an award of the referee hereinafter referred to, as the case may be, showing the final balance due or payable to the contractor is to be conclusive evidence of the works having been duly completed, and that the contractor is entitled to receive payment of the final balance. . . ." Clause 22 of the contract provided that, in case of any question, dispute, or difference arising between the proprietor, or the architect on his behalf, and the contractor as to various matters therein specified, arising under or out of the contract, including questions "as to the works having been duly completed," or in case the contractor shall be dissatisfied with any certificate of the architect under certain of the clauses of the contract, "or in case he (the architect) shall withhold or not give any certificate to which the contractor may be entitled, then such question, dispute, or difference, or such certificate, or the value or matter which should be certified, as the case may be, is to be from time to time referred" to arbitration. The plaintiff had incorrectly measured up certain of the materials used, the result of which was that the amount of the certificate was larger than it ought to have been. The defendant admitted the plaintiff's claim, but counterclaimed for damages for negligence. The County Court Judge gave judgment for the plaintiff on the claim and for the defendant on the counter-claim. The plaintiff appealed.

Mr. SCOTT FOX, Q.C., who appeared for the plaintiff, contended that in giving a certificate the architect acted in a position analogous to that of an arbitrator, and that so long as he acted honestly he was not liable to an action for damages for want of skill.

Mr. LOWENTHAL, for the defendant, contended that the architect was liable under the circumstances, because in measuring up the quantities he was acting as the servant of the defendant, not as an arbitrator. He also contended that under the terms of the contract between the defendant and the builder the plaintiff was never employed in any sense as arbitrator between them. He cited "Rogers v. James" (8 The Times L.R., 67); "Stevenson v. Watson" (4 C.P.D., 118); "Tharvis Sulphur Company v. Loftus" (L.R., 8 C.P., 1); "Pappa v. Rose" (L.R., 7 C.P., 32; on appeal, page 525).*

The COURT allowed the appeal.

MR. JUSTICE CHANNELL said that it was not controverted that if the plaintiff was acting in a judicial position, then no action would lie for mere negligence apart from fraudulent or dishonest conduct. Mr. Lowenthal suggested that that was because an arbitrator did not enter into any implied contract that he possessed the proper skill, but the parties employing him took him for better or for worse. He, however, thought that the true reason was that it was not desirable to enter into the question whether an arbitrator had been negligent or not. He would illustrate that proposition by the case of Judges who were not liable for injurious words spoken in the course of their judicial duties, even when spoken maliciously, and were said to enjoy an absolute privilege in that respect. That was not because the law allowed Judges to be malicious, but because it was not thought desirable to hold an inquiry in such a matter. It did not signify, in his Lordship's opinion, that the person who acted as arbitrator was under contractual obligations to one or other of the parties between whom he acted. Assuming, therefore, that the plaintiff was under a contractual obligation with the defendant to act for him in certain matters, and that, being a contract between the defendant and the builder, the plaintiff was put into the position of an arbitrator, then in so far as he acted as agent only of the defendant he was liable for negligence, and in so far as he acted as arbitrator between the defendant and the builder he was not liable for negligence. The test whether a person was acting as arbitrator or not was laid down by Blackburn, J., in "Pappa v. Rose." The question was whether he was bound to exercise his judgment impartially between the two parties. If so he would not be liable. In this case it was clear from clause 20 of the contract between the defendant and the builder that the architect was bound, in giving his certificate, to act judicially and impartially between the parties. The effect of clause 22 was that the builder had a right of appeal from the architect, but that did not prevent the architect from being in a judicial position in the first instance.

MR. JUSTICE BUCKNILL gave judgment to the same effect.

CRYSTAL PALACE GAS COMPANY V. IDRIS AND CO.†

ousted by the summary remedy provided by sec. 20 of the Gas Works Clauses Act, 1847.

This was an appeal from a County Court. The action was brought by the gas company to recover damages for injuries to a lamp post, caused by the negligent driving of one of the defendants' servants. Proceedings in respect of the injuries were first taken before a magistrate under the provision of the Gas Works Clauses Act, 1847, under section 6 of which and by their private Act the gas company were authorized to erect and keep lamps and lamp posts in the public streets. Section 20 of the Act of 1847 provides as follows:—"Every person who shall carelessly or accidentally break, throw down, or damage any pipe, pillar, or lamp belonging to the undertakers or under their control shall pay such sum of money by way of satisfaction to the undertakers for the damage done, not exceeding £5, as any two justices or the sheriff shall think reasonable." An objection was taken to those proceedings on the ground that the remedy provided by the Act was one against the person who did the act complained of, and not against his master, and the summons was dismissed. In the County Court the Judge gave judgment for the gas company. The defendants appealed.

Mr. BARTLEY DENNIS, for the defendants, contended that the plaintiffs' common law remedy, by action for damages, was ousted by section 20 of the Gas Works Clauses Act, and that their only remedy was the one under the section, because where a statute created a pecuniary obligation and gave a remedy for enforcing it that remedy must be adopted—"St. Pancras (Vestry) v. Batterbury" (2 C.B., N.S., 477). He further contended that, at any rate, having already taken proceedings under the Act against the servant, the plaintiffs could not now proceed against the masters, and that the liability (if any) was limited to £5.

Mr. SAUNT, for the plaintiffs, contended that the common law remedy was left undisturbed by the Act.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

Mr. JUSTICE CHANNELL said that he could see no ground for saying that the Act afforded an exclusive remedy. The principle in "St. Pancras (Vestry) v. Batterbury" only applied where a new offence was created, and in the same Act a remedy was given. Lamps were authorized by section 6 of the Act to be placed in the street, which under the common law might have been held to be a nuisance. In addition to that provision was made for the summary recovery of some compensation in certain cases. There was nothing in that to oust the common law remedy.

Mr. JUSTICE BUCKNILL concurred.

LAWSON V. ATLANTIC TRANSPORT COMPANY (LIMITED).
Master and Servant—Master's liability to servant
—Accident arising out of employment on machinery on a quay—Vessel discharging in dock—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897—Factory and Workshop Act, 1895.

This was an appeal from the award of the Bow County Court Judge in proceedings to assess compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. The respondent was the widow of a workman, who at the time of his death was in the employment of the appellants, the Atlantic Transport Company. The respondent claimed compensation under the Act on behalf of herself and children. The following facts were admitted:—The deceased man was on May 8, 1899, at work for the appellants as a stevedore, with others, in the hold of the appellants' steamship Mackinaw, which was being discharged in the West India Docks. The Mackinaw was lying in the dock moored to the quay, and the cargo, which was in bags, was being discharged from the hold of the ship on the quay by the Dock Company's hydraulic crane situate on the quay. The crane was worked by the appellants' men. There were eight men in the gang at work in the hold, of which the deceased was one, two men in each corner of the hold, and each two men made up sets consisting of 15 bags each, which they laid across a rope stop, and then fastened the stop on to the hook of the runner of the hydraulic crane, which then heaved up the set out of the hold and landed it on the quay. Between 4 and 5 o'clock in the afternoon of May 8, 1899, the deceased and another man were making up a set in the hold, and had got 12 bags across the rope stop, and were in the act of putting another bag on to the 12 bags, when some bags from the tier behind them fell on to them. The runner of the crane, at the time the tier fell, was not attached to the stop of the set which the deceased man was making up but was ashore at the time. The deceased man died from the injuries so received. The County Court Judge held that the case was not distinguishable from "Woodham v. Atlantic Transport Company" (15 The Times L.R., 51, and [1899] 1 Q.B., 15), and that therefore by section 23, subsection 1, of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895, and section 7 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, the employment was on, in, or about machinery used in the process of unloading from a quay, and was therefore on, in, or about a "factory" to which the Act applied. He accordingly made an award in favour of the respondent. The appellants contended that the decision in "Woodham v. Atlantic Transport Company" did not apply, because in that case the accident happened while the end of the chain of the crane was on board the ship and while the cases were being placed by the deceased man in the basket attached to the chain of the crane; whereas in the present case the deceased man was not, at the time of the accident, employed on, in, or about the crane, as the chain of the crane was then on shore.

Mr. D. C. Leck appeared for the appellants.

Mr. W. M. Thompson, for the respondent, was not called upon.

The COURT dismissed the appeal, saying that they could not distinguish the case from "Woodham v. Atlantic Transport Company," and that therefore the County Court Judge was right.

WHITTINGTON V. SEALE-HAYNE.*

Contract—Rescission—Misrepresentation—Indemnity.

In an action for rescission of a lease on the ground of misrepresentation a plaintiff is only entitled to an indemnity as to what was expended under the actual terms of the lease.

This was an action for rescission of a lease and for an indemnity. The plaintiffs, Mr. W. T. Whittington and Mr. R. A. W. Whittington, are breeders and exhibitors of prize poultry, and the defendant, the Right Hon. Charles Seale-Hayne, M.P., is the owner of a house and premises, known as Whitton Manor-house, near Hounslow. On March 7, 1898, the plaintiffs and the defendant entered into an agreement by which it was provided that the plaintiffs should take the house and premises on lease for seven, 14, or 21 years, at an annual rent of £80 for the first period. The plaintiffs alleged that before the agreement was signed the defendant's agents, in answer to questions, represented that the house was in a good sanitary condition. In the following May the plaintiffs executed the lease at the office of the defendant's solicitor, but they did not read the document, relying, as they alleged, upon representations that its terms were in accordance with the agreement of March 7. The lease, however, contained the following covenant, "and also will execute all such works as are or may under or in pursuance of any Act or Acts of Parliament passed or hereafter to be passed be directed or required by any local or public authority to be executed at any time during the said term upon or in respect of the said premises whether by the landlord or tenant thereof," which covenant was not in the original agreement. A draft of the lease had previously been sent to the plaintiffs, but they had not read it. Before the execution of the lease the plaintiffs put a manager named Cooper into the house, erected several sheds, and stocked the premises with poultry. The plaintiffs alleged that, owing to the insanitary condition of the house, the water supply was poisoned, with the result that Cooper and his family became seriously ill, and the poultry either died or were rendered valueless. The sheds were subsequently removed. In October, 1898, the local authority declared that the house was unfit for human habitation, and required the premises to be put in order. The plaintiffs claimed rescission of the lease and an indemnity from the consequences of entering into the contract. The defendant admitted the insanitary condition of the house, but denied that he or his agents gave any warranty, and alleged that the plaintiffs had ample opportunities for inspection before completion of the lease. He counter-claimed for arrears of rent.

Mr. Bramwell Davis, Q.C., and Mr. R. D. Yelverton appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Hughes, Q.C., and Mr. A. Dauney for the defendant.

Mr. BRAMWELL DAVIS, after stating the facts, said that he did not contend that there had been any fraudulent misrepresentation as to the condition of the house, and so the plaintiffs could not claim damages. The plaintiffs, however, had incurred expenses in putting the poultry on the premises, which they would not have done had there been no lease. Though the misrepresentations had been innocent, he thought his clients were entitled to an indemnity from the consequences of entering into the contract. "Newbigging v. Adam" (34 C.D., 582) seemed to support such a proposition.

Mr. YELVERTON followed on the same side, and argued that the defendant's agents had acted carelessly and recklessly. He referred to the following cases:—"Arnison v. Smith" (41 C.D., 98); "Reese River Company v. Smith" (4 E. and L. App., 64); "Hughes v. Twisden" (55 L.J., Ch., 481); "Derry v. Peek" (14 App. Cas., 337); and "Jolliffe v. Baker" (11 Q.B.D., 259).

Mr. HUGHES for the defendant contended that the result of the authorities was that an indemnity only applied to whatever was actually required to be done under the contract, such as payment of rent and taxes and the doing of repairs under a covenant to repair. Here there was no obligation whatever upon the plaintiffs to erect sheds or to stock the premises with poultry. Consequently they could not recover the expenses they had incurred in so doing. Nor could the defendant be compelled to make good his representations. "Redgrave v. Hurd" (20 C.D., 1) was a decisive authority against the claims of the plaintiffs.

MR. JUSTICE FARWELL said that the case raised, in the words of Lord Watson, a point of some nicety and difficulty. The plaintiffs asked for rescission on the ground of admittedly innocent misrepresentations, and also an indemnity from the consequences of having entered into the contract. He had not yet heard the evidence, but he would assume for his present purpose that innocent misrepresentations as to the sanitary condition of the premises had been actually made. The question then arose—to what extent ought the plaintiffs to be restored to the status quo ante? The defendant admitted by his counsel that he was bound so far as liabilities incurred and payments made under the contract were concerned. The plaintiffs, however, demanded more than this—they claimed that the consequences of the misrepresentation should be made good by the defendant. The various authorities cited had left the question rather at large, but it seemed to him that to make good the consequences of misrepresentation was the same thing as damages, and damages could not be recovered for innocent misrepresentations—"Redgrave v. Hurd," "Slim v. Croucher" (1 D.F. and J., 518), might have helped the plaintiffs, but that case had been overruled in "Low v. Bouverie" ([1891] 3 Ch., 82). It was true that the judgments of three Lords Justices in "Newbigging v. Adam" were not quite in harmony, and Lord Justice Fry seemed inclined to carry the doctrine of law somewhat further than Lord Justice Bowen. But he adopted what Lord Justice Bowen had laid down, and must hold that the plaintiffs were not entitled to anything more than what they had paid and expended under the actual terms of the lease. Anything else would be damages pure and simple.

Mr. W. T. Whittington, examined by Mr. BRAMWELL DAVIS, said that he entered into negotiations with Messrs. Chinnock, who were the agents for the defendant. On the occasion of his third visit, his son and Cooper accompanied him. Mr. Clark, whom they saw, said that the drainage would not want doing in their time, and if it did the landlord would do it. Cooper said that it was he who would have to live in the house, and asked if it was in a sanitary condition. Clark replied it was in a perfectly sanitary condition. Witness signed the agreement on the strength of that representation.

Witness was cross-examined by Mr. HUGHES, and then, after a suggestion from his LORDSHIP, Mr. HUGHES intimated that the defendant would consent to rescission of the lease and would agree to pay the plaintiffs £20 to cover what they had paid and expended under the lease.

The King's Lynn Docks and Railway Company appealed to the Recorder from the two poor rates. The notices of appeal were addressed to "The Churchwardens and Overseers of the Poor of the Parish of St. Margaret's, in the Borough of King's Lynn, in the County of Norfolk, and to the Assessment Committee of the King's Lynn Poor Law Union." The notices were served upon the clerk of the peace of the borough of King's Lynn, who also held the office of town clerk. When the appeals were called on before the Recorder he refused to hear them, upon the ground that the notices had not been served upon the town council of the borough. The rule for a mandamus was then obtained.

Mr. Marshall, Q.C., and Mr. R. Cunningham Glen (Mr. A. M. Talbot with them) showed cause against the rule; Mr. Littler, Q.C., and Mr. F. K. North supported it.

The COURT held that, even though the notices had not been rightly served, the Recorder had jurisdiction to hear the appeals. In "Reg. v. Kent Justices" (80 L.T., 622) it was held that in a poor-rate appeal the giving proper notices was a condition precedent to hearing the appeal. That decision was given per incuriam. The Court was, therefore, not prepared to follow it. The decisions in "Shrewsbury Railway Company v. Leominster Overseers" (21 J.P., 149); "Liverpool Gas Company v. Everton" (L.R. 6, C.P., 414); and "Reg. v. Surrey Justices" (6 Q.B.D., 100) were not drawn to the attention of the Court. The decision in "Reg. v. Kent Justices" was wrong, and the mandamus must therefore go.

Rule absolute.

THE RODNEY.*

Ship—Bill of lading—Damage to cargo—Bill of lading incorporating the Harter Act (Act of Congress, Feb. 13, 1893)—Negligence in the "management" of vessel.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Judge of the County Court at Newcastle, given on December 12, 1899, and raised an interesting point in connexion with the construction of the United States Act of Congress, approved on February 13, 1893, and commonly known as the Harter Act. The appellants (who were the plaintiffs in the Court below) brought their action to recover a balance of freight amounting to £40 18s. 9d., in respect of the carriage of a cargo of wheat and maize on board their steamship the Rodney on a voyage from Baltimore to Newcastle in January and February of last year. The cargo was shipped under a bill of lading, which incorporated the provisions of the Harter Act, by section 3 of which "neither the vessel, her owner or owners, agent, or charterers shall become or be held responsible for damage or loss resulting from faults or errors on navigation or in the management of the said vessel." The Rodney sailed from Baltimore on January 17, and on the voyage she encountered exceptionally heavy weather, her decks being constantly flooded, and on her arrival at Newcastle it was found that her cargo had been damaged. The defendants counterclaimed on the action in respect of this damage, which they classified under four heads. As to two of these the plaintiffs admitted liability, and as to the third the County Court Judge decided at the trial in favour of the plaintiffs, and from this finding the defendants did not appeal. The main controversy at the trial and the only matter in dispute in this appeal was as to the fourth head of damage, which was in respect of £18 2s. 1d., damage to the cargo in No. 1 hold. It appeared that the Rodney was a well-decked ship, and that the entrance to the fore-castle, where the crew slept, was flush with the main deck. A 2in. lead pipe was fitted to carry off the drainage of the fore-castle into the bilge, and this pipe passed through the No. 1 hold. To prevent smell arising from the bilges a syphon trap was constructed immediately under the sink in the floor of the fore-castle, and the sink itself was, to prevent the passage of solid matter, protected by a grating. During the voyage in question this pipe became choked, and the fore-castle was, through the bad weather, flooded to the depth of some 3ft. In order to clear the obstruction the boatswain removed the grating and then endeavoured to clear the pipe by means of a poker and hammer, with the result that he drove a hole through the bottom of the syphon trap, and thereby allowed the water in the fore-castle to run into and damage the cargo in the No. 1 hold. At the trial the learned Judge decided that this act of the boatswain was not an act done in the "management" of the vessel within the meaning of the third section of the Harter Act, holding on the authority of the case of "The Glenochil" ([1896], P., 10) and "The Sylvia," an American case (16 "Federal Reporter," 230), that the word must be confined to the performance (though improper) or non-performance of such acts as are, or ought to be done, for the safety of the vessel and for her maintenance in a seaworthy condition, and he accordingly gave judgment for the defendants on their counter-claim, with costs. The plaintiffs appealed.

Mr. B. D. KILBURN, for the appellants, contended that the action of the boatswain was within the meaning of the word "management" in the section. He cited the cases of "The Glenochil" and "The Sylvia" referred to above, and also referred to the cases of "The Ferro" ([1898], P., 38); "Dobell v. Steamship Rossmore Company" ([1895], 2 Q.B., 408); "Carmichael v. Liverpool Sailing Ship, &c., Association" (19 Q.B.D., 242); and "Good v. London Mutual Association" (6 C.P., 563). He was stopped by the Court.

Mr. SCRUTTON, for the respondents, argued that where stipulations of this kind are vague or ambiguous they ought to be construed against the shipowner, "Norman v. Binington" (25 Q.B.D., 475), and that here the conduct of the boatswain had nothing to do with the management of the ship. He was merely doing something to the ship with an appliance of the ship, and it was obvious that any damage to this pipe would damage the cargo.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

The PRESIDENT, in giving judgment, said he was of opinion that this case was within the authority of "The Glenochil." In fact, there was very little difference between the two cases. The act of the boatswain was done in the management of the ship, to clear the fore-castle and enable the ship properly to carry the crew. The Judge of the Court below had improperly restricted the meaning of the word "management," which should extend to the keeping of the vessel in proper condition. The appeal must be allowed, with costs here and below.

MR. JUSTICE GORELL BARNES concurred. In the judgments in "The Glenochil" the expression "safety of the vessel" occurred, but that was because it was appropriate to the facts of that case, and it was in no way intended to limit the construction of the word "management."

LOW V. THE STAINES RESERVOIRS JOINT COMMITTEE.*
Lands Clauses Acts—Lands taken—Part only required—Owner willing to sell whole—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, sec. 92—"House," meaning of.

This was an appeal by the defendants against an injunction granted by Mr. Justice Stirling restraining them in effect from taking under their statutory powers, for the purpose of the works which they are authorized to construct, a portion of premises of which the plaintiff is the lessee, without taking the whole of the property. The plaintiff is the lessee, for a term of 99 years from 1872, at an annual rent of £55, of a house and land, known as Hawthorn-lodge, in the parish of Sunbury. The property comprises a little more than two acres, and consists, in addition to the house, of a garden, and a paddock of more than an acre. There is no separate access to the paddock. The present yearly tenant uses the paddock for keeping fowls and growing fruit, carrying on the business of a poulterer and greengrocer. There is a row of fruit trees in the paddock. The defendants gave the plaintiff notice to treat for a small triangular piece of the paddock, containing 1 rood and 24 perches, and he gave them a counter-notice requiring them to purchase his interest in the whole of the property. Section 92 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, provides:—"No party shall at any time be required to sell or convey to the promoters of the undertaking a part only of any house or other building or manufactory, if such party be willing and able to sell and convey the whole thereof." The learned Judge held that the paddock was really garden, and that it was necessary to the enjoyment of the house, and he accordingly granted the injunction from which the defendants appealed.

Mr. Butcher, Q.C., and Mr. Ingle Joyce were for the defendants.

Mr. Upjohn, Q.C., and Mr. Scrutton, for the plaintiff, were not called upon.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said that if the Court had to decide, without the guidance of the authorities which had put a construction upon section 92—if the matter were res nova—he might be inclined to accede to the arguments of the appellants' counsel. But it was decided at least 50 years ago that the word "house" in section 92 must be construed in the same way as it would be in a grant in a conveyance, and that decision had been followed ever since. The word "house" did not mean merely an erection of brick and mortar. The question, therefore, was, what would have passed by a grant of this house, and his Lordship could not frame any description which would exclude the paddock, unless it were expressly excluded. His Lordship quoted the following passage from Sheppard's Touchstone (p. 94):—"By the grant of a messuage, or a messuage with the appurtenances, doth pass no more than the dwelling-house, barn, dove-house, and buildings adjoining, orchard, garden, and curtilage—i.e., a little garden, yard, field, or piece of void ground, lying near and belonging to the messuage, and houses adjoining to the dwelling-house, and the close upon which the dwelling-house is built, at the most (vis., whatever is annexed to and enjoyed with the house, for its more convenient occupation). And so much also may pass by the grant of a house." Bearing this in mind you had only to look at the lease and see whether the grant of the house would not pass the paddock. There was no access to it except through the house or the court-yard. Any conveyancer would say that it was impossible in a grant of the house to exclude the paddock.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY concurred, observing that he should be inclined to demur to the construction of the word "house" in section 92 as meaning all that would pass by a conveyance of the house. But that construction had been settled long ago.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS agreed with the criticisms which the other members of the Court had passed on the early decisions as to the construction of section 92. But those decisions were of such long standing that they could not now be attacked.

THE CRYSTAL PALACE COMPANY V. THE LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL.*

Metropolis—Buildings—Approval of County Council—London Building Act, 1894—Crystal Palace Act, 1881—Exemptions.

This was an appeal by case stated from justices of London. Informations were preferred on behalf of the Council against the Crystal Palace Company, the appellants, charging them with erecting at the grounds of the Crystal Palace certain buildings to which Part VII. of the London Building Act, 1894, applied—to wit, a 22-stall stable, a loom-box, stabling, and harness-room, a forage store and office, and a shoeing forge—without having obtained the approval of the Council required by the Act and the Act of 1898 amending the same. The Crystal Palace was re-erected by the appellants upon land acquired by them under the powers conferred on them by Royal charter in the year 1853. In addition to re-erecting the building the appellants laid out portions of the lands as gardens and recreation grounds, and from time to time erected on the lands conservatories and buildings, in some instances physically connected with, and in others detached from, the main building. The stables and other buildings in respect of which the information was preferred were erected in May and June, 1899, for use in connexion with land laid out by the appellants as a polo-ground. The buildings were situated about a quarter of a mile from the main building. By section 21 of the Crystal Palace Act, 1881, it was provided that "the main building, conservatories, and waterworks of the company, and the conveniences and other works immediately connected therewith, shall be exempted from the operation of Part I. of the Metropolitan Building Act, 1855, and of any other Act amending the same, but this exemption shall not extend to any dwelling-house or building except as aforesaid upon any part of the property of the company." The Metropolitan Building Act, 1855, was repealed by the London Building Act, 1894, but by section 218 it is provided that where in any Act or document the provisions of the Act of 1855 are referred to, such Act or document shall with the necessary modification be read as if the corresponding provisions of the Act of 1894 were therein mentioned, instead of the provisions of the repealed Act. The justices convicted the appellants.

Mr. FREEMAN, Q.C. (Mr. R. C. Glen with him), for the appellants, contended that the stables were exempted from the provisions of the London Building Act by virtue of section 21 of the Crystal Palace Act, because they were "immediately connected" with the objects for which the Crystal Palace was re-erected and the grounds laid out, which included the amusement and elevation of the people.

Mr. Avory, for the respondents, was not called upon to argue.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

MR. JUSTICE CHANNELL said that "works immediately connected therewith" meant works connected with the main building—that was to say, the physical structure, not the objects of the appellant company. The polo pony stables being a quarter of a mile away from the main building were not connected with it in the sense intended in the Crystal Palace Act, and were, accordingly, not exempted from the provisions of the London Building Act.

ADAMSON V. MILLER.*

Local Government—By-law—Validity—Lights on vehicles—Tramcar.

This was an appeal by case stated from a metropolitan police magistrate. An information was laid by the respondent against the appellant, the manager of the North London Tramways Company, charging him with a breach of the following by-law, which was made by the London County Council:—"The owner of every vehicle which shall be driven or be upon any highway during the period between one hour after sunset and one hour before sunrise shall cause to be fixed outside such vehicle and on the right or off-side thereof a lamp, which shall be so constructed and placed as to exhibit a white light visible in the direction in which the vehicle is proceeding, and sufficient to afford adequate means of signalling the approach or position of the vehicle, and the person in charge of such vehicle shall during the said period keep such lamp properly lighted. This by-law shall not apply to any vehicle which is by any statutory enactment, or by any rule, regulation, or order made under any statutory enactment, and for the time being in force, required to carry a lamp outside such vehicle." It was proved that while being driven upon a highway during the hours mentioned in the by-law one of the tramcars of the North London Tramways Company bore a lamp which, instead of showing a white light in the direction in which it was going, showed a coloured light. The object of having the light coloured was to distinguish the tramcar from other tramcars proceeding to a different destination. The magistrate convicted the appellant.

Mr. C. W. MATHEWS, for the appellant, contended that the Council had no power to make the by-law in question in so far as it related to tramcars, on the ground that tramways and tramcars were under the exclusive control of the Home Secretary. He referred to the Metropolitan Public Carriages Act, 1869, section 9, and the Tramways Act, 1870, sections 46 and 48. He also contended that the by-law was unreasonable.

The respondent was not represented.

Mr. Daldy appeared for the London County Council, but was not instructed to argue.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

MR. JUSTICE CHANNELL said that it was clear that the Home Secretary had control over tramcars as tramcars. But the London County Council had power to make by-laws for the good government of their district, and it had been held that they had power to make by-laws enforcing the use of lights on vehicles using highways during the hours of darkness. Referring to the terms of the by-law, his Lordship said that it purported to refer to tramcars among other vehicles, but in case there might be some vehicles which were already bound to carry some kind of light, and to prevent it being supposed that the by-law overrode the regulations as to such vehicles, a proviso was introduced at the end of the by-law. If the Home Secretary had in pursuance of his powers required tramcars to carry a red light, then the by-law would not have applied. But no such regulation was ever made by the Home Secretary. It must be assumed that the Home Secretary had considered the question, and had decided that no regulation with regard to lights on tramcars was necessary. In terms the by-law purported to apply to tramcars. That being so, the only question was whether the by-law was within the power of the Council. He was of opinion that it was. He did not think it was unreasonable. The Council were making a by-law in respect of the use of highways and saying that every vehicle—and tramcars were at least as dangerous as any other vehicles—shall carry a light, and they said that that light should be a white light. If there had been another enactment containing requirements with which the by-law was inconsistent then the by-law would not have applied. He assumed that there were no such other statutory requirements. The Metropolitan Public Carriages Act, 1869, had been referred to, and section 9 of that Act did say that "no driver shall ply for hire unless the hackney carriage under his charge be provided with a lamp properly trimmed and lighted and fixed outside the carriage in such manner as is prescribed." But that provision had apparently been overlooked, for no requirements had been prescribed under it, and therefore no obligation existed.

MR. JUSTICE BUCKNILL concurred.

BEARDSLEY V. WALTON AND CO.*

Adulteration—"Nature, substance, and quality demanded"—Compounded drug—Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, secs. 6 and 7.

This was an appeal by case stated from justices of Wiltshire. An information was laid by the appellant against the respondents charging them with selling to the prejudice of the purchaser a drug—to wit, camphorated oil—which was not of the nature, substance, and quality demanded by the purchaser, the said camphorated oil only containing eight parts per cent.

by weight of camphor, or less than half the quantity of camphor proper to camphorated oil as described in the British Pharmacopoeia, contrary to section 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875. The justices dismissed the information on the ground that the camphorated oil was a compounded drug, and that consequently the summons could only be issued under section 7 of the Act. Section 6 of the Act provides as follows:—"No person shall sell to the prejudice of the purchaser any article of food or any drug which is not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded by such purchaser under a penalty not exceeding £20, provided that the offence shall not be deemed to be committed under this section in the following cases—that is to say . . . (3) Where the food or drug is compounded as in this Act mentioned." Section 7 is as follows:—"No person shall sell any compound article of food or compounded drug which is not composed of ingredients in accordance with the demand of the purchaser under a penalty not exceeding £20."

Mr. F. R. RADCLIFFE, for the appellant, contended that camphorated oil was not a compounded drug, because the oil was only a vehicle to enable the camphor to be applied. He also contended that subsection 3 of section 6 did not prevent section 6 applying in the case of compounded drugs sold to the prejudice of the purchaser. He cited "White v. Bywater" (19 Q.B.D., 582) and "Houghton v. Taplin" (13 The Times L.R., 386).

Mr. BRUCE WILLIAMSON, for the respondent, contended that the effect of subsection 3 was to take offences in regard to compounded drugs out of section 6 and to bring them under section 7.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

MR. JUSTICE CHANNELL said that the difficulty of the case arose from the use by the justices of the word "consequently." If they had said that camphorated oil was a drug compounded as in this Act mentioned, then the consequence might have followed. The only possible explanation of the words "as in this Act mentioned" was that there was in the Bill a clause dealing with compounded drugs which was afterwards struck out. Their Lordships were not entitled to know that that was the case, but they were entitled to assume so from the language as it stood. The only section in the Act which it could be read as referring to was section 7, which did not in language correspond with it, but did deal with compounded drugs. If so, it must mean that nothing should be an offence under section 6 with reference to compounded drugs unless it was also an offence under section 7. Whatever meaning subsection 3 bore, this offence was equally within section 6.

MR. JUSTICE BUCKNILL concurred.

COWLEY V. COWLEY.*

Husband and Wife—Dissolution of marriage—
Wife using husband's name.

The Countess Cowley, having divorced her husband on the ground of his adultery and desertion, married again, but continued to use the style or title of Countess Cowley.

Held, that Lord Cowley was entitled to an injunction restraining her from so styling herself.

This was a motion on behalf of Earl Cowley, the respondent in the suit, to restrain the petitioner from calling herself Countess Cowley, or bearing the earl's arms. The case was argued on December 15 last and judgment was reserved. (Vide The Times, December 16, 1899.)

Mr. Deane, Q.C., and Mr. Willock were for Lord Cowley; Mr. Lawson Walton, Q.C., and Mr. Barnard for the petitioner.

MR. JUSTICE GORELL BARNES, in delivering a considered judgment, said,—In this case Lord Cowley seeks to restrain a lady who was formerly his wife, but is now the wife of Mr. Robert E. Myddleton Biddulph, from using the style or title of Countess Cowley. The application is made to this branch of the Court in a suit for divorce brought by the lady against Lord Cowley and determined in her favour. It will be convenient in this judgment still to term the parties petitioner and respondent respectively. The respondent is Henry Arthur Mornington Wellesley, third Earl Cowley. The first Lord Cowley was raised to the peerage of the United Kingdom in 1828 by the title of Baron Cowley. His son, the present earl's grandfather, was by letters patent under the Great Seal, dated April 11, 1857, created Viscount Dangan in the County of Meath and Earl Cowley. On the death of his father in 1895 the respondent succeeded to these titles, which were by the letters patent aforesaid limited to the first earl and the heirs male of his body lawfully begotten and to be begotten. On December 17, 1889, the respondent married the petitioner, who is a daughter of the Marquis of Abergavenny. There is one child of the marriage—a boy, Christian Arthur Wellesley—who is now by courtesy called by his father's inferior title, Viscount Dangan. The petitioner on June 17, 1896, instituted a suit in this Court for divorce from the respondent, and on February 2, 1897, obtained a decree nisi for the dissolution of her marriage with him, on the ground of his desertion and adultery. This decree was made absolute on August 9, 1897. The petitioner afterwards married her present husband, Mr. Biddulph. Notwithstanding that her marriage with the respondent has been dissolved and that she has married again, the petitioner has without any sanction from the Crown continued to use, and still uses, the style or title Countess Cowley. For example, in her affidavit in opposition to this motion she describes herself as Violet Countess Cowley, and signs herself Violet Cowley. No objection seems to have been made by the respondent to this use of the title by the petitioner between the date of the said final decree and the lady's second marriage; but since she has become the wife of Mr. Biddulph the respondent has made formal objection to the petitioner's using the title Countess Cowley. On December 14, 1898, the respondent's solicitors wrote on his behalf to the petitioner's solicitors a letter in the following terms:—

"Dec. 14, 1898.

"Gentlemen,—We presume that you still act for the Lady Violet Biddulph, formerly Countess Cowley. We have been consulted by the Earl Cowley in reference to the fact that, although married to Mr. Biddulph, the lady continues to use the title 'Countess Cowley,' notwithstanding it was she who sought the divorce, and by her own volition obtained a dissolution of the marriage. As long as Lady Violet was unmarried there may have been some ground for her continuing to bear her late husband's name. Although we believe that this is a moot legal point, now, however, that she has remarried there cannot be the slightest doubt about the matter. While very anxious to avoid any unnecessary annoyance, we are instructed by Lord Cowley to request that the Lady Violet will cease using his name and adopt the only and very honourable one to which she is now entitled—viz., Lady Violet Biddulph. Trusting that we may hear from you that this course will be adopted.

"We are yours, &c.,

WONTNER AND SONS.

"Messrs. Lewis and Lewis."

*Reported by J. H. MURPHY, Esq., Barrister-at Law.

A letter in reply was received from the petitioner's solicitors as follows :—

“ Dec. 15, 1898.

“ Gentlemen,—We are in receipt of yours of the 14th inst. In reply to your inquiry, we have to inform you that Countess Cowley intends to retain the same name as her son, notwithstanding that she has been compelled to divorce her husband on the grounds of his desertion and adultery.

Yours,

“ LEWIS AND LEWIS.

“ Messrs. Wontner and Sons.”

On July 6, 1899, the respondent's solicitors wrote a letter to the petitioner's solicitors, in which the following passage occurs :—“ Thirdly, we are again instructed to ask that Lady Violet Biddulph ceases to call herself by the name and title of ‘ Countess Cowley.’ We have made research into the matter, and find that she undoubtedly has no right to so call herself, the only person entitled to now bear the title being Lord Cowley's mother, who since the divorce has become the only Countess Cowley, and has also instructed us on her behalf and requested us to ask that the Lady Violet should cease to bear this name and title. We are writing you this in order, if possible, that some arrangement shall be arrived at on these points, which we desire to settle amicably, but unless we can come to some settlement within the next week we shall have to apply to the Court without further delay.” To this letter the petitioner's solicitors replied on July 7, so far as is material as follows :—“ It is useless you writing again to ask that Lady Cowley shall call herself by any name other than the Countess Cowley ; all that we have to say upon that subject we have already said. We observe that you will now go to the Court. . . . We are prepared at any time to receive notice of motion on behalf of Lady Cowley.” The respondent then moved the Court in the old suit between the parties to restrain the petitioner from using the style or title aforesaid, on the ground that by so doing she was guilty of molestation. The motion was supported by the respondent's mother, the Dowager Countess Cowley. Upon the motion coming on before the Court it seemed to me that the real questions raised between the parties were not strictly questions of molestation but these—viz., whether the petitioner is entitled to use the style or title in question, and, if not, whether the respondent has any right to obtain an injunction in the High Court to restrain the petitioner from so doing ; and that these questions could not be dealt with in a divorce suit which was at an end except so far as the Court has jurisdiction to entertain applications with regard to the custody, maintenance, and education of the child of the marriage during his minority. It was therefore agreed by counsel for the parties that the motion should be heard as if it was a motion to restrain the petitioner from using the style or title Countess Cowley in a suit for that purpose brought in the High Court, and the arguments proceeded on that basis. The first question, then, is whether the petitioner is entitled to use the style or title Countess Cowley. The petitioner, although the daughter of the Marquis of Abergavenny, was in the legal sense a “ commoner.” At the time of her marriage with the respondent he had not succeeded to the peerage, but when his father died, in 1895, he became Earl Cowley and a peer. The petitioner by virtue of her union with the respondent became a peeress, for husband and wife are regarded in certain respects as one person in law, and a woman who is married to a peer of the realm becomes entitled to the same dignity as her husband, and acquires all the rights and privileges of peerage which are consistent with her sex. For instance, if she is accused of treason or felony she can only be tried by the House of Peers.

The statute 20 Henry VI., cap. 9, declared what would seem to have been the common law :—“ That ladies of great estate in respect of their husbands, peers of the land, married or sole, that is to say, duchesses, countesses, baronesses, should be put to answer and judged before such Judges and peers of the realm as peers of the realm should be if they were indicted or impeached, and in like manner and form and none otherwise.” The petitioner then on the respondent becoming a peer shared his dignity, and as his wife her style and title was countess, being the Norman feminine which corresponds with earl. (Seldon on Titles of Honour, Ed. 1672, c. 5, p. 526.) Her marriage with him has, however, been dissolved ; and she has married again to a commoner, and she has lost her dignity aforesaid, and all the rights and privileges annexed to it. What her legal name, position, or dignity was between the time of the dissolution of her first marriage and her second marriage was not discussed before me, and it is not necessary to consider this, for there can be no doubt that, being legally a commoner by birth and only a peeress by marriage with Lord Cowley, on her second marriage she took her present husband's position, and her proper legal description became Violet, the wife of Robert E. Myddleton Biddulph, and, as the daughter of a marquis, she would be called by courtesy Lady Violet Myddleton Biddulph. The law on the subject is strictly stated in cap. 3, section 83 of “ Cruise on Dignities ” as follows :—“ If a woman who has acquired a dignity by marriage afterwards marries a commoner, she loses her dignity and all the rights and privileges annexed to it, for that which is gained by marriage may be lost by marriage. Eodem modo quo quid constitutum dissolutum.” This is in accord with all the old authorities :—“ Acton's case ” (Rep., pt. 4, fol. 118 B) ; “ Countess of Cleveland's case ” (Rep., pt. 6, fol. 53 B) ; “ Brooke's Abridgment ” (Tit nosme de dignit., 69) ; Co. Litt., 166 ; 2 Inst., 50 ; “ Duchess of Suffolk's case ” (Ow., 81, “ Comyn's Digest,” Tit. Dig., c. 6) ; “ Fortesque de Laudibus,” 97. In the case of “ Hayward v. Duke of Suffolk ” in Hil. term (6 and 7 Ed. VI., reported in Dyer, 79 B) a writ of partition was brought against the Duke of Suffolk and his wife and others by Ranulph Hayward, Esq., and Lady Anne Powys, his wife, and so she was named in the suit. An exception was taken for misnomer because she ought only to have been called by the name of her husband and not otherwise. In the opinion of Montague, C.J. and Hales, J., the exception was good and the reason given was that “ by the law of God she was under the power of her husband and so her name of dignity shall be changed according to the degree of her husband notwithstanding the courtesy of the ladies of honour and of the Court.” Upon which the plaintiff brought a new writ to Ranulph Hayward and Anne his wife—late wife of the Lord Powys, deceased. Further, in “ Lady Dacres's case ” in 1661, when she had petitioned the House of Lords claiming the privilege of Parliament, the House declared (having received the opinion of all the Judges there present in point of law) that the Lady Dacres by marrying a commoner had forfeited and lost her privilege of peerage in law. (Journal, H.L., vol. 11, p. 298.) Also in 1692 the House of Lords ordered and declared that privilege of Parliament should not be allowed to minor peers, noblemen, or widows of peers saving the right of peerage, and that, if the widow of any peer should be married to any commoner, she should not be allowed the privilege of peerage. (H. of L. Journal, vol. 15, 241, Feb. 21, 1692.) I may also refer to the following passage in his work on the order of precedence by the late Sir Charles George Young, Garter Principal King of Arms (1851), p. 75 :—“ The widows of peers, baronets, knights of the order and knights bachelors are entitled to enjoy the same style and rank which they derived from their husbands so long as they remain unmarried, but on marrying again they have no other style or rank than that which the second husband may confer upon them, it being the established law that what a woman gains by marriage she loses by marriage." So far the law is clear, and on the argument before me the petitioner's counsel did not seek to maintain that the petitioner was still entitled to her former dignity of peeress or to a legal right in the title in question; but he contended that she was justified in continuing to use her former title by some usage of society. No authority, precedent, or evidence was produced in support of this contention, and this is not surprising, for a case which would give rise to a question such as that under consideration cannot often have occurred. The only foundation for the contention was the following passage in Stephen's Commentaries, vol. 2 (12th edition), p. 605:—"By courtesy or the usage of society all dowager peeresses though afterwards married to commoners are ordinarily addressed by their former title." This statement was not supported by the citation of any further authorities; and, even if it be correct, this courtesy or usage of society (a somewhat vague term) is of no legal force or validity and cannot alter the legal positions and titles of dowager peeresses (not in their own right) who have afterwards married commoners. They no longer have any right to their former privileges, rank, and titles, and it is therefore difficult to understand why any one in such a position should without the sanction of the Crown allow herself to be addressed by a title not hers as of right even though there may be a usage of society to do so. There is this important feature in connexion with this subject—that in certain cases, of which instances are given in the affidavit filed in this case of Sir Albert William Woods, K.C.B., K.C.M.G., Garter Principal King of Arms, the Sovereign in the exercise of the Royal prerogative has expressly sanctioned the retention by dowager peeresses (not in their own right) marrying below their rank of their former titles, ranks, and precedence, and has directed memorials thereof to be recorded in the register books of the College of Arms. There is a further answer to the contention aforesaid. It is obvious that the courtesy or usage of society, if correctly stated with regard to dowager peeresses (not in their own right) who have afterwards married commoners, has no application to the present case, when the petitioner's first husband is alive and is objecting to the use by her of a style or title which she only acquired as his wife, she now being the wife of another person. It was further argued that the petitioner is justified in calling herself Countess Cowley, because a person is entitled to call himself or herself by any name, and cannot be restrained from doing so. In support of this contention certain cases were cited to show that the Courts will not restrain the use of a family name. The principal of these was the case of "Du Boulay v. Du Boulay" (L.R., 2 P.C., 430), where Lord Chelmsford in delivering the judgment of the Privy Council said:—"In this country we do not recognize the absolute right of a person to a particular name to the extent of entitling him to prevent the assumption of that name by a stranger. The right to the exclusive use of a name in connexion with a trade or business is familiar to our law, and any person using that name after a relative right of this description has been acquired by another is considered to have been guilty of a fraud, or at least of an invasion of another's right, and renders himself liable to an action, or he may be restrained from the use of the name by injunction. But the mere assumption of a name which is the patronymic of a family by a stranger who had never before been called by that name whatever cause of annoyance it may be to the family is a grievance for which our law affords no redress." The foundation of this is that, except in certain cases, when the right to exclusive use of a name in connexion with a trade or business has been acquired, there is by English law no right of property in a person to the use of a particular name to the extent of enabling him to prevent the assumption of his name by another. But the argument omitted to notice the difference between the use of a name and the use of a title. The law as to the former is as above stated, but as to the latter the position is entirely different. Titles of honour or, in the language of the law, dignities are conferred by the exercise of the Royal prerogative. Among them the principal is that of the Peerage. The dignities of the peerage having been originally annexed to lands were considered as tenements or incorporeal hereditaments wherein a person might have a real estate; and although dignities are now become little more than personal honours and rights, yet they are still classed under the head of real property. (Cruise, c. 4, s. 1; Co. Litt., 16 B.) The grant of the dignity in the present case was to the grantee and the heirs male of his body and created an estate in tail male. Lord Cowley had the exclusive right to the use of his titles, but on his marriage his wife became a sharer in his dignity and Countess Cowley. Even if she had become his widow, and Dowager Countess Cowley, she would have lost all the privileges she had acquired by her marriage if she married again to a commoner. She is now no longer the respondent's wife, but the wife of Mr. Biddulph; and, although she does not desire to represent that she is now the respondent's wife, she is still using the style or title which can only lawfully be used by a woman who is the wife of the respondent, and is not merely assuming a name to the use of which objection could not be raised. I am, therefore, of opinion that the petitioner is not entitled to use the style or title Countess Cowley. The next and more difficult question is whether the respondent is entitled to obtain an injunction to restrain the petitioner from using the style or title aforesaid. The first point made against him was that, as his marriage with the petitioner had been dissolved in consequence of his misconduct, the present motion was one which he ought not to have made and ought not to be entertained by the Court; to which it was answered that the respondent's conduct, which led to the dissolution of the marriage, did not affect the present question, and that the petitioner's real reason for using the title was to annoy the respondent and not (as alleged in the letter of her solicitors above set out and in her affidavit) to retain the same name as her son. Upon this point, whatever view may be taken of the course adopted by the respondent in bringing forward this motion, it is necessary to observe that the Court has to deal with the rights of the parties whose marriage has been dissolved and who are now strangers to each other; and, in my opinion, the legal questions now raised do not depend on the cause which led to the dissolution of the marriage in this case. With regard to the suggestion of a desire on the part of the petitioner to annoy the respondent, it is to be noted that there is nothing in the evidence to show that she is actuated by any such desire, though it seems strange that she should wish to use her former title in the circumstances instead of her present legal name, and though the reason given by her for wishing to retain the same name as her son is one which it is difficult to appreciate, seeing that during his father's lifetime the son will neither have the name nor title of Cowley. The main point made against the respondent was that the Court has no jurisdiction to grant the injunction asked for. This was based upon the cases which deal with the right of a person to assume any name he may choose, and upon the contention that the Court will not interfere by injunction when the relations between the parties are strictly of a personal nature and no question of proprietary rights are at issue. I have pointed out the difference between the assumption of a name and of a title or dignity such as that in question. With regard to the contention last mentioned it is to be observed that it overlooks the proprietary rights which the respondent has in his dignities. He is entitled to share them with any lady whom he may make his wife, and, in my opinion, to assert that no other woman shall use the privilege which his wife should share with him. It may be observed further that if the petitioner were to assert that she was still the wife of the respondent she would be subject to a suit in this Court for jactitation of marriage, which is founded on the injury which may be done to a complainant by a person representing that he or she is the husband or wife as the case may be of the complainant, "Lord Hawke v. Corri" (2 Hagg. Cons. Rpts., 280). This is not the position asserted by the petitioner; yet she asserts that she is justified in describing herself in a manner which represents that she is still sharing his dignity with the respondent, and by the style or title which only describes, and can only be used lawfully by a person who is, the wife of the respondent. There has been, and is, in my opinion, an invasion by the petitioner of the respondent's rights. There is in the legal sense a wrong done to the respondent, without lawful excuse, and intentionally, although an actual desire to annoy him is not established. In conclusion, it is important to notice, upon the question of the power of the Court to interfere by injunction, that this is not a case in which a right is asserted by the petitioner to the dignity of a peerage. In cases of that character the jurisdiction of the Court is exercised on petition, which may be referred in the first instance to the Attorney-General for examination and then, if necessary, to the House of Lords for investigation (Cruise, cap. 6). The facts of this case are not in dispute, and, if my view of the law be correct, there is no assertion by the Court of any jurisdiction to deal with a matter which should be considered elsewhere, and the remedy by injunction seems both applicable and convenient. The result is that, in my judgment, there must be an injunction restraining the petitioner from using the title or style of Countess Cowley.

Mr. BARNARD applied that the petitioner should have the costs of this motion. Originally the motion was made on three grounds—(1) for access to the child, (2) to reduce the amount of maintenance, and (3) for an injunction. The first and second questions had been dealt with in Chambers, and the petitioner had succeeded on those points.

Mr. DEANE.—I abandoned the second point, but the first still stands adjourned.

Mr. JUSTICE GORELL BARNES.—I think the proper course is to make no order as to this part of the case, and to leave the parties to bear their own costs. The costs of the matter in Chambers will be dealt with there. The order for the injunction will not be drawn up for a week, in case the petitioner should desire to take the opinion of a higher Court, as it is highly undesirable that an injunction should issue while an appeal is pending.

IN RE PRICE—TOMLIN V. LATTER.*

Power of Appointment—Exercise by will—Foreign will.

The will of a foreigner, valid by the law of his country, though invalid by our law, held to operate as an execution of a general power of appointment over personalty conferred upon the testatrix by an English will.

This case raised a somewhat important question of private international law. Shortly stated, it was whether a will, executed by a naturalized French subject domiciled in France, and valid according to French law, could operate as an execution of a general power of appointment over personalty conferred upon the testatrix by an English will, notwithstanding that the appointment would have been invalid according to English law for the reason that it was not attested by two witnesses as required by the Wills Act. The question arose under the will of Dame Elizabeth Price, dated March 28, 1876. By it she bequeathed a sum of £2,000 to trustees upon trust for investment and payment of the income to "Maria (daughter of my late cousin Mary Ann Draper) now the wife of M. Adolphe Gay" during her life for her separate use without power of anticipation. The will then proceeded:—"And from and after her decease to pay and transfer the last mentioned sum of £2,000 in such manner as she, the said Maria Gay, shall by her last will appoint, and in default of such appointment then to such person or persons as would at the time of her decease be the next-of-kin of the said Maria Gay in case she had died intestate and without being married." The testatrix died on March 18, 1878. At the date of the will Maria Gay was the wife of Adolphe Gay, a French subject domiciled in France. M. Gay died on October 12, 1882, and on October 8, 1886, Madame Gay married M. Auguste Forfillier, also a French subject domiciled in France. Madame Forfillier on June 2, 1887, made a holograph will in the French language. By it she bequeathed to her husband, M. Forfillier, everything which she possessed at the present moment, and which she thereafter might possess, and appointed him guardian of her daughter by her first marriage; and she declared that her will annulled all the others, and should "thus be considered in England the same as in France." Madame Forfillier died on February 16, 1898; and on October 3, 1898, letters of administration with the will annexed were granted by the Probate Division to the defendant, Edward Latter, as the attorney of M. Forfillier. The case came before the Court upon a summons taken out by the trustees of Lady Price's will to have it determined who was entitled to the fund of £2,000.

Mr. A. à Beckett Terrell appeared for the trustees of Lady Price's will; Mr. Waggett for M. Forfillier, claiming under the alleged appointment; and Mr. Bovill for parties representing the next-of-kin of Madame Gay.

Mr. JUSTICE STIRLING, in giving judgment, said that the first question was whether the word "will" in the instrument creating the power meant any testamentary instrument recognized by the law of England as a will, or a will executed in accordance with the law of England. His Lordship then considered the authorities on the point, and came to the conclusion that he ought to follow the case of "D'Huart v. Harkness" (34 Beav., 324), which was precisely in point, and in which it was held that the will there under consideration was a valid execution of the power. He distinguished the case now before the Court from a decision to the contrary effect by Mr. Justice Kay in "In re Kirwan's Trusts" (25 Ch. D., 373), which had been followed by Mr. Justice Kekewich in a later case of "Hummel v. Hummel" ([1898] 1 Ch., 642), pointing out that the last-named learned Judge did not regard the cases of "D'Huart v. Harkness" and "In re

*Reported by G. A. STREETEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Kirwan's Trusts " as inconsistent one with the other. His Lordship (Mr. Justice Stirling) moreover thought that on principle "D'Huart v. Harkness" was well decided. The general rule was that, as stated by Mr. Dicey (Conflict of Laws, 685), "any will of movables which was valid according to the law of the testator's domicile at the time of his death is valid" in England. It followed that the provisions of an English statute prescribing formalities with reference to wills did not apply to the wills of persons not domiciled in England. Section 9 of the Wills Act prescribed that "no will shall be valid unless it shall be in writing and executed in manner hereinafter mentioned." Notwithstanding that language, it was the practice of the Probate Division to admit to probate (as had been done in this case) the wills of persons domiciled abroad, although executed otherwise than was prescribed by the Act. His Lordship failed to see why the provisions of section 10 (which provided that appointments by will must be executed like other wills) should apply to the will of Mme. Forfillier any more than those of section 9. In his opinion, therefore, it was competent for Mme. Forfillier to exercise the power by such a will as had been recognized by the Probate Division. He then considered the point whether, according to the construction of her will, she had done so, and came to the conclusion, having regard to the rules of English law, which he held to be applicable in this case, that the will operated as an execution of the power, and that M. Forfillier was entitled to the fund.

EVANS V. JUSTICES OF CONWAY.*

Licensing Acts—Licence—Refusal to renew—Appeal to quarter sessions—Licensing justices not appearing on the appeal—Procedure.

This was a special case stated for the opinion of the Court by the justices of Carnarvonshire. The appellant, Evans, appealed to the Carnarvonshire Quarter Sessions against a decision of the licensing justices, sitting at the annual licensing meeting, held at Carnarvon on September 25, 1899, refusing to renew the licence of the Royal Oak Inn, Conway. The appeal to quarter sessions came on on October 19, 1899. The following facts were proved or admitted:—(1) The appellant was the holder of a licence for the sale of intoxicating liquors in respect of a house known as the Royal Oak Inn, Conway. (2) The appellant appeared by counsel in support of the appeal and to apply for the renewal of the licence. (3) No one appeared on behalf of the justices who sat at the adjourned annual licensing meeting. (4) A solicitor appeared for the Rev. T. Gwynedd-Roberts, who had objected to the renewal of the licence at the adjourned general annual licensing meeting. (5) It was contended on behalf of the appellant that the solicitor for the Rev. T. Gwynedd-Roberts had no locus standi, and that, as no one appeared on behalf of the justices, the appellant was entitled to have his appeal allowed and his licence renewed. (6) The Court of quarter sessions overruled these contentions and decided to hear the appeal. Thereupon counsel for the appellant, having formally proved that due notice of the appeal had been served upon all the justices who sat at the adjourned general annual licensing meeting, and that the appellant, together with two sureties, had duly entered into the required recognizances, applied for the renewal of the licence. The Court, without opposition to the renewal of the licence, dismissed the appeal and refused to renew the licence. The question for the opinion of the High Court was whether the Court of quarter sessions were right.

Mr. TREVOR LLOYD, for the appellant, submitted that the Court of quarter sessions were wrong. Since "Boulter v. Kent Justices" ([1897] A.C., 556) and "Tynemouth Corporation v. Attorney-General" ([1899] A.C., 293) it was clear that the only parties to the appeal to quarter sessions were the appellant and the justices, and a private objector alone could not be heard. Here the justices did not appear. "Sharpe v. Wakefield" ([1891] A.C., 173) showed that upon an appeal from a refusal to renew the burden of proof that the appellant was not entitled to his renewal was on the respondent. Section 42 of the Licensing Act, 1872, showed that prima facie the applicant for a renewal in the Court below was entitled to the renewal, and "Whiffin v. Malling Justices" ([1892] 1 Q.B., 362) showed that the same was true at the Court of quarter sessions. Section 27 of 9 Geo. IV., cap. 61, was the appeal section. The Court of quarter sessions had simply said, "You shan't have the licence."

Mr. ELLIS GRIFFITH, for the justices, submitted that at quarter sessions, although it was a rehearing, the onus of proof, if any, was upon the appellant. He cited "Archbold's Quarter Sessions," 4th Edition, p. 724, and "Paley on Summary Convictions," p. 307. The hearing before the quarter sessions was, like that before the licensing justices, a mere inquiry by the justices to see if it was proper to grant the renewal. The quarter sessions, which conducted such inquiry, were no more a Court acting judicially than were the licensing justices (see "Reg. v. Staffordshire Justices" [1898], 2 Q.B., 231). The rule usually followed that on the appeal the licensing justices were heard first was a mere matter of procedure and implied no onus of proof. If the appellant's contention were accepted, unless the licensing justices appeared upon the appeal, the whole of the inquiry before the licensing justices would go for nothing. That was an absurdity too great to be supported.

Mr. TREVOR LLOYD, in reply, contended that, if the justices were right, the appellant on his appeal would be in a worse position than he was before the licensing justices, for without having any objection to meet he would be obliged to give affirmative evidence of the good character of his house. If the appeal was a rehearing, it was a rehearing de novo, and the rule applied that all evidence of objection must be taken on oath. If no such evidence was forthcoming, the appellant was entitled to the renewal of the licence.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

MR. JUSTICE CHANNELL said that the case was one of very considerable difficulty, and he hoped that the parties would be able to take the opinion of another tribunal. The difficulty arose in this way:—Licensing law, although it had from time to time been much altered by legislation, was a matter of old standing. Practices had grown up in regard to it based upon an idea which, in "Boulter v. Kent Justices," the House of Lords had now decided was wrong. Before the decision in that case it had been supposed that proceedings relating to licences before justices were litigation of the ordinary kind, that persons who objected to the granting or renewal of licences were parties to the proceedings, and that questions as to costs were to be decided as in an ordinary Court of justice. "Boulter v. Kent Justices," however, decided that in the proceedings at the annual licensing meeting the objector was not a party, and that the quarter sessions had no power to order costs against him. In an appeal to quarter sessions the quarter sessions were substituted for the licensing justices. In "Tynemouth Corporation v. the Attorney-General" the question arose as to the costs of an objector at quarter sessions. The question was whether the costs of a municipal corporation, who appeared as objectors to the renewal of a licence on an appeal to quarter sessions, were payable out of the borough fund. In considering that question it was necessary to consider the nature of the appeal, and it was held that the corporation had no power to appear at the quarter sessions. The licensing justices, on the other hand, might appear to support their decision, but it did not follow that they were bound to do so. They might prefer to take up an independent position and not to appear as litigants in a matter on which they had given their decision. That was a very proper attitude for them to adopt. If an objector to the renewal of a licence did appear at quarter sessions it could only be by leave of the Court and as amicus curiæ. The question now was, when an objector came to the quarter sessions and it was pointed out to them that he had no right to appear, what, in those circumstances, this administrative tribunal was to do. The appellant proved that he held a licence for the preceding year. He was, therefore, in the position of a person having a prima facie right to a renewal. The question was how were the quarter sessions entitled to deal with that right? His Lordship thought that the justices at quarter sessions, being an administrative tribunal, and knowing that the licensing justices had refused the renewal of the licence, were entitled to hold some inquiry before they granted it; and he did not think that the justices were the less entitled because, if the licensing justices appeared, the quarter sessions generally called upon them to begin. He assumed that what took place before the quarter sessions was as follows:—No one was present to represent the licensing justices, so the justices inquired of the appellant's counsel what he had to say; he replied that he had nothing to say; the justices, who may have thought that there was possibly something behind, thereupon refused to grant the renewal. The case was a puzzle, and his Lordship had very great doubt about it. But to hold the contrary of what he now held would be ridiculous. To hold that, while those who succeeded before the licensing justices were not entitled to be heard on the appeal before the quarter sessions, the appellant was entitled to have his licence renewed as a matter of course, if the licensing justices did not appear, was so absurd that it was necessary to find a way out of that conclusion. The way out of it, in his Lordship's opinion, was that, though the appellant had a prima facie right to a renewal, yet the decision of the licensing justices was sufficient to displace that right if the appellant refused to go on and give evidence of his qualification to hold the licence.

MR. JUSTICE BUCKNILL said that he had no doubt that when, on September 25, the licensing authority had to consider the question of the renewal of the appellant's licence, the appellant came before them having a right to a renewal unless it were displaced on good grounds. The licensing justices thought that that prima facie right was displaced, and that the appellant was not a proper person to have a renewal. The next step was taken by the appellant when he appealed to the quarter sessions. At the hearing at quarter sessions an advocate got up and stated that he appeared on behalf of a person who had objected to the renewal in the Court below. The appellant's counsel objected that he had no locus standi. The quarter sessions overruled the objection; but, instead of calling on the objector to give evidence, they called on the appellant's counsel to proceed. The appellant's counsel confined himself to proving the notices of appeal and the recognizances, and refused to give the quarter sessions any further information. Considering that the quarter sessions were entitled to have information about the appeal and that the appellant had refused to give it, he could not say that the quarter sessions were wrong in refusing to upset the decision of the licensing justices.

Leave to appeal was granted.

POUEY V. HORDERN AND OTHERS.*

Power of Appointment—Execution—Validity—Foreign law.

The execution of a power of appointment validly created and given to a foreigner is not affected by any disability which he may be under to dispose of his own property by the laws of his domicile.

This action, which began on Thursday last, raised two questions of private international law. The facts, which were not in dispute, were as follows:—On November 23, 1859, Miss Mary Hamilton Twemlow, the daughter of an English clergyman, married in England a Mr. Alphonse Huber, who was a Prussian subject and domiciled in Rhenish Prussia, where French law was in force. They had three children, the plaintiff, Mme. Pouey, Alexandre Joseph Huber, and the defendant, Mme. Ginestet. About 1866 Mr. and Mrs. Huber separated, and never lived together again. On April 9, 1879, Mrs. Huber's father died intestate, and letters of administration of his estate were granted to another daughter, she and Mrs. Huber being the only two children. On June 7, 1879, Mrs. Huber commenced an action in the Chancery Division against her husband to enforce her equity to a settlement. This action was compromised upon the terms that £2,420 should be paid to Mr. Huber out of his wife's moiety of her father's estate, and that he should release his interest in the residue to trustees for her separate use. Accordingly on June 16, 1880, a deed was executed in which it was witnessed that Mr. Huber should permit his wife to live separate from him and that he released to trustees named therein all the property of his wife and all his own property in her right (except the said £2,420) in trust for his wife for her separate use, so that she might dispose thereof either by deed or will. By a settlement executed on June 17, 1880, Mrs. Huber directed that the trustees named therein should hold £4,000, being part of her share of her father's estate, on trust to pay the income thereof to herself for life and after her death in trust for such of her issue as she should by deed or will appoint. The trustees named in the settlement were the defendants, Herbert Horder and William Burn. An order of the Court was then obtained sanctioning the compromise of June 16, and in pursuance of the same order on August 5 the trust funds were paid to the defendant trustees. By her will, executed in France and dated June 2, 1890, Mrs. Huber, in pursuance of the power of appointment reserved to her in the settlement of June 17, 1880, directed the trustees to pay to her daughter, the defendant, Mme. Ginestet, the sum of £1, to pay to her son A. J. Huber the like sum of £1 and an annuity of £50 for life, and that after the death of her son the said annuity should be paid to her other daughter, the plaintiff, Mme. Pouey, who was also to have the income of the remainder of the trust funds for life, and further directed that after the plaintiff's death the residue of the funds should be divided equally among her grandchildren other than the children of her son. Mrs. Huber died in France on May 7, 1895, and letters of administration were granted in England with the will annexed, but limited so far only as concerned all such personal estate as she by virtue of the settlement had a right to appoint and had appointed. (See "In the goods of Huber" [1896], P. 109.) The defendants, R. A. Ginestet and A. L. Ginestet, both infants, are the children of the defendant Mme. Ginestet. The plaintiff claimed a declaration that the will of Mrs. Huber operated as a valid exercise of the power of appointment conferred on her by the settlement. Mme. Ginestet resisted this claim, on the ground that, since Mrs. Huber either acquired on marriage the same domicile as her husband, or had a French domicile at the date of her death, the exercise of the power of appointment by will, by which Mrs. Huber practically disinherited her daughter, was invalid as contrary to French law, and she claimed to be entitled by French law to one-third of the trust funds. The defendant, Jean Pierre Gautron, raised a different issue. In 1897 proceedings were instituted by one Louise Poincelin, a creditor of Mr. Huber, before the Civil Tribunal of the Seine, against the plaintiff and all the defendants in the present action, except the infant defendants, claiming in effect that according to French law there had always been a community of goods between Mr. and Mrs. Huber, and that consequently, as Mr. Huber could not pay his debts, an administrator should be appointed to manage all the undivided assets of the said community, specifically including the funds in question in the present action. The defendant trustees did not enter an appearance in the French proceedings. On November 27, 1897, the Civil Tribunal found that, as the domicile of Mr. and Mrs. Huber was Rhenish Prussia, a community of goods had been established between them by marriage, and that consequently the compromise of June 16, 1880, was void by French law; and the defendant Gautron was appointed receiver of the funds belonging to the said community, and the defendant trustees were ordered to hand over the funds to him. The defendant Gautron accordingly counterclaimed in the present action that he was entitled to the funds in the hands of the defendant trustees.

Mr. Hughes, Q.C., and Mr. E. J. Schuster appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Bramwell Davis, Q.C., and Mr. J. G. Wood for J. P. Gautron; Mr. H. J. H. Mackay for Madame Ginestet; and Mr. Buckmaster for the trustees and infants.

Mr. HUGHES, after stating the facts, said that briefly his contention as against the counterclaim of Gautron was that his Lordship could not go behind the order of the High Court, by which the compromise and settlement had been sanctioned. The trustees had not appeared in the French proceedings, but it was not necessary for them to do so—"Sirdar Gurdayal Singh and the Rajah of Faridkote" ([1894] A.C., 670)—and they were not bound by them.

Mr. BRAMWELL DAVIS referred to "De Nichols v. Curlier" ([1900] A.C., 21). Community of goods was established between Mr. and Mrs. Huber by marriage, and the consequent incapacity to contract was never brought to the notice of the Judge who made the order. He would call evidence as to what the French law was.

MR. JUSTICE FARWELL.—The order of the English Court was never brought to the notice of the French Court.

M. Gorostazu, in answer to Mr. BRAMWELL DAVIS, said that he was a French advocate practising in London. The compromise of the Chancery action was void by French law. Community of goods could be dissolved only by death, divorce, or judicial decree. The settlement was also void by French law.

TO MR. JUSTICE FARWELL.—Even if the order of the English Court had been before the French tribunal, he believed the compromise would have been held to be void as against the policy of French law.

Herr Eisenmann, formerly a German Judge and now practising as an advocate in Paris, confirmed the previous witness.

MR. JUSTICE FARWELL said that the case raised a curious question. The defendant Gautron counterclaimed as receiver appointed by the French tribunal to be entitled to the funds settled by Mrs. Huber in 1880. He would treat the case as if Huber himself were the plaintiff in the counterclaim, for no creditor had a specific charge, and consequently no creditor subsequent to 1880 could have any greater rights than Huber himself. He assumed that Huber was domiciled in Rhenish Prussia. In 1880 Huber took £2,420 in satisfaction of his claims, and assented to a settlement of the remainder of the property coming to his wife. After 20 years he now came forward and said that he was not bound, because the compromise was contrary to French law. But that compromise was sanctioned by an order of the High Court, and in his Lordship's opinion Huber and every one claiming through him were bound by that order. The money was in England, and Huber voluntarily appeared and submitted to the jurisdiction. The order was a judicial recognition of the validity both of the compromise and of the settlement. It was now argued that the judgment of the French tribunal should be given effect to. He could hardly believe that if the order of the English Court had been before the French tribunal their judgment would have been what it was. He declined to go behind the order of the High Court, and the counter-claim must be dismissed with costs.

MR. MACKAY, on behalf of Mme. Ginestet, then submitted that Mrs. Huber, by French law, could not disinherit her daughter. She had no capacity to exercise the power of appointment contrary to French law. It did not matter for his argument whether Mrs. Huber acquired the domicile of her husband, or was domiciled in France at the time of her death.

MR. HUGHES contended that either the fetter in capacity applied only to Mrs. Huber's own property, whereas she had only a life interest in the trust funds, or the exercise of the power of appointment must be read as part of the settlement which had just been held to be valid. "Tomlin v. Latter" (reported ante, p. 189) seemed a similar case.

MR. JUSTICE FARWELL said that he would reserve judgment.

MR. JUSTICE FARWELL delivered the following judgment:—I have already held that the settlement of June 17, 1880, was a valid settlement, giving Mrs. Huber a life interest with remainder to her issue as she should appoint, and in default of appointment for her children at 21 or marriage. This is an English document to be construed according to English law. Mrs. Huber, being a domiciled Frenchwoman, made her will in France on June 2, 1890, and died May 7, 1895. Her will has been admitted to probate in this country after litigation (Re Huber, sup.). This grant of probate is conclusive that the instrument proved is the will of the testatrix, but is not conclusive as to its construction or the rights to the property disposed of by the will—"D'Huart v. Harkness" (34 Beav., 324). It is contended that the testatrix could not, by French law, dispose of property at all, or, at any rate, having regard to the number of her children, dispose of more than one-fourth. But the power in this case is a special power, and the execution of such a power does not bring the appointed property into the will at all, but operates as a nomination of the persons whose names are to be inserted in the settlement as entitled in remainder in lieu of the power of appointment. There is, therefore, no disposition of property belonging to the testatrix. I desired to make some search to see if I could find any authority against the opinion that I formed yesterday in favour of the will, but so far from having discovered one, I find that Mr. Justice Kay and the learned counsel who argued the case of "Re Kirwan" (25 C.D., 373), all treated the will as a good execution of the power, which in that case was a special power, although the learned Judge held that the will, being ambulatory, became a fraud on the power by subsequent events. In my opinion this appointment is perfectly good. Further, it appears from the report of "Tomlin v. Latter" (ante, p. 189), to which I was referred, that Mr. Justice Stirling came to a similar conclusion in a similar case where the power was general. If the foreign testatrix can exercise a general power, a fortiori, can she exercise a special power? But the distinction between power and property is well settled, and it is really not relevant to the consideration of the execution of a power to inquire whether the donee of such power can dispose of his property, unless, of course, it be the absolute incapacity to execute any document arising from lunacy or the like. Thus it has been held by the Court of Appeal and Sir George Jessel that an infant can exercise by deed a general power of appointment over personalty, at least, if it be not limited to himself in default of appointment—"Re D'Angibau" (15 C.D., 228)—although he can, of course, have no disposing capacity over his own property, because the authority to dispose proceeds from the donor of the power and not from the donee. It follows, therefore, that the execution of any power of appointment validly created and given to a foreigner is in no way affected by any disability which he or she may be under to dispose of his or her own property by the laws of his or her domicile. I, therefore, agree with Mr. Justice Stirling, and on this ground also hold the appointment good.

WARD AND CO. V. WALLIS.*

Mistake—Settlement of claim—Mala fides.

The rule that money paid under compulsion of legal process cannot be recovered back does not apply if there is an absence of bona fides on the part of the person enforcing the legal process, and the same principle governs the converse case where a plaintiff claims too little, having by mistake credited the defendant with a payment which he had not in fact made.

In this case the plaintiffs were cement specialists carrying on business at 15, Great George-street, Westminster. The defendant was Walter Wallis, of Lincoln-house, Ramsden-road, Balham, a builder. The action was brought to recover £75 for work and labour done and materials supplied, and, alternatively, as money had and received by the defendant to the use of the plaintiffs. The facts were as follows:—In January, 1898, the defendant entered into a contract with a Miss Barry for the erection of a mission-hall at Bethnal-green for £2,277. The contract provided that certain patent concrete pavings in the building were to be supplied by the plaintiffs for £126 5s., and this sum was included in the bill of quantities upon which the defendant tendered. The plaintiffs did their work and obtained a certificate from the architect that £125 5s. was due to them, the amount having by agreement been reduced by £1. The plaintiffs applied several times to the defendant for payment. The defendant in answer to one of the applications wrote that, if he did not pay the plaintiffs, the architect was entitled to do so, and to deduct the amount from the contract price, and the defendant stated that he had written to the architect directing him to pay. The architect, however, when applied to by the plaintiffs, said that the defendant had repeatedly promised to pay the plaintiffs and must do so. On April 19, 1899, the plaintiffs issued a writ against the defendant, but instead of claiming the whole amount they gave credit, in error, for a payment on account of £75, leaving a balance due of £50 5s. This mistake arose through the plaintiffs having been paid £75 by a person of the same name as the defendant in respect of another matter, which payment they wrongly credited to the defendant. After being served with the writ, the defendant paid to the plaintiffs the balance of £50 5s. alleged to be due and the costs of the writ, and obtained from the plaintiffs a receipt showing that the whole of their account had been paid by him to them. The defendant forwarded the receipt to the architect, and was paid the balance due to him under the contract, including the full amount of the plaintiffs' account. The plaintiffs subsequently discovered the mistake which they had made in crediting the defendant with a payment of £75 on account and brought this action. On an application under Order 14 the Master gave the plaintiffs liberty to sign judgment for the amount claimed. The defendant appealed, and it was ordered that the case should be tried as a short cause. The defendant had filed an affidavit in which he stated that he considered that the architect was the person liable to the plaintiffs, but that, in the circumstances of the plaintiffs giving him credit for £75, he paid the balance claimed by way of settlement instead of contesting the action, to which he considered he had a good defence. It was contended on behalf of the defendant that the present action would not lie, there having been a settlement of the plaintiffs' claim in the previous action. The case was argued a few days ago and was adjourned in order that the defendant might, if he desired, go into the witness-box and give evidence. To-day counsel stated that the defendant did not desire to give evidence.

Mr. Loehnis appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Alan Macpherson for the defendant.

MR. JUSTICE KENNEDY, in delivering judgment, after stating the facts, said that the defendant had not availed himself of the opportunity which had been given him to go into the witness-box, and the conclusion which his Lordship came to was that the defendant knew, when he was served with the writ in the first action, that he was being wrongly credited with a payment on account of £75, and the defendant's counsel could not deny that after the defendant had received the money due under the contract from the architect he ought, acting conscientiously, either to have returned the £75 to the architect or to have paid it over to the plaintiffs, explaining to them the mistake which had been made. Instead of doing that the defendant retained the money. His Lordship could not understand the defendant's position, for there could only be one opinion of such conduct. Then the present action was brought, and the defendant then said that he would pay, but only on the terms that the plaintiffs paid the defendant his costs. The defendant said that he had a legal defence to the first action and that there was injustice in suing him again. The defendant was of course entitled to take his stand upon his strict legal rights, and if he had a defence to the present action effect must be given to it.

*Reported by F. O. ROBINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The points raised by the case were not free from difficulty. In the first place the plaintiffs claimed to recover the £75 for work and labour done and materials supplied. Now as to that there had been a settlement of the plaintiffs' claim, in the sense that the defendant had satisfied the claim in the terms of a legal process demanding payment. According to the principle of the English law, an example of which was to be found in the case of "Marriot v. Hampton" (2 Smith's Leading Cases, 10th edition, 409), a settlement of a claim made under legal process could not be reopened. "Marriot v. Hampton" was the converse of the present case, for there a person being sued for the price of goods sold, and having lost his receipt, which was his only proof of payment, submitted to judgment. He afterwards found the receipt, and sought to recover the amount which had been wrongfully recovered from him. It was held that after a recovery by process of law the matter could not be reopened. In "Moore v. Vestry of Fulham" ([1895] 1 Q.B., 399) it was attempted to be shown that "Marriot v. Hampton" was decided on the ground of res judicata; but that was not so, the ground of the decision was that it was in the interests of public policy for there to be an end to litigation. The present case, though the converse of that case, was, in his Lordship's opinion, governed by it in principle, and the plaintiffs were not entitled to bring a fresh action for work and labour done, or to sue for money had and received to their use, which was the second and alternative head of claim, except under certain special circumstances. What were the circumstances under which such an action might be maintained? It was clear from the cases cited in the notes to "Marriot v. Hampton" that the principle that money paid under process of law was not recoverable did not apply if there was an absence of bona fides on the part of the person enforcing the legal process, and his Lordship was of opinion that the same principle applied in the converse case, such as the present, in which the settlement under legal process was not merely owing to the mistake of fact on the part of the plaintiffs in crediting the defendant with a payment which he had never made; but there was the further fact that the defendant knew at the time that the mistake had been made. It was not conscientious of the defendant merely to pay the alleged balance, remaining silent as to the mistake which had been made, and the settlement, although under legal process, was not bona fide. It did not seem to make any difference that the plaintiffs sought to recover as money had and received money which the defendant had not actually received, but for which they had been given credit, for it was clearly settled that money allowed in account was equivalent to payment. On these grounds his Lordship held that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover the £75 as money had and received by the defendant to their use. A further point had been raised, that the payment of the money by the architect to the defendant made it money had and received for the plaintiffs, but his Lordship did not agree with this view. The money had been paid by the architect under a mistake of fact, and it was not received by the defendant on behalf of the plaintiffs.

THE LONDON AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY
V. WALKER AND ANOTHER, TRADING AS THE RUGBY PORTLAND CEMENT COMPANY.*

Lands Clauses Acts—Railway company—Arbitration—Award—Duty to take up award—Mandamus.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (15 The Times L.R., 329) affirmed.

The question in this appeal was of a purely technical character. The appeal was from an order of the Court of Appeal (Lords Justices A. L. Smith and Romer, Lord Justice Collins dissenting), affirming an order of Mr. Justice Wills and Mr. Justice Kennedy, and dated April 24, 1899. The case is reported below. (15 The Times L.R., 329; L.R. [1899], 1 Q.B., 921; 68 L.J., Q.B., 685, sub nom., "Reg. v. London and North-Western Railway Company."*) The Divisional Court ordered that a writ of mandamus should issue commanding the appellants to take up an award made by Mr. T. F. Brown under an Act of 1846, by which the London and Birmingham Railway was amalgamated with the appellant company. The award fixed the amount of compensation or purchase money to be paid by the appellants to the respondents in respect of certain mines and minerals belonging to the latter which the cement company had recently formed the intention of working. The questions were whether the rights and liabilities of the railway company and the adjoining owners in relation to minerals lying under or adjacent to such railways as were made before 1846 were still governed by the provisions of the Acts of Parliament under which such railways were made or were altered by the incorporation of the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 1846, into the private Act of 1846 above referred to; and, secondly, if the Railway Clauses Act was inapplicable the appellants were entitled to a refusal of the rule for a mandamus to take up the award. Lords Justices A. L. Smith and Romer were against the appellants on the first point. Lord Justice Romer, however, expressed no opinion on the second, on which also Lord Justice A. L. Smith was against the appellants.

Sir Edward Clarke, Q.C., Mr. Page, Q.C., and Mr. Arthur Underhill were for the appellants; Mr. Cohen, Q.C., Mr. Dugdale, Q.C., Mr. Noble, and Mr. Pease for the respondents were not heard.

The LORD CHANCELLOR, in moving that the appeal be dismissed with costs, said that this was an arbitration properly constituted under the Railway Clauses Act, and the questions whether or not the subject matter of the arbitration was properly entered into and the rights of the parties regulated by the earlier or later statutes were really irrelevant. In these circumstances the railway company was bound to take up the award although the rights of the parties were not thereby concluded but might be decided at a later period by an action upon the award. Prima facie the award was valid. If it could be made out that the proceedings were coram non iudice it might be different, but it was admitted that the umpire was rightly appointed and that the proceedings were regular. In these circumstances the appeal must be dismissed.

The other noble and learned Lords concurred.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (15 The Times L.R., 205), affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal, dated February 15, 1899, whereby was reversed a judgment of Mr. Justice Phillimore, sitting in the Admiralty Division, dated January 27, 1899. The hearing below is reported in 15 The Times L.R., 205; L.R. [1899], P., 127; and 68 L.J., P., 26. The action was brought by the respondents to recover damages in respect of a collision between the appellants' steamship Mediana and the respondents' lightship Comet, which was then being employed upon the Crosby station, off the River Mersey. The appellants admitted their liability, subject to a reference to the district registrar assisted by merchants. On December 3, 1898, the appellants agreed with the respondents all the items of the respondents' claim except No. 8, loss of the use of the lightship Comet, or hire of the services of the lightship Orion on the station from April 23, 1898, to July 6, 1898, 74 days at £4 4s., £310 16s. The appellants agreed that the amount claimed in respect of this item was correct, if such claim was recoverable. The reference was heard before the district registrar on December 8, 1898, and by his report, dated December 12, 1898, he allowed such item No. 8. The appellants carried in notice of objection to the registrar's report, and Mr. Justice Phillimore allowed the objection. The appeal was heard before Lords Justices Smith and Collins, who allowed it with costs. The respondents, the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, the owners of the Comet and Orion, who are a public body charged by Act of Parliament with the duty of lighting the approaches to the River Mersey, keep six lightships, four of which are always in use on four stations, a fifth is kept to replace the lightship, and at a time when they are being overhauled, and the sixth is kept in the River Mersey in readiness to take the place of any lightship which may be damaged by collision or other accident. During the last 25 years there have been 23 cases of damage by collision with lightships, in 11 of which it has been necessary to replace the lightship by the one kept in readiness in the River Mersey, and during the same period there have been four cases in which it has been necessary to withdraw one of the lightships in consequence of damage not occasioned by collision. The expense of maintaining the sixth lightship, including interest on capital invested in her, was stated by the marine surveyor to the respondents to amount to about £1,000 a year. The Orion, the sixth lightship, took the place of the Comet after she had been damaged by collision, and it was admitted that during the 74 days on which she took the place of the Comet she was not required for any other purpose. The admitted items of claim covered all the actual out of pocket expenses to which the respondents were put by reason of the substitution of the Orion for the Comet, and the only question in dispute was whether the respondents were entitled to be paid for the loss of the use of the Comet during the 74 days she was under repair, or were entitled to hire of the Orion which took her place. It was contended on behalf of the appellants that inasmuch as the work of the Comet was performed by the Orion, another of the respondents' lightships, which would not have been otherwise employed, the respondents sustained no loss or damage in respect of their not being able to use the Comet, and that they were not entitled to any hire for the use of the Orion as they expended no extra money or sustained no loss or damage through not having the use of her owing to the collision, and that it was immaterial whether she was merely laid up at anchor in the River Mersey, as it was stated she generally was, or placed on an anchorage as a lightship, and further that if the decision of the district registrar was right the respondents would actually, through the happening of the collision, obtain a profit which they would not otherwise have received, and that they could not legally do so. It was contended on behalf of the respondents that they were entitled to compensation for the loss of the use of the Comet whether or not they could in fact show any actual loss or expense, and further that inasmuch as they had spent moneys in providing a spare lightship to replace others damaged by collision they were entitled to remuneration for the use of the Orion when she was replacing the Comet.

Mr. JOSEPH WALTON, Q.C., and Mr. GARDNER HORRIDGE, for the appellants, distinguished the case of "The Greta Holme" (13 The Times L.R. 552; L.R. [1897], A.C., 596; 66 L.J., P., 166) in this House, and relied upon the decision of the Privy Council in "The City of Peking" (L.R., 15 App.Cas., 438; 58 L.J., P.C., 64) as discharging the appellants from liability.

Mr. CARVER, Q.C., Mr. B. C. ASPINALL, Q.C., and Mr. MAURICE HILL, for the respondents, were called upon only in respect of the City of Peking.

The LORD CHANCELLOR, in moving that the appeal be dismissed, said that the case was really governed by the principles laid down in that House in the Greta Holme, the basis of which decision was that the respondents were deprived, by the negligence of the appellants, of the use of their dredger, and entitled on that ground to the damages awarded. Lord Watson observed that the effect of this compulsory withdrawal of the dredger from its proper work was the accumulation of silt which in itself was an injury sounding in damages. That decision had a much wider application than was assigned to it by the appellants' counsel, and Lord Herschell in terms stated the proposition that, when by a man's wrongful act something belonging to another is injured or taken away, a claim for damages may be sustained, and that the damages in such a case are not merely nominal. Damages were not necessarily nominal because they were small in amount. The term was a technical one which negated any real damage, and imputed only that a legal right had been infringed in respect of which a man was entitled to the verdict and judgment. The term was by no means synonymous with small damages. The whole region of inquiry into damages was one of extreme difficulty; and no fixed principle could be laid down to a jury as to the amount of compensation which ought to be given. How, for example, could any one measure the amount of pain and suffering caused by an accident in terms of moneys current? By a manly mind pain and suffering once endured were soon forgotten. In the case before their Lordships the broad proposition was that the respondents were deprived of their vessel. He purposely did not use the words "the use of their vessel," for the wrongdoer had no right to inquire what or whether any use would have been made of the vessel of which the respondents were deprived. Suppose, for example, a man's house were entered and one of his chairs carried away and detained for a twelvemonth. Could any one say that the owner was entitled to no reparation on the ground that he had other chairs or was never in the habit of sitting on the particular one which was abstracted? The jury's task in cases of that character was often a difficult one, and an arbitrator or jury was often driven to take an artificial hypothesis; such as, in the case he had assumed, what it would cost to hire such a chair. The broad principle applicable to the appeal before the House was quite independent of the particular use which the respondents might have made of the Comet. It was wholly different from a case of special damage where it was necessary to ascertain the specific loss of profit or other advantage which could otherwise have accrued. When special damage was alleged, the claimant must show precisely the nature and extent of the injury sustained; and the person liable must have an opportunity of inquiring into the details before the case came into Court. In cases, however, of general damage no such principle was applicable; and the jury have only to give a proper equivalent for the unlawful withdrawal (in a case like the present) of the particular subject-matter. That broad principle comprehended this and many other cases, and the jury might assess damages which were not nominal damages, though the amount might be trifling. It appeared, therefore, to his Lordship, that what the learned Lords in the Greta Holme intended to point out, and Lord Herschell expressed in plain terms, was that the unlawful keeping back what belongs to another person was a ground for real and not nominal damages. He put aside questions of trespass, involving high-handed procedure and insolent behaviour, and other cases which have been held to entitle to aggravated and punitive damages. The principle, he repeated, must be the same in all forms of the unlawful detention of another man's property. That seemed to him so plain that he had been puzzled to learn that in the Admiralty Court the loss of the use of this vessel had been treated as something for which no money damage could be allowed. He was glad such a principle had not been affirmed by the Court of Appeal, as it seemed to him wholly unreasonable. The only difficulty he had felt was in connexion with the decision in the Privy Council in the City of Peking. But he had, he thought, discovered a clue to the real grounds of judgment in that case. It was to be observed, in the first place, that there was a difficulty in understanding the decision of the Judicial Committee without the report of those persons who had to assess the damage. The report, so far as it was quoted, was not a model of clearness. The effect seemed to be that no charge could be made for the detention of the vessel when allowance had already been made for the use of the substituted one, and if further allowance had been made payment would have been made twice over. If that was the ratio decidendi, the decision of the Privy Council was not inconsistent, but was on the same lines with the judgment of the Court of Appeal. He was not able to say whether the question of the absolute use of the vessel was raised or not in the City of Peking. For the reasons he had stated, he had no difficulty at all in arriving at the conclusion that the judgment below ought to be affirmed.

LORD MACNAGHTEN concurred, and said that he took part in the hearing of the City of Peking, but could not pretend to remember very accurately whether this question was or was not directly raised. His impression, however, distinctly was that the present question was not involved in that case, and he also observed that the City of Peking was not cited in the Court of Appeal.

LORD MORRIS agreed, and said that, in his opinion, this appeal was governed by their Lordships' decision in the Greta Holme, which overruled the principles of previous cases with regard to the assessment of damages.

LORD SHAND expressed his entire concurrence with the motion of the Lord Chancellor. It had been shown that the Orion was kept expressly for the purpose of meeting such a contingency as happened. It appeared that no fewer than 11 cases had occurred during the last 25 years in which a substitute had been called for to replace lightships damaged by collision on the Mersey. If the Commissioners had hired a ship for the purpose of doing the duty for which this sixth vessel was kept, there could be no answer to the claim for the cost of hiring. It seemed to him, therefore, if there was no answer in that case neither could there be any in the present.

LORD JAMES of HEREFORD also concurred, and thought there was a distinction between the case at the Bar and that determined by the Judicial Committee.

LORD BRAMPTON was of the same opinion. The Docks and Harbour Board were under no obligation to keep the Orion in reserve; and, having her, they were not obliged to use her, but might have hired another vessel to replace the Comet. If they had done so, there would have been no answer to the claim. Why should the appellants claim to have the services of the Orion gratuitously? They might as well claim the services of any of the skilled workmen employed by the respondents who happened at the moment to be idle. That could not be the law, and, in his opinion, the services ought to be paid for in the shape of damages.

The appeal was accordingly dismissed.

IN RE THOMAS—EVANS v. GRIFFITHS.*

Solicitor—Remuneration—Property sold in lots—
One title—Fees for deducing title, &c.—Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881, Schedule—Orders.

This case raised a question of some importance to solicitors upon the construction of the rules under the Solicitors' Remuneration Act and Order, 1881. The question was whether, in cases where property held under one title is sold by auction in lots, the vendor's solicitor is entitled to charge the minimum fee prescribed by the rules for deducing title, &c., in respect of each lot sold to a different purchaser. The facts giving rise to the question were as follows:—By an order made in the action on November 12, 1898, liberty was given to the plaintiffs to sell out of Court the residuary real estate of the testator in the cause. Accordingly the plaintiffs put up the real estate for sale by auction on January 24, 1899, in 11 lots. Lots 1 to 6 were sold to one purchaser, Phoebe Williams, for £1,685 15s. The remaining lots were sold as follows:—Lot 7 to Thomas Williams for £28, lot 8 to John Lewis (No. 1) for £27, lot 9 to Mr. Griffiths for £32, and lots 10 and 11 to John Lewis (No. 2) for £24. The property was freehold and was held under one title. Separate abstracts were delivered to each of the five purchasers. The solicitor of the plaintiffs delivered his bill for deducing title to the property and perusing and completing the conveyances on the basis that the scale of charges established by Schedule 1, part 1, to the general order under the Solicitors' Remuneration Act and the rules annexed thereto were applicable. No objection to this was taken by the plaintiffs before the Taxing Master. It was suggested at the hearing of this application that the scale did not apply, but his Lordship thought that if there was any foundation for the objection (as to which he was not satisfied) it came too late, and he declined to entertain it. By his bill the solicitor claimed, under Rule 8 of the rules annexed to the schedule, a minimum fee of £3 in respect of each of the sales to the four last-named purchasers. The Master held that Rule 8 did not apply, and allowed by his certificate 15s. in respect of each of these four sales. This was a summons taken out by the plaintiffs to review the Master's taxation.

Mr. Loehnis appeared for the plaintiffs in support of the summons; and Mr. W. L. Richards for the defendant.

The provisions of the rules, upon the application of which the question depended, are stated in his Lordship's judgment.

MR. JUSTICE STIRLING, in giving judgment, after stating the facts, said,—Rule 1 is as follows:—"The commission for deducing title and perusing and completing conveyance on a sale by auction is to be chargeable on each lot of property, except that where a property held under the same title is divided into lots for convenience of sale, and the same purchaser buys several such lots and takes one conveyance, and only one abstract is delivered, the commission is to be chargeable upon the aggregate prices of the lots." That applies to all sales by auction in lots, whether the property is held under one title or not, except only where in the former case the same purchaser buys several lots, and takes one conveyance and only one abstract is delivered. The exception applies in this case to the sale of lots 10 and 11 to John Lewis No. 2, but no further; consequently the commission is chargeable on each lot sold to a different purchaser, and the Master has so held. Rule 7 says that "Fractions of £100 under £50 are to be reckoned as £50, and fractions of £100 above £50 are to be reckoned as £100." The Master has applied this rule in allowing 15s. in respect of each of the four sales as above mentioned. Rule 8 is that relied upon by the solicitor. It provides:—"Where the prescribed remuneration would, but for this provision, amount to less than £5, the prescribed remuneration shall be £5, except on transactions under £100, in which cases the remuneration of the solicitor for the vendor, purchaser, mortgagee, or mortgagee is to be £3." The Taxing Master has refused to apply that rule on the ground that the "transaction" to which the rule refers was, in this case, the sale of the whole property referred to in the order of November 12, 1898. It is contended on behalf of the solicitor that each of the five sales resulting from the auction was a separate transaction within the meaning of Rule 8. The question which I have to decide is which of these views is correct. The question is one of construction of the rules, and in deciding it little guidance is to be gained from the consideration that in a particular case, or class of cases, the remuneration provided may seem to be excessive. It was observed by Mr. Justice Chitty in "In re Field" (29 Ch.D., 608) that "solicitors take these matters for better or worse. There is, as I have often heard the late Master of the Rolls observe, a kind of give and take in these matters. They get more in one case and less in another, and for this reason very likely in settling this scale some rough and ready rule for regulating the remuneration was laid down." These observations apply with some force with reference to Rule 1 here considered. It applies to all sales by auction in lots, whether all the lots are held under the same title, or whether each lot is held under a separate title. The labours of deducing title in the former case may often, perhaps most often, be less than in the latter; still cases might occur where the remuneration at the minimum rate in respect of a large number of lots at a price under £50 would be inadequate. The scale of remuneration presumably has been fixed so as roughly to strike a just average in the different cases which may occur. Rule 8 speaks of transactions under £100. "Transaction" there means the transaction of some piece of business. Whose business is it? The £100 spoken of is obviously not a sum with which the solicitor is concerned, but one which concerns the person who employs him; the business therefore is the business of the client. Further, it must be a piece of business to which No. 14.—VOL. XVI.

the rule is applicable; the title of this schedule shows that the rule is applicable to sales, purchases, or mortgages. For the present purpose therefore the rule may be read as if the word "sales" were substituted for "transactions." The rule also speaks of "prescribed remuneration." What is the "prescribed remuneration" in the present case? It is that spoken of in Rule 1 as commission for deducing title, &c., on a sale by auction, and is thereby made chargeable on each lot of the property sold. If Rule 1 be read in connexion with Rule 8, modified in the way I have just mentioned, the natural meaning of the sales referred to in it is sales of the separate lots. The object of Rule 8 appears to be to prevent injustice being done to a solicitor in cases where the sum in respect of which his remuneration is payable is small, and that is a matter just as necessary to be provided for in cases where Rule 1 applies as where it does not. If, as the framer of the rules must have considered, it was right that solicitors should be remunerated for deducing title and perusing and completing conveyance on a sale by auction in lots by giving them commission chargeable on each lot separately, it seems reasonable that they should be protected against insufficient remuneration in cases where the price for each lot might be small. I therefore come to the conclusion that the contention of the solicitor is well founded, and think that the summons must be allowed.

THE TYNE AND BLYTH SHIPOWNING COMPANY (LIMITED)
V. LEECH, HARRISON, AND FORWOOD.*

Ship—Charter-party—Demurrage—Delay in loading—Liability.

Once a vessel is on demurrage, the demurrage continues payable so long as there is no act or default of the owners excusing the charterers.

This was a claim for demurrage, and was heard upon an agreed statement of facts, from which it appeared that the steamship City of Newcastle was chartered to proceed to Poti and there load a cargo of ore. The vessel was ready to load, and her lay days began on February 11, 1899, and expired on February 24, 1899, up to which time a quay berth had not been provided for her. While she lay at anchor in Poti Roads she was injured by a collision on March 4, and was in consequence compelled to go to Constantinople to repair. A quay berth would have been provided for her on March 8. The vessel returned to Poti, and was again ready to load on April 19, but, owing to the crowded condition of the port, with a number of other steamers waiting to load, no quay berth was provided for her until June 2; her loading was completed on June 9, and she sailed on June 10 for Philadelphia, where certain hours were saved in the discharge. The owners now claimed demurrage under the charter-party for 54 days 18½ hours, making a sum of £994 17s. 6d. The charter-party provided, by Clause 4, that "the act of God . . . and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation of whatsoever nature or kind, and all unavoidable accidents or incidents, and all causes beyond the control of the shippers, consignees, or the charterers which might prevent or delay the delivery of the ore at the port of shipment . . . were always mutually excepted"; Clause 5 was as follows—"the act of God . . . collisions, stranding, and other accidents of navigation excepted, even when occasioned by negligence, default, or error in judgment of the pilot, master, mariners, or other servants of the shipowners"; by Clause 9 the cargo was to be loaded in ten running days, Sundays and holidays excepted, and all hours on demurrage over and above the said days were to be paid for at the rate of 15s. per hour. Clause 12 provided that, subject always to the exceptions enumerated in Clause 4, charterers guaranteed cargo and quay berth ready at Poti, counting from the time steamer had received free pratique and written notice had been given to charterers' agent to that effect, or lay days to count in accordance with Clause 9. It was admitted by the defendants that they were liable for demurrage from February 24 to March 4. The plaintiffs made no claim for demurrage between March 4 and April 19, and the liability of the defendants for demurrage from April 19 to June 10 was now in issue.

Mr. Carver, Q.C., and Mr. Adair Rochee appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. T. Gardner Horridge for the defendants.

Mr. CARVER argued that the collision on March 4 was a calamity for which the plaintiffs were not responsible; that under the contract the ship was to go to Poti and there be loaded in ten days, and that the whole of the risk, subject to the exceptions in Clause 4, was on the charterers. The cause of the delay was the presence of other steamers at Poti. He referred to "Jones v. Adamson" (1 Ex. D., 60). In that case the vessel was kept at the port for all the days now claimed.

Mr. JOSEPH WALTON said that "Jones v. Adamson" did not apply. That was a case of damages, but here there was no breach of contract, the demurrage days being provided by the contract, and therefore the exceptions in Clause 4 applied, and these exceptions were mutual. The loss of the quay berth by reason of the ship's being driven to Constantinople was within the exceptions. The effect of Clause 12 was exhausted when the lay days once began on February 11. The exceptions applied to everything done or to be done under the contract, but not to damages which were suffered because the contract was broken. The crowded condition of the port from April 19 to June 2 was a cause beyond the control of the charterers.

Mr. CARVER, in reply, cited "Kay v. Field" (10 Q.B.D., 241).

MR. JUSTICE KENNEDY, in giving judgment, said that he had come to the conclusion that when the vessel was once in a position where the owner could say that she was on demurrage, unless there was some act or default of the owners excusing the charterers, then demurrage continued payable. In this case, after the demurrage obligation had begun to operate, the vessel was run into by another ship, and the master properly went to Constantinople to repair. Very rightly no claim was made for demurrage during the period of repair. She was not at Constantinople by reason of any violation of the charter-party; she was there for a good reason excusing her as between owner and charterer. During that time no claim could be made by or against the owner. The period of demurrage was renewed on her return to Poti. It could not be said that there was an exception that protected the charterer from liability, nor that because the charterer could not get a berth he was protected, because it was a cause beyond his control. Once the demurrage period began it continued until the occurrence of some act for which the shipowner was responsible.

FAWCETT AND CO. V. BAIRD AND CO.*

Ship—Charter-party—Demurrage—"Cargo to be discharged with customary steamship despatch as fast as steamer can deliver"—Port of West Hartlepool—Insufficient supply of railway wagons.

In this case the plaintiffs were the owners of the steamship Atlantic, and the action was brought to recover £231 under a charter-party for demurrage, expenses, and freight, but at the trial the only item in the plaintiffs' claim which was not admitted was a claim for £80 for demurrage at West Hartlepool, the port of discharge. The cargo was a timber cargo, consisting of 571 standards of short pit-props. The charter-party provided that the cargo should be discharged "with customary steamship despatch as fast as steamer can deliver." The vessel arrived at West Hartlepool on July 15 and the discharge began on that day. The method of discharge adopted at West Hartlepool is for the ship to discharge the cargo on to the quay, and for the receiver to load it from the quay on to railway trucks which stand on rails parallel to, but not alongside, the ship. In this case the ship employed a stevedore to carry out the discharge, and the receivers of the cargo, the defendants, employed a different firm to load the timber, which was stacked on the quay by the ship's stevedore, into the railway trucks. The discharge was completed on Friday, July 21. The plaintiffs alleged that it ought to have been finished on Wednesday, the 19th, and that the delay was due to the default of the defendants in not having sufficient men at work so as to clear the quay, whereby the quay became blocked, and the discharge from the ship was hindered. The defendants' case was that the quay was never blocked, and that delay, if any, was due to an insufficient supply of railway wagons, for which the defendants said they were not liable. The defendants also called witnesses to prove that, according to the custom at West Hartlepool, the receiver is not bound to remove any of the cargo from the quay until the whole cargo has been put out of the ship and stacked on the quay, and that if the quay space at one berth is not sufficient for this to be done the ship must go to another berth. The case was heard on two days last week, when a large number of witnesses were called by both sides, the existence of the alleged custom being denied by the plaintiffs' witnesses, and the case was adjourned to yesterday for argument.

Mr. Robson, Q.C., and Mr. J. Southall appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Rufus Isaacs, Q.C., and Mr. H. F. Manisty for the defendants.

MR. JUSTICE KENNEDY, in delivering judgment, after referring to the terms of the charter-party, said that he did not think there was any doubt as to the law applicable to this case. Prima facie the receiver was bound to receive the cargo as fast as the steamer could deliver; but his obligation was usually qualified by words, such as "customary steamship despatch" or "ordinary custom of the port," which meant, as explained judicially, the user of those facilities which the customary method of discharge at the port gave for the particular kind of cargo. His Lordship expressed surprise at hearing that at West Hartlepool, there being the facilities there were, the defendants were setting up for the first time in Court a custom not to use those facilities. The custom alleged was one which would be injurious to the port, and had not been proved to his Lordship's satisfaction to exist. According to the case of "Lyle Shipping Company v. Corporation of Cardiff" (reported ante, p. 66), the facilities of the port must be used by the receivers so as to give the ship as quick a discharge as possible, but the current of the authorities was that if there was a failure in the supply of facilities of the port, that was to say, in the present case, railway wagons, the charterer was not to blame where the words "custom of the port" were used in the charter-party. His Lordship reviewed the evidence, and held that the custom alleged was not proved and, moreover, would be unreasonable; that there had on one day been some delay owing to the defendants not having sufficient men at work, but that this delay was made up for by overtime; and that the plaintiffs had not proved that the defendants could have obtained more railway wagons. His Lordship, therefore, came to the conclusion that there was no delay for which the defendants were responsible. There would be judgment for the defendants. His Lordship disallowed the costs of the witnesses called by the defendants to prove the alleged custom.

REGINA V. EDMUND LAW.*

Criminal Law—Practice—Costs—Prosecution for illegal practices at a municipal election—Municipal Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Act, 1884.

Private prosecutor ordered to pay defendant's costs of an unsuccessful prosecution for illegal practices at a municipal election.

The facts of this case sufficiently appear from the following written judgment of his Lordship:—

MR. JUSTICE BUCKNILL said:—The question I have to decide is whether in this prosecution of Edmund Law, which was tried before me at the last assizes holden at Cardiff, the defendant, who was acquitted, is entitled to recover from the prosecutor his costs sustained by him by reason of such indictment. The indictment was preferred by a private prosecutor under the Municipal Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Act, 47 and 48 Vict., cap. 70, for treating at a municipal election, and after the case for the prosecution was closed I directed the jury to find a verdict of acquittal. Application was then made to me by the learned counsel for the defendant that I should make an order giving him his costs, but, for reasons which I need not now repeat, I declined to exercise such a discretion if it was open to me to do so, but I reserved the question whether the defendant was entitled to his costs for further consideration as there was no opportunity at the time to consider the statutes relating to the subject. The matter has now been argued before me and my attention has been drawn to those Acts of Parliament which govern the question. They are three in number. I will first refer to the latest of them. It is the Municipal Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Act, 1884, 47 and 48 Vict., cap. 70. By section 30, it is enacted that "Subject to the other provisions of this Act, the procedure for the prosecution of a corrupt or illegal practice or any illegal payment, employment, or hiring committed in reference to a municipal election, and the removal of any incapacity incurred by reason of a conviction or report relating to any such offence, and the duties of the Director of Public Prosecutions in relation to any such offence (including the grant to a witness of a certificate of indemnity) shall be the same as if such offence had been committed in reference to a Parliamentary election, and sections 45 and 46 and sections 50 to 57 (both inclusive) and sections 59 and 60 of the Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883, shall apply accordingly as if they were re-enacted in this Act with the necessary modifications." Now one of these sections so applied to that Act is the 53rd, and that section is in the following terms:—"Sections 10, 12, and 13 of the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, 1854, and section 6 of the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, 1863 (which relate to prosecutions for bribery and other offences under those Acts), shall extend to any prosecution on indictment for the offence of any corrupt practice within the meaning of this Act. . . ." It is therefore clear that section 12 of the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, 1854, is to be read into the Act of 1884 and that its provisions extend to any private prosecution on indictment for the offence of any corrupt practice within the meaning of that, the 1884, Act. The 12th section is as follows:—"In case of any indictment or information by a private prosecutor for any offence against the provisions of this Act, if judgment shall be given for the defendant, he shall be entitled to recover from the prosecutor the costs sustained by the defendant by reason of such indictment or information, such costs to be taxed by the proper officer of the Court in which such judgment shall be given." Now, going back to the 30th section of the 1884 Act, we see by reference to the Acts of 1883 and 1854 that section 12 of the 1854 Act applies to the procedure for prosecutions under the 1884 Act, and all other proceedings in relation thereto with the necessary modifications. It was urged by counsel for the prosecution that section 30 of the Act of 1884 applies only to the procedure for the prosecution of a corrupt or illegal practice, and not to a question of costs, but that cannot be so for two reasons, the first of which is that the section provides that the incorporated sections of the Act of 1883 apply not only to the procedure for the prosecution in such cases, but to all other proceedings in relation thereto, and the second reason is that section 12 of the Act of 1854 deals only with costs, and the right of a defendant who has had judgment given in his favour to recover them from the private prosecutor. That section deals with nothing else. It is, therefore, clear to me that the defendant in this prosecution is entitled to recover from the private prosecutor the costs sustained by him by reason of the indictment which was preferred against him, such costs to be taxed by the proper officer of the Court in which the judgment of acquittal was given.

Mr. B. Francis-Williams, Q.C., Mr. Ivor Bowen, and Mr. Bowen Davies appeared for Law; and Mr. S. T. Evans for the prosecutor.

FARNHAM FLINT, & CO., COMPANY V. FARNHAM UNION.*

Rating—Rateable value—Mode of assessment—Occupation of gravel pits.

This was an appeal by case stated from the justices of

*Reported by P. B. DURNFORD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

*Reported by C. G. WILBRAHAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Surrey sitting in quarter sessions. The Farnham Flint, Gravel, and Sand Company, the appellants, appealed from a poor-rate for the parish of Farnham, in which the appellants were rated as occupiers of a gravel pit. The special sessions confirmed the rate, and dismissed the appeal. The quarter sessions allowed the appeal, subject to the case, and amended the rate, assessing the value of the gravel pit at £252 gross, and £240 rateable. The question raised and the facts on which it was based appear from the judgments.

Mr. R. C. Glen appeared for the appellants; and Mr. Marshall, Q.C., and Mr. Ryde for the respondents.

MR. JUSTICE BUCKNILL, in giving judgment, said,—The question for our opinion is whether the Court of quarter sessions for the County of Surrey has rated the Farnham Flint, Gravel, and Sand Company, in a rate for the relief of the poor, on a principle which can be upheld in law. The material facts may be shortly stated. The Farnham Flint, &c., Company, whose business is that of gravel and sand merchants, entered into three agreements, amongst others, with the owner of a bed of gravel, which were dated June 24, 1897, April 15, and November 14, 1898, respectively, by which they bought of him the gravel in three separate plots of ground which were marked out for the purpose. The purchasers had a certain time in which to remove the gravel, level the ground, replace the top soil, and restore the plots to the owners. There is, in my opinion, no statement in the case to justify this Court in treating the land comprised in these agreements as forming one continuous area. By the agreement of June 24, 1897, the gravel in one acre and a half was sold to the company, the price being £150, and the period of possession one year and a half, but in the other two agreements the plots of land were one acre each and the price for each was £150, the period of possession being one year from the date of the respective agreements. The poor-rate which is the subject of this appeal was made on December 8, 1898. At that time the company was in rateable occupation of the three plots, but in November they had exhausted all the ground from the acre and a half which they bought on June 24, 1897, and on September 1 they had exhausted all the ground bought on April 15, 1898. Those two and a half acres were at the time of making the rate used as storage places for gravel in connexion with other lands occupied by the company. The gravel bought by the company on November 14, 1898, was being worked by them on December 8, 1898. On these facts, the Court of quarter sessions held that the annual value of the three and a half acres at the time of the making of the rate ought to be taken at the amount of rent or royalty at which the same could then be reasonably expected to be let on a yearly tenancy, regard being had to the value of the gravel in the unexhausted acre, added to the value of the two and a half acres which were exhausted of gravel, but were used for storage purposes only, and on that the Court found that the amount at which the three and a half acres would, in fact, be so let was £252, at which sum they fixed the gross estimated rental and assessed the rateable value at £240. On the part of the guardians of the Farnham Union it was argued that the rateable value should be assessed either on the output of gravel during the year preceding the making of the rate from so much of the respective plots of land as was in the occupation of the company at any time during that year, based upon a royalty measured by the market value of the gravel, or, secondly, that, as at the time of making the rate the company were and had been working gravel at the rate of at least two acres a year, they must be rated at the full annual value of such two acres. In support of the first contention “Reg. v. Abney Park Cemetery Com- pany” (L.R., 8 Q.B., 515) was cited, and in support of the second “Reg. v. Whaddon” (L.R., 10 Q.B., 230). His Lordship having discussed and distinguished these two cases proceeded:—So long as there was any gravel in these three plots of land it may be that the rateable value would be unaffected. I offer no opinion on that point, but, as soon as any one or more of them were exhausted of the gravel that had been in them and they were incapable of beneficial occupation except as storage places for gravel, I am of opinion that they could only be rated upon their actual existing value at the time when the rate was made—in other words, it is not the past, nor the prospective, but the actual value of the hereditament that is to be taken as the basis of assessment, or, as Mr. Justice Blackburn said in “Staley v. Overseers of Castleton” (33 L.J., M.C., 182), “The Legislature intended the rate should be made upon the rent which might reasonably be expected from a tenant who took the property from year to year rebus sic stantibus. . . .” In my judgment, the present case is more like a brickfield or a mine both of which are, whilst being worked, approaching the period of final exhaustion. So long as they are being worked as brickfields or mines and there is nothing to show that the profits of the rating year may not be as good as the profits of the past year, then that year may be taken as the basis of the next if no better can be found; but where the brickfield or the mine has been worked out and exhausted, as in the case of these two and a half acres, and can therefore be no longer worked for the sole purpose for which they were acquired, I cannot agree to the proposition that their rateable value remains unaffected simply because they are still occupied under the terms of the respective contracts made with the owner of the land. Referring to “Rex v. Bedworth” (8 East, 387), which he cited with approval, his Lordship said:—I think the Court of sessions has proceeded in this case on the same principle (as in that case)—that is to say, that the two and a half acres were valueless for the purpose for which they were acquired, and that they could only be assessed at the actual value of their occupation at the time of the making of the rate in question. For these reasons I am of opinion, although I say so with much misgiving, being in disagreement with my Brother Channell, that this appeal should be dismissed.

MR. JUSTICE CHANNELL, after stating the facts as above, proceeded,—The appellants take the land from the landowner from time to time in small plots, usually of one acre at a time. They buy the gravel under the plot, or, rather, so much of the gravel under it as they can get in a limited time (usually a year), pay a lump sum (usually £175) for the gravel, and also pay for the levelling of the land at the end of the year or other period for which they take the plot, which levelling costs about £40 per acre. They also pay some sums for costs. Under one agreement (that of June, 1897) they paid less than under the other agreements, apparently because the bed of gravel in the plot was less deep or not so good in quality as the gravel under the other plots. They have no contract with the landowner whereby he is bound to sell them gravel under other land when the plots they hold are exhausted, but, in fact, he has other land adjoining under which there is gravel, and he had, prior to the rate in question, been in the habit of making successive agreements with them, and he has continued to do so since the rate. Now, as a general rule, property is rated at its existing value at the time of the making of the rate. You have to find what the hypothetical tenant from year to year might be expected to give for the hereditament in its state at that time. If, therefore, the gravel had prior to this rate been taken from the two and a half acres in some way other than by the user of the land in respect of which the rate has to be imposed, I think the quarter sessions here would have been right in rating the two and a half acres at storage value only. The case would then be the same as that of buildings on a property being burnt down shortly before the rate, and the rate then would be on the value of the land without the buildings. But I am of opinion that where the rateable user itself causes the diminution of value the rule is not quite so simple. The rule then is, I think, that any partial exhaustion of the subject-matter, so long as the special user continues, in no way affects the rateable value, and that it is only when the special user ceases, by reason of the complete exhaustion of the subject-matter or otherwise, that the rateable value is affected. It then, of course, ceases altogether. The cases which throw most light on the mode of rating such properties are "Reg. v. Westbrook" and "Reg. v. Everest" (reported together 10 Q.B., 178), and "Reg. v. Abney Park Cemetery Company" (L.R., 8 Q.B., 515) and "Reg. v. Whaddon" (L.R., 10 Q.B., 230). The rating of such properties, without allowing for a renewal fund, is somewhat anomalous, but it is clearly established by "Reg. v. Westbrook" that they are to be so rated. And, indeed, it is obvious that any allowance to keep the property in a state to command the rent would in these cases absorb the whole rateable value arising from the special use of the property. If the exhaustion of the material by the working in respect of which the rate is imposed is to be taken into account in the same way as an alteration in the value of the property caused in another way, the rateable value of the hereditament must vary from day to day, and be continually diminishing. That, I think, cannot be. The value of the hereditament for rating purposes depends not on the quantity of the material—in this case gravel—remaining on the property to be worked, but on the amount of the profitable working which is going on at the date of the rate. In these cases it is all important to remember that the value for rating purposes depends on the value of the occupation and not on the value of the corpus of the property occupied. The latter in these cases is constantly diminishing, but the former is or may be constant, until at last it ceases altogether by the exhaustion of the corpus. To rate such properties you first have to find the amount or rate of working, and then find how much a hypothetical tenant from year to year would give by the year for the right to work at that rate. It may be that there is not enough gravel remaining for any one to work for a whole year, but that is immaterial. The problem is to find the value for a year of that enjoyment of the property which the occupier is in fact having at the date of the rate irrespective of the question whether that enjoyment by the occupier can or cannot continue for a year. His Lordship discussed "Reg. v. Whaddon," which he considered to be an authority in point, and "Reg. v. Abney Park Cemetery Company," and proceeded:—It seems to me that where the overseers or assessment committee have to rate a property in respect of a beneficial use which is being made of it, which use is self-destructive, what they have to do is this—They must ascertain what amount of use the actual tenant has been making and continues to make of the property, and then ascertain what a tenant would give for liberty to make that amount of use of the property from year to year, independently of the question whether there is or is not enough of the property remaining for the tenant to be able to go on making that use for a whole year. Thus in the case of a gravel pit they must find at what rate per annum the tenant is digging, and then find the annual value of the right to dig at that rate. Applying this in the present case and going back as far as the facts stated in the special case enable us to do, we find that on June 24, 1897, the appellants acquired the right to dig, and, as I understand, then began to dig, gravel under an acre and a half, which they completely dug out in March, 1898. On April 15, 1898, they acquired the like right under one acre, which they completely dug out by September 1. On November 14, 1898, they acquired another acre, which they were digging on December 8, 1898, when the rate was made. When they completely dug out that acre does not appear (nor, of course, could it be known when the rate was made), but as they took another plot on March 21, 1899, it was probably shortly before that. The subsequent taking is only material to show now that which might at the time have been shown by direct evidence—viz., that at the date of the rate, December 8, the appellants were digging as before and had not begun to dig slower than the average rate at which they had been digging. That average rate appears to me to be about the rate of two acres per annum, rather more if anything, as they exhausted the acre taken April 15, 1898, in four months and a half. I think, therefore, that just as in "Reg. v. Whaddon" the appellants were rated at coprolite value on ten acres (though at the date of the rate $6\frac{1}{2}$ acres had been already exhausted, and only $3\frac{1}{2}$ of the ten acres then in their occupation still contained coprolites) because they were working out the $3\frac{1}{2}$ acres at the rate of ten acres per annum, so here the appellants, though at the date of the rate they were only working gravel in one acre, must be rated for the $3\frac{1}{2}$ acres on the gravel pit value of at least two acres inasmuch as they were working both during the preceding year, and up to and at the date of the rate so far as appears at the rate of two acres per annum. In this case there seems no reason for not taking the sums paid by the appellants as a measure of what the hypothetical tenant would be likely to pay, and, in fact, the quarter sessions did so, as I understand they assessed the gravel pit value at £220 per acre, being the £175, the £40 cost of restoring, and the £5 costs. If, therefore, the appellants ought to have been rated for their occupation on the footing that they were working at the date of the rate as they had been previously at the rate of two acres of gravel per annum, the original rating at £420 gross was not excessive, and although the calculations which I have made from figures in the special case are probably not quite accurate, and the dates in the special case are probably not sufficient to enable us, if we had to do so, to fix exactly the proper amount at which the appellants should be rated, it is enough for me to say that the facts stated in the special case show no ground for reducing the rate. I have dealt with the case so far as I think it ought to be dealt with, as one occupation of the $3\frac{1}{2}$ acres. It really was one gravel pit, and occupied and worked as such. But I think that even if the exhausted $2\frac{1}{2}$ acres on the two earlier lettings are to be treated separately and rated at storage value only, the remaining acre should be rated at approximately double the sum at which the quarter sessions have rated it, because I think the appellants were working it, at the date of the rate, at the rate of getting two acres of gravel per annum. And I do not think we are excluded from considering that question by reason of the quarter sessions having found the value in fact. They only so found subject to the case, and state the facts with a view to our deciding it. I put the case thus:—If a man pays £100 for the privilege of taking all the gravel out of a plot of land in a year, and he digs uniformly throughout the year, I should say that the gross value of his occupation during the year is £100, and that is so all through the year, though he exhausts the land by digging the last load of gravel on the last day of the year. I think that must be admitted. I think also that if he does not dig uniformly but digs out all the gravel in the first six months, continuing to occupy during the second six months, the gross annual value during the second six months as well as during the first is still £100, but if not, and if, as the quarter sessions have held, the value during the second six months is nil (or storage value only which for the purposes of the argument is the same thing), then it follows that the value of the first six months' occupation is the whole £100 which he pays—that is to say, that the annual value during that six months is £200 per annum. In either way, therefore, the quarter sessions seem to me wrong. His Lordship concluded—I think, therefore, that the proper order to be made is to allow with costs the appeal to us, quash the order of quarter sessions, and, making the order which the quarter sessions should have made, dismiss with costs the appeal to quarter sessions against the rate; but, as the Court is equally divided, I am of opinion that the appeal fails, and consequently that the order which has to be made is that the appeal be dismissed. Under the circumstances it will be dismissed without costs, and leave to appeal, if necessary, is given.

EARL GREY V. THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL.*

Revenue—Estate duty—Settlement—Reservation of interest to settlor—Duty payable on death of settlor—Finance Act, 1894, secs. 1 and 2 (1).

Decision of the Court of Appeal (14 The Times L.R., 585) affirmed.

This was an appeal under the Finance Act, 1894, the question being whether or not the present, the fourth, Earl Grey is liable to pay estate duty on the principal value of the whole of the property the third earl comprised in two indentures of 1885 and 1894, the latter of which was executed within 12 months of the third earl's death. The appeal was from an order of the Court of Appeal (Lords Justices A. L. Smith, Rigby, and Vaughan Williams) dated August 10, 1898, affirming a decree of the Queen's Bench Division (Mr. Justice Grantham and Mr. Justice Channell) dated December 13, 1897. By a deed dated October 19, 1885, and made between the late Henry, third Earl Grey, of the one part, and the appellant, the fourth Earl Grey, then Albert Henry (George Grey, Esq., of the other part, reciting (inter alia) that the appellant was the nephew of the third Earl Grey and heir presumptive to the peerage, and that the third Earl Grey was desirous of giving his real and personal estate to the appellant, subject to the provisions therein contained, in consideration of natural love and affection, and for the other considerations therein appearing, the third Earl Grey conveyed to the appellant all his real and leasehold estates in the county of Northumberland and elsewhere, subject to the payment of certain life annuities and mortgages affecting the same to the use that the third Earl Grey should thenceforth during his life receive an annual rent-charge of £4,000, to be issuing out of the said hereditaments (other than such part as the third Earl Grey was to occupy and enjoy under the trusts thereafter declared) and subject thereto to the use of the appellant in fee simple, but as to the mansion-house at Howick and the premises to be enjoyed therewith subject to the trusts thereafter contained. And the third Earl Grey assigned to the appellant all rents, arrears of rent, owing in respect of the said real estates, and all furniture and effects in or about the said mansion-house and premises at Howick, and all stock, crops, and effects, and other personal property belonging to him (except money, private papers and correspondence, his wardrobe, and ornaments and effects in his own personal use), to hold the same (subject as to parts thereof to the trusts thereafter declared) to the appellant absolutely for his own use and benefit. It was then declared that the mansion-house at Howick, together with the pleasure gardens, kitchen and fruit gardens, stables, vineries, green-houses, outbuildings, and appurtenances as then occupied and enjoyed by the third Earl Grey, and all the furniture, plate, books, pictures, and articles of household use or ornament, wines, stores, garden implements, horses, carriages, and other things whatsoever in or about the said mansion-house and premises, should be held upon trust to permit the said third Earl Grey to use and enjoy the same as theretofore during his life. The appellant then, by the same deed, covenanted with the third Earl Grey to (1) Pay certain annuities mentioned in the schedule to the deed and all other annuities (if any) charged on any part of the property or payable by the third Earl Grey so long as the same should be payable. (2) Pay a mortgage debt of £200,000 and interest and all other mortgage debts and charges affecting any part of the property, also a bond for £1,000 payable to the Honourable George Grey with interest, and discharge all liabilities of the third Earl Grey in respect of the property. (3) Pay the said annual rent-charge of £4,000 to the third Earl Grey. (4) Keep the mansion-house and buildings at Howick insured at the appellant's cost and expend all money received on any insurance in restoration, repairs, or rebuilding, and keep in repair and properly uphold and maintain the said mansion-house, buildings, gardens, and effects to be enjoyed by the third Earl Grey, and stock and manage the said gardens as the same had theretofore been managed, and at the request of the third Earl Grey or his agent forthwith do and make any repairs in any of the premises so to be enjoyed which the said earl or his agent might desire to have made or done. (5) At the like cost supply to the third Earl Grey farm and garden produce for the use and consumption of the household at Howick. (6) Upon the death of the third Earl Grey pay all his funeral and testamentary expenses, including all stamp and other duties, and also all his debts to the full exhaustion of all the property, real and personal, of the said third earl. (7) The lands at or near Howick then farmed by the said third Earl Grey were not to be sold or disposed of or let during his life, but were to be farmed by the appellant personally in like manner as the same had been farmed by the third earl, and no buildings were to be erected or works established thereon without the consent in writing of the said third earl. (8) Receipts, &c., to be produced. The deed also contained a provision that, in the event of the appellant dying in the lifetime of the third earl (or of any breach of covenant by the appellant and failure to remedy the same within 30 days after notice), it should be lawful for the third Earl Grey to revoke the deed, either wholly or in part, but without prejudice to the title under any sale or mortgage prior to such revocation. The average net annual income (after deducting terminable and other charges, repairs, &c.) of the property comprised in the deed for the five years next preceding the date thereof was a little over £4,000. By an indenture, dated September 26, 1894, the third Earl Grey, in consideration of £5,000 stated to be paid to him by the appellant, released to him the said rent-charge of £4,000 and also released the power of revocation contained in the deed of October 19,

*Reported by J. EYRE THOMPSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

1885, and the covenant by the appellant to retain unsold and to farm certain lands near Howick. This indenture contains a recital that the rent-charge had been paid and all the covenants in the deed of October 19, 1885, performed by the appellant up to the date thereof. The third earl died on October 9, 1894, whereupon the appellant succeeded to the earldom. The net annual income of the said estates now considerably exceeds £4,000. Under the Finance Act, 1894, estate duty was claimed from the appellant on the principal value (less encumbrances) of the whole of the property comprised in the said deed of October 19, 1885, as property passing on the death of the said third Earl Grey within the meaning of sections 1 and 2 (1) (c) of the said Act (which incorporates the provisions of section 38 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, as amended by section 11 (1) of the Customs Act, 1889), and the appellant having refused to pay estate duty (save as to the mansion-house and effects) an information was filed on January 21, 1896, praying a declaration that such duty had become payable and for consequential relief. The effect of the legislation was thus expressed by Lord Justice A. L. Smith:—
 "The real personal or movable property to be included in an account shall be property of the following description—viz., (a) Any property . . . taken under a disposition . . . made by a person dying after August 1, 1894, purporting to operate as an immediate gift inter vivos . . . which shall not have been bona fide made 12 months before the death of the deceased . . . or property taken under any gift whenever made, of which property bona fide possession and enjoyment shall not have been assumed by the donee immediately upon the gift and thenceforward retained to the entire exclusion of the donor, or of any benefit to him by contract or otherwise." The case is reported 14 The Times L.R., 585; L.R. [1898], 2 Q.B., 534; 67 L.J., Q.B., 947.

Mr. Haldane, Q.C., and Mr. Bremaer were for the appellant; the Attorney-General (Sir R. E. Webster, Q.C.), the Solicitor-General (Sir R. B. Finlay, Q.C.), and Mr. Vaughan Hawkins for the respondent were not heard.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—My Lords,—There are some cases so extremely plain that it is difficult to give any better exposition of the question than that which the statute itself provides. In the present case I did not at first quite understand the argument presented to your Lordships, and I am not absolutely certain that I have got much further now; but, at all events, forming my own judgment upon the statute, nothing appears to me much more plain than this, that what the Act of Parliament intended to prevent was that what has been described as a gift inter vivos should nevertheless reserve to the settlor some benefit, or some part of that which purported to be given inter vivos. In this case can anybody doubt that something has been reserved to the settlor? The settlement itself has reserved £4,000 a year, and has reserved a right also on the part of the settlor that all his debts up to the period of his death should be paid and the payment secured by the estate. It seems to me that it is burning daylight to say that that is not within the express language of the statute, and I am really wholly unable to understand why these words are not as plain in the statute itself as any explanatory exposition could make them. That, my Lords, is really all I have to say upon the subject. It seems to me it is a particularly plain case, and I move, your Lordships, that this appeal be dismissed with costs.

The other noble and learned lords concurred, and the appeal was dismissed.

STEWART V. RHODES.*

Practice—Charging order—Deceased judgment debtor—1 and 2 Vict., c. 110, sec. 14.

A charging order upon stocks and shares under sec. 14 of 1 and 2 Vict., c. 110, cannot be obtained against the executor of a deceased judgment debtor without obtaining a judgment against the executor.

This appeal, against a decision of Mr. Justice Stirling's, raised a question of considerable importance, viz., whether a charging order upon stock, under section 14 of the Act 1 and 2 Vict., cap. 110, can be obtained against the executor of a deceased judgment debtor without obtaining a judgment against the executor. In the present case the plaintiffs, on January 30, 1899, obtained a judgment in an action in the Queen's Bench Division against John Rhodes for £959 and costs. On March 27 Rhodes died. On June 16 an action was commenced for the administration of his estate in the Chancery Division. On June 17 the judgment creditors obtained from a Master an order in the Queen's Bench Division action giving them liberty to issue execution against the executor of Rhodes, under Order XLII., rule 23, of the Rules of the Supreme Court, and it was also ordered that, unless cause should be shown to the contrary before the Judge in Chambers on June 28, the defendant's interest in a sum of Consols in Court should stand charged with the payment of the amounts due on the judgment. On June 22 judgment was given in the Chancery action for the administration of the estate of Rhodes. The Queen's Bench action was afterwards transferred to the Chancery Division, and the plaintiffs applied to make the charging order absolute. Mr. Justice Stirling held that the charging order was invalid, because it purported to charge "the interest of the defendant"—i.e., of the judgment debtor who was dead, and had no interest, and that it did not operate to charge the interest which had become vested in the executor. The plaintiffs appealed.

Mr. Jenkins, Q.C., and Mr. Whinney were for the plaintiffs; Mr. Harman was for the executor; Mr. Upjohn, Q.C., and Mr. E. S. Ford were for the plaintiffs in the administration action.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said that the case was an important one, and it had occupied a long time, but, now that it had been threshed out, it did not present much difficulty. Though these charging orders had been in operation for many years no one had ever until now obtained, or, so far as his Lordship knew, had discussed the possibility of obtaining, a charging order against an executor for the debt of a deceased judgment debtor. His Lordship did not say it could not be done. But the proceeding was a statutory one, and the statute must be looked to for the method of obtaining the order and its effect. Section 14 showed that the Court must have before it the person against whom the judgment had been obtained, and he was the judgment debtor who must show cause against making the order absolute. He must therefore be living. It was decided in "Finney v. Hinde" (4 Q.B.D., 102) that a charging order vis-à-vis against a dead man was of no avail. If the creditor wanted to get a charging order against an executor, he must obtain a judgment against him first. The real objection to the experiment which the present plaintiffs had made was that they had attempted to get a charging order against the executor without obtaining a judgment against him. No doubt under Order XLII., rule 23, leave could be obtained to issue execution against an executor without obtaining a judgment against him. There were two views of the effect of such an order—(1) that it was equivalent to a judgment; (2) that it dispensed with the necessity of a judgment. The appellant's counsel adopted the former view, the respondent's counsel the latter. His Lordship thought the latter view was the true one. The order had not the effect of a judgment. The result was that the plaintiffs, who were seeking to obtain a charging order, had not complied with the essential condition, imposed by section 14, of obtaining a judgment against the executor. It was said that, as they had obtained judgment against the testator, they could not now obtain a judgment for the same debt against his executor. If so, it would follow that they could not obtain a charging order at all. Their proper remedy would then be in the administration action. This was probably the reason why no one had hitherto attempted to obtain a charging order against an executor in such a case as this. The only case which raised any doubt was "Haly v. Barry" (L.R., 3 Ch., 452). But then it may have been that, under the old procedure before the Judicature Act, the creditor had done what was equivalent to obtaining judgment against the executor. But the decision of the Court was only that they would not interfere by injunction to prevent an order nisi being made absolute. They would not deprive the creditor of the advantage which he had obtained. The order nisi in the present case was altogether wrong. The plaintiffs' experiment had failed, and the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

DOBELL AND CO. V. GREEN AND CO.*

Ship—Charter-party—"Subject to colliery guarantee"—Vessel ordered to a colliery on strike—Tender of guarantee—Reasonableness.

Decision of Bigham, J. (15 The Times L.R., 158), affirmed.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs from the judgment of Mr. Justice Bigham, reported in 15 The Times L.R., 153. The following facts are taken from the judgment of the learned Judge:—This was an action brought by shipowners against charterers for the alleged breach of a coal charter, the question being whether a colliery guarantee issued from a colliery where work had stopped by reason of a strike was such a guarantee as the shipowner was bound to accept. The facts were as follows:—On January 14, 1898, the defendants, Messrs. F. Green and Co., of London, chartered the plaintiff's ship Curzon to carry a cargo of South Wales coal from Cardiff to Iquique. The vessel was at the time homeward bound to Liverpool, and was not expected to arrive at that port before April or May. The charter-party provided that after discharging her inward cargo at Liverpool the vessel should sail to Cardiff and "shall proceed to such loading berth as the freighters may name, and shall there load a cargo of steam coal as ordered by charterers, which they bind themselves to ship (except in the event of strike of shippers' pitmen)." The vessel to be loaded as customary, but subject in all respects to "the colliery guarantee in [blank] colliery working days as may be arranged; any claim for demurrage in loading to be settled with colliery direct." Having made this charter-party, the defendants on February 3, 1898, bought two cargoes of Hood's Merthyr Colliery coal, one of which they intended for the Curzon and the other for some other vessel which they had also chartered or were about to charter. On April 6, 1898, the South Wales coal strike began and work at Hood's Colliery stopped. While this condition of things existed—viz., on April 26—the defendants procured from Hood's Colliery the usual colliery guarantee, whereby the colliery proprietors undertook to load the Curzon in 20 days after she should be ready to receive cargo, subject to the usual exception as to strikes. This guarantee was sent on in ordinary course by the defendants to the ship's agents. The ship's agents returned it in a letter, saying, "We decline to accept it, having regard to the fact that Messrs. Hood's Merthyr Colliery is on strike. As there are numerous other collieries which are not on strike and from which coal can be obtained, the owners require to be loaded by a colliery which is now working." To this the defendants answered (as the facts were) that the coal had been bought from Hood's weeks before the strike began, and that the plaintiffs could have had the colliery guarantee at the time had they desired it; and they insisted that the ship should load from Hood's Colliery. From this position the defendants never receded. On May 14 the plaintiffs sent the Curzon from Liverpool to Cardiff, and she arrived at the latter port on May 16; she was ready to load by May 17, from which date, but for the strike, the 20 days mentioned in the colliery guarantee would begin to run. No doubt at this time, as appears from the correspondence, there was good reason to expect that the strike would speedily end; in fact, that it would end in time to enable the loading to be completed within the stipulated time. These hopes, however, proved to be vain, for the strike did not end till September 1, and the loading of the vessel did not finish till September 27. There was no complaint of delay in loading after the ending of the strike, but the plaintiffs insisted that they were entitled to have a guarantee from a colliery which was at work on the date of the guarantee, and they claimed damages based upon the loss of the use of their ship for three months or more, which they estimated at a sum equal to about half her selling value. The only other fact necessary to mention was that during the whole of the strike a certain proportion, estimated at 15 per cent., of the South Wales collieries were at work, so that South Wales coal was obtainable, although at a very high price. The learned Judge held that the colliery guarantee tendered to the plaintiffs was a good guarantee within the meaning of the charter-party, and he gave judgment for the defendants.

Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. Horridge appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Carver, Q.C., Mr. Scrutton, and Mr. F. D. MacKinnon appeared for the defendants.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that he entirely agreed with the judgment of Mr. Justice Bigham. By the charter-party the defendants undertook to load subject to a strike. Any loss arising from a strike was by the charter-party put upon the plaintiffs, the shipowners. After the strike began the defendants gave the plaintiffs notice that they were going to load Hood's Merthyr steam coal. At this time there was good reason to expect that the strike would come to an end so as to enable the ship to be loaded within the time. Why was not that a good notification to the plaintiffs as to the coal which the defendants were going to load? It was said not to be so, because there was a strike at Hood's Merthyr Colliery, and the defendants ought to have tendered a colliery guarantee from a colliery not under strike. Where was that to be found? The loss from a strike in the colliery was by the charter-party to fall upon the plaintiffs. In his opinion, in the circumstances, the tender of the colliery guarantee of Hood's Merthyr Colliery was a reasonable one.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS concurred. As between these two business firms the risk of any difficulty arising from a strike was deliberately placed upon the shipowners. That being so, the very event stipulated for by the charter-party had arisen. The charterers were under an obligation by the charter-party to load steam coal from a colliery which they had a right to select, and they undertook to load subject to a strike. What right had the shipowners to complain when they were told to proceed to a loading place to load from a colliery where there was a strike? It was nihil ad rem at that time. The charter-party had made the obligation to load subject to a strike, and the shipowners had undertaken to go to the place named and take the coal on board. At this time the existence of a strike in the colliery was nihil ad rem. In the event of there being a strike at the colliery when the ship arrived at the loading place, and when the charterers were called upon to load, the question would then arise whether they had not been relieved of the obligation to load by reason of the strike. The discussion as to the operation of the exception would arise if and when the exception arose. The charterers would then be relieved, because the strike clause in the charter-party would then come into operation. In his opinion it would be unreasonable to impose on the charterers the obligation of naming a colliery where no strike was going on. It might well be, when the uncertainty of strikes was considered, that, though there might be a strike at the time of the order to proceed to the loading place, yet at the only material time—namely, the time of the commencement of the loading—the strike might be over. Until the time for loading arrived there was nothing to fetter the discretion of the charterers.

LORD JUSTICE ROMER concurred. He agreed that the charterers were bound to make a reasonable selection of a colliery for loading coals from. He would assume, though it was not necessary to decide it, that the right time to see if a reasonable selection had been made was the time when the name of the colliery was notified to the shipowners. Assuming that to be so, upon looking at this charter-party, especially at the strike clause, he came to the conclusion that the selection of the colliery in the present case was not an unreasonable selection by reason of the existence of the strike, which, as matters then appeared, might have ended at any time. The shipowners, therefore, could not decline to accept the guarantee of that colliery.

THE WELSBACH INCANDESCENT GAS LIGHT COMPANY (LIMITED) V. THE NEW INCANDESCENT (SUNLIGHT PATENT) GAS LIGHTING COMPANY (LIMITED) AND OTHERS.*

Patent—Infringement—Utility of invention—"Utility," meaning of, discussed.

This was an action for an injunction, damages, and other relief in respect of alleged infringements by the defendants of the plaintiffs' patent (granted to Mr. Oliver Imray and numbered 3,592 of 1886) for an improvement in an illuminant appliance for burners. At the conclusion of the arguments and evidence, which occupied the Court for several days, his Lordship reserved judgment.

Mr. Moulton, Q.C., Mr. T. Terrell, Q.C., Mr. Roger Wallace, Q.C., and Mr. A. J. Walter were for the plaintiffs; and Mr. Bousfield, Q.C., and Mr. W. Neill for the defendants.

MR. JUSTICE BUCKLEY, in giving judgment, said the complaint of the plaintiffs was not as to the form of the mantles used, which was originally protected by a patent of 1885 which had now expired, but in respect of the use of the oxides of certain rare metals as brilliant illuminants in the making of the mantles; it was restricted to the use of materials in hoods and mantles, and was not for hoods and mantles formed in a particular way. The patent was in respect of pure thorium or thorium oxide alone or in connexion with other oxides. There was nothing about pure thorium, and what was then known as thorium was not pure, but consisted to the extent of 25 per cent. of other substances. It was said on behalf of the defendants that the plaintiffs had not improved on what was used under the 1885 patent, but that there was a falling off. The answers were that what was patented was not claimed as an improvement in the illuminating powers of the materials used, but that it offered a useful choice. It had other advantages—viz., rigidity, flexibility, or durability. There was a great advantage in having greater toughness in the mantles used. Utility, in patent law, did not, as his Lordship understood it, mean either abstract utility, or comparative or competitive utility, or commercial utility. It was described by Mr. Justice Grove in "Young v. Rosenthal" (1 Rep. Pat. Cas., 34) as meaning an invention better than the preexisting knowledge of the trade as to a particular fabric. His Lordship adopted that definition if the word "better" was understood as meaning better in some respect and not necessarily better in every respect, so that, for instance, an article which was good, although not so good as that previously known, but which could be produced more cheaply by another process, was better in that it was better in point of cost, although not so good in point of quality. So here he conceived that a mantle constructed according to prescription No. 1 in the specification of thorium pure according to the knowledge of 1886, and which gave only three candles, or of thorium pure in fact, which would give only 1·3 candles, although it was worse as an illuminating appliance than the mantle of 1885, which gave four or 4·5 candles, was nevertheless better if it possessed in a greater degree the qualities of rigidity, durability, or stability. He might illustrate this by saying that in point of fact subsequent knowledge had shown that it was useful because, by the subsequent discovery that a small quantity of cerium would increase its luminosity, the step which was taken in 1886 had led to the possibility of making subsequently to 1893 a mantle which was not only durable and stable, but possessed also high illuminating power. Again, he might take another test of utility—viz., that an invention was useful for the purposes of the patent law when the public were thereby enabled to do something which they could not do before, or to do in a more advantageous manner something which they could do before, or, to express it in another way, that an invention was patentable which offered the public a useful choice. Now the patent of 1886 offered the public an opportunity of making with thorium an appliance which up to that date it had been suggested could be made only with zirconium, lanthanum, or yttrium, and, whether the thorium mantle gave a higher or lower illuminating light, it might well have been, and it was now known, that it was useful to give the public the choice of using that rare earth instead of some of the rare earths mentioned in the specification of 1885. A very small amount of utility was sufficient to support a patent, and the suggestion to the public of this other rare earth as a means to an end gave utility to the patent for the purposes of the patent law. His Lordship then dealt with the question of infringement, which he also decided in favour of the plaintiffs, and gave them an inquiry as to damages, an order for destruction or delivery of the infringing articles, and the costs of the action as between solicitor and client.

Fixtures—Movable chattels—Annexation to freehold—Mortgagor and mortgagee.

In this action the plaintiff sued for the delivery up to him of certain fittings, fixtures, and effects, or for £287 12s. as their value, and for damages for their detention. The defence was that the defendant had never deprived the plaintiff of the articles in question; that their return had never been refused; and that the goods and chattels in question were the property of the defendant. The defendant also counterclaimed for the return of 11 dog-grates or their value.

Mr. A. T. Lawrence, Q.C., and Mr. CANNOT appeared for the plaintiff; and Mr. Rufus Isaacs, Q.C., and Mr. Macarthy for the defendant.

The facts of the case were shortly as follows:—In 1890 Mr. P. St. L. Grenfell was the owner of a house known as Long Walk-house, Windsor. He mortgaged that house to Lady Ross, and in 1893 the present defendant, Miss Barnes, became mortgagee in fee of the premises by a transfer to her by Lady Ross of the mortgage security dated August 27, 1890. In or about July, 1893, Mr. Grenfell sold the equity of redemption in the mortgage to the plaintiff, Mr. P. Monti, and on March 22, 1898, the defendant foreclosed the mortgage and became owner in fee of the premises. After the first mortgage was effected, and prior to its transfer to Miss Barnes by Lady Ross, Mr. Grenfell had effected great decorative improvements in the house, and it was with regard to certain articles then put upon the premises that the present action was brought. The most important of these were what is known as a "fitment" in one of the dressing-rooms and a mirror in the drawing-room. These articles were claimed by the plaintiff on his leaving the house, and the claim was resisted by the defendant on the ground that they were affixed to the freehold of the premises, and had become her property as mortgagee. The first of these articles, the "fitment," was described as a piece of furniture specially designed for the room. It was made for that room and no other. It consisted of a series of different parts, which were fastened together with nails or screws. The different parts consisted of a wardrobe, dressing table, washhand-stand, and such things as are usually found in a dressing-room. It was fastened to the walls of the room by means of battens, which themselves were nailed to the walls, and the "fitment" screwed on to them. The drawers of the wardrobe and the cupboards had no backs, except such as the walls of the room afforded, and the whole could not be removed without doing some harm to the realty. The other article in dispute consisted of a large looking-glass, reaching from the floor nearly to the ceiling of the drawing-room. At the top of that looking glass, forming the architrave, was a painting surrounded by a moulded frame. This looking glass was fixed by nails or screws to the freehold, and it covered up the central division of a large window giving light to the drawing-room. The defendant counterclaimed for damages for the removal of 11 dog-grates, which had been substituted by Mr. Grenfell for the grates he found upon the premises.

Mr. CANNOT, for the plaintiff, contended that the sole question was, How were the articles in question fixed, and with what intention were they fixed? They were not an essential part and parcel of the character of the house as a dwelling-house, and consequently were not fixtures passing to the mortgagee. There was no difference in principle as to what were fixtures as between landlord and tenant and between mortgagor and mortgagee. "Mather v. Fraser" (25 L.J., Ch., 361) decided that these dog-grates could not be fixtures. He also referred to the cases of "Crosby v. Shaw" (19 L.R., Irish, 317) and "Astbury, ex parte Lloyd's Banking Company" (L.R., 4 Ch., 630).

Mr. RUFUS ISAACS, for the defendant, said that the principle upon which the plaintiff tried to show that these were not fixtures was a principle only applicable to the case of a landlord and tenant, and not to that of mortgagor and mortgagee. The old common law rule was originally definite and fixed on this subject, but it became relaxed, for the purpose of encouraging trade, in favour of a tenant. The old rule as it stood before being modified must be applied in this case. The case of "Smith v. Maclure" (32 W.R., 459) covered the whole of the present case. It was said there that things which are substantially part of the house, so that they cannot be removed without depriving the building of that which was intended to be used with it, ought to be regarded as fixtures. The defendant was also entitled to the dog-grates as passing with the freehold. They were not fixed, but they stood by their own weight, as was the case in "Smith v. Maclure." Being substituted for the original grates, they passed with the land, and were just as much the mortgagee's property as the original grates would have been. He referred to the cases of "Hellawell v. Eastwood" (6 Exch., 295); "D'Eyncourt v. Gregory" (L.R., 3 Eq., 382); "Holland v. Hodgson" (L.R., 7 C.P., 328); "Longbottom v. Berry" (L.R., 5 Q.B., 123); "Norton v. Dashwood" (65 L.J., Ch., 737); "Viscount Hill v. Bullock" ([1897] 2 Ch.D., 482).

HIS LORDSHIP, in giving judgment, said for the purposes of this action the plaintiff represented Mr. Grenfell; if the articles in question belonged to him as against the mortgagee, they were now, as he understood it, the plaintiff's as against the mortgagee. And so the question in the action was simply this, Have these "fitments" passed to the mortgagee by reason of the mortgage. It was a question of fact whether these things passed to the mortgagee or not, but it was a question of fact which had to be determined with reference to certain well-known rules of law. It was said to be a question of intention whether a thing attached to the freehold, or introduced into the freehold, or upon the freehold, passed to the realty so as to become part of the realty. If it was a question of intention, that intention was to be ascertained with reference to certain well-known rules. In this case he had to ascertain whether the things put in by Mr. Grenfell were put in for a temporary purpose merely, or whether they were put in so as to form part of the house, whether they were put in to improve the inheritance—that is to say, to make it a better house than it was before—or were they put in merely for a temporary purpose, to be removed whenever the person who put them in thought fit. Having considered the nature of the articles in question, and the intention with which they were put in, he came to the conclusion that they both formed part of the freehold passing to the mortgagee. He need hardly say that, if this were a question between landlord and tenant, he might come to a very different conclusion. If a tenant had put these things into his landlord's house, he might, and very likely he should, have found his intention quite different from the intention he had attributed to Mr. Grenfell. With regard to the dog-grates, he also came to the conclusion that, although these grates were not fixed and could be removed without injury to the freehold, yet they formed part of the freehold, and passed to the mortgagee. He therefore gave judgment for the defendant with costs on the claim, and on the counter-claim for £30 and costs.

IN RE THE TRENCH TUBELESS TYRE COMPANY (LIMITED)
—BETHELL V. THE SAME COMPANY.*

Company—Winding up—Liquidator—Appointment, validity of—Notice convening meeting.

In this appeal against a decision of Mr. Justice Kekewich's the question was whether the liquidator appointed in the winding up of the above company had been duly appointed. The action was brought by debenture-holders of the company for the realization of their security. An order was made in the action appointing a receiver, who took possession of some documents of the company. After this had been done a general meeting of the company was held on November 1, 1899, at which resolutions were passed for the voluntary winding up of the company, and a Mr. Walker was appointed liquidator. Notice was then given to the shareholders that a meeting would be held on November 16, when the following resolutions, duly passed at the meeting on November 1, would be submitted for confirmation as special resolutions:—(1) That the company be wound up voluntarily; (2) "that Mr. Walker be and is hereby appointed the liquidator to conduct the winding up." The meeting was accordingly held on November 16, when the first resolution was passed, but the second was rejected, and instead of it a resolution was passed appointing Mr. W. F. Marreco liquidator. Afterwards a motion was made on behalf of the company that the receiver might be ordered to deliver up to the liquidator some books and documents of which the receiver had taken possession, but which were not comprised in the debentures. The plaintiffs were willing that these documents should be delivered to a properly appointed liquidator, but they contended that Mr. Marreco had not been duly appointed, because the notice of the second meeting only stated that the resolution appointing Mr. Walker would be submitted for confirmation, and said nothing about the appointment of any other person as liquidator. Mr. Justice Kekewich held that Mr. Marreco had not been validly appointed liquidator. His Lordship was of opinion that it was not competent to the company to amend a resolution of which notice had been given. A shareholder who received the notice was entitled to consider whether it was worth his while to attend the meeting, and when he was told that a specified person, in whom he might have confidence, was to be appointed liquidator he might think it unnecessary to attend. The company appealed.

Mr. Ward Coldridge was for the company; Mr. Warrington, Q.C., and Mr. Martelli were for the plaintiffs.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said that the learned Judge had proceeded upon the view that a notice ought not to be misleading, and that this notice might have been misleading, and for some time he (the Master of the Rolls) thought there might be something in that, because no doubt when the shareholders were summoned to this meeting of November 1 all that was called to their attention by the notice was whether the company should be wound up and whether Mr. Walker should be appointed liquidator. But upon looking further into the matter, and bearing in mind that it was now well settled that as soon as a resolution was passed for the winding up of the company it was competent for the company without notice to appoint a liquidator, the case assumed a somewhat different aspect. He did not believe himself that Walker's supporters had in fact been misled. It was, however, suggested that other shareholders kept away from the meeting in the belief that all that could be done was either to accept or reject Walker; but if that was their view they were wrong in law. There were two answers to that. In the first place, the second resolution was not an amendment of the former one, but was a different resolution, and, in the second place, if the Court gave effect to that objection they would be giving to directors the power to palm off their nominee upon the company unless the meeting was postponed and a fresh notice given. That ought not to be allowed. Every one connected with companies should know that directly a resolution for a voluntary liquidation had been passed the appointment of a liquidator could be proposed and carried. There could be no doubt that the appointment of Mr. Marreco was valid, and therefore the documents ought to be delivered up to him.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY agreed. He said that the first meeting at which a liquidator could be appointed was the confirmatory meeting, and when the directors found that the appointment of Mr. Walker would not be agreed to they took the right course in dropping the resolution for his appointment altogether, thereby leaving it open to those who wished to appoint another person to propose a resolution for that purpose.

KIMBER V. ADMANS.*

Covenant—Construction—"House," meaning of.

Building a block of flats on a plot of land held not to contravene a covenant not to build more than one house upon it.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice Cozens-Hardy's. The plaintiff and the defendant were owners of adjoining plots of land forming part of a building estate. Each plot was subject to a covenant not to build more than one house upon it. The defendant proposed to build a block of flats upon each plot of land belonging to him. The plaintiff complained of this as a breach of the covenant and moved for an injunction to restrain the defendant from erecting these buildings. Mr. Justice Cozens-Hardy refused the motion, being of opinion, upon the construction of this covenant, that each block of flats was one house only, and not a series of houses. The plaintiff appealed.

Mr. W. H. Cozens-Hardy was for the plaintiff; and Mr. Buckmaster for the defendant.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS thought that the learned

Judge was clearly right. What was the meaning of the word house in this covenant? In his Lordship's opinion it did not refer to the mode in which the building was to be subdivided and let, but to the aggregate of the rooms making up the building. No doubt a portion of a house might be a house for some purposes, as for purposes of rating or franchise, but when the word was applied to a covenant of this description it did not refer to the interior portions of the building, but to the whole thing. This covenant was directed not to the parts, but to the aggregate.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY agreed.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS also agreed. In construing this restrictive covenant he thought that the question to be asked was what was the object of it, and if he could see no object in the covenant if it was simply limited to the brick and mortar erection, he would be disposed to put upon the word house a meaning which would cover the user of the house as distinguished from the physical erection. But he did not think that any one familiar with building estates in London would have any difficulty in ascertaining the object of this covenant, if the word house were construed as meaning the physical erection.

Vendor and Purchaser—Conditions of sale—Deposit—Forfeiture.

If the vendor fulfils the conditions of sale any time before the date fixed for completion he has performed his part of the contract.

This was an appeal by the defendant from the judgment of Mr. Justice Bucknill. The action was brought to recover a deposit of £100 paid by the plaintiff to the defendant upon a contract, whereby the plaintiff agreed to purchase from the defendant the latter's interest in the lease of a publichouse, called the Black Boy, at St. Mary Cray, Kent. The publichouse was owned by Mr. Kidd, a brewer, and he had granted a lease of it for a term of years to the defendant. Mr. Kidd had lent the defendant £900, upon mortgage of the house, payable on demand, there being an understanding that the loan should be paid off by annual instalments of £50. On September 10, 1898, six-and-a-half years of the lease having expired, the defendant entered into an agreement with the plaintiff, whereby the defendant, in consideration of the sum of £100 then paid to him by way of deposit, and of the further sum of £1,700, to be paid to him at the time fixed for completion, agreed with the plaintiff to assign to him (the plaintiff) the lease of the Black Boy, and all the defendant's interest therein for the remainder of the unexpired term, amounting to about 22 years, subject to the performance of the covenants therein contained. The time fixed by the agreement for the completion of the purchase was November 10, 1898. The agreement contained a provision that in case of default by the purchaser the deposit money was to be forfeited, and also the following clause:—"This agreement is entered into conditionally that C. N. Kidd, Esq., of the Steam Brewery, Dartford, will transfer his present loan of £850. . . ." At the time of the agreement, £50 had been paid off the loan of £900. The deposit of £100 was paid. On October 4, the plaintiff, the defendant, and the broker, acting for both parties, had an interview with Mr. Kidd, when the latter refused to lend more than £700, to be repaid by instalments of £50 a year. The learned Judge came to the conclusion that the plaintiff, from that moment, determined to treat the agreement as at an end, on account of the refusal of Mr. Kidd to transfer his loan of £850, and that the plaintiff at the interview at once said that the contract was at an end. Later on the same day the broker saw Mr. Kidd again, though not with the authority of the plaintiff, and, after some discussion, Mr. Kidd agreed to transfer the loan of £850 on condition that it was paid off by yearly instalment of £50. On November 11, 1898, the plaintiff brought this action to recover the £100 deposit paid to the defendant. Mr. Justice Bucknill gave judgment for the plaintiff.

Mr. R. M. BRAY, Q.C., and Mr. C. L. ATTENBOROUGH, for the defendant, contended that the plaintiff was not entitled to repudiate the contract on October 4, when Mr. Kidd at first refused to transfer the loan. The defendant had a reasonable time within which to get Mr. Kidd's consent to the transfer. The condition would be fulfilled if Mr. Kidd's consent was obtained at any time before November 10, the day fixed for completion, or at any rate within a reasonable time. The plaintiff therefore could not recover the deposit. The purchase did not go off on account of the default of the defendant. They referred to "Day v. Singleton" ([1899] 2 Ch., 320, at p. 327).

Mr. BLAKE ODGERS, Q.C., and Mr. F. O. ROBINSON, for the plaintiff, contended—first, that Mr. Kidd never did consent to transfer the £850 simply. He only agreed to do so upon condition that it was repaid by annual instalments. That was not a fulfilment of the condition in the agreement. Secondly, even if Mr. Kidd did subsequently to the interview on October 4 consent to transfer the loan, Mr. Kidd's absolute refusal at that interview entitled the plaintiff to treat the contract as at an end from that moment, and to bring an action to recover the deposit, it being the duty of the defendant to obtain the consent of Mr. Kidd. The time fixed for completion was not the time for getting Mr. Kidd's consent. The time for obtaining the consent was a reasonable time after the date of the agreement. By arranging to go and see Mr. Kidd on October 4 the parties had fixed that interview as the time for getting Mr. Kidd's consent, and upon Mr. Kidd's absolute refusal at that interview the plaintiff was entitled to treat the contract as at an end. "Davis v. Nisbett" (10 C.B., N.S., 752) was in point. The vendor could not expect the purchaser to wait any longer to see if the consent could be obtained. It was necessary to have Mr. Kidd's consent some time before the date fixed for completion to enable the plaintiff to provide the purchase money and to avoid the expense of preparing the conveyance. They also referred to "Weston v. Savage" (10 Ch.D., 736); "Farrer v. Nash" (35 Beav., 167); "Lloyd v. Crispe" (5 Taunt., 249).

The COURT allowed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that it seemed to him to be clear upon the construction of the agreement that if the defendant was able to fulfil the condition as to the transfer of the loan by November 10, the date fixed for completion, he would have performed his part of the agreement. That was his view of the construction of this contract. It was clear that at the interview of October 4 Mr. Kidd said that he would only transfer the loan to the amount of £700, and thereupon the plaintiff put his foot down and said that the agreement was off. Subsequently, on the same day, Mr. Kidd agreed to have the whole of the £850 on mortgage subject to the condition that the principal sum was paid off by annual instalments of £50. In his opinion the plaintiff had no right to treat the agreement as at an end at the interview of October 4, inasmuch as the defendant had until November 10 to fulfil the condition as to the transfer of the loan. The plaintiff might have subsequently receded from the position he then took up as soon as he ascertained that Mr. Kidd would transfer the loan. It was clear from the correspondence that he never did recede from that position, but from first to last he said that he adhered to the position he so took up. The plaintiff, who had no right to treat the agreement as at an end and was therefore himself in default, could not recover the deposit. The appeal must be allowed and judgment entered for the defendant.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS concurred. The case seemed to him to be clear when once the facts were understood. The crucial question, in his opinion, was whether the plaintiff was justified in treating what happened on October 4 as a final declaration by the defendant of his inability to carry out the contract. If he was justified in so treating it, then he was justified in rescinding the contract. He need not, however, in such a case have treated the contract as at an end; he would have been entitled to refuse to treat it as rescinded. But his rights, if he treated what happened as a repudiation of the contract, and therefore as a rescission, would be one thing; his rights if he elected not to rescind would be quite another thing. Those two sets of rights were incompatible and could not be simultaneously asserted. In the present case it was proved beyond all question that the plaintiff on October 4 finally withdrew from the contract, and he never receded from that position. By that position only were the plaintiff's rights to be ascertained. He treated what happened on October 4 as a final refusal by the defendant to carry out the contract. If the plaintiff had legal grounds for so treating it, he was right. If not, he was wrong. What ground had he for treating that which took place on October 4 as a final refusal by the defendant to carry out the contract or a declaration by the defendant of his incapacity to complete the purchase? It was true that at the interview on October 4 the defendant was not in a position to say that he had performed the condition. But the contract did not say that the condition was to be performed before the date fixed for completion. That being so, if inability to perform the condition before the date fixed for completion was relied upon, it must be in consequence of some independent agreement by which the parties had agreed to treat it as such. There was no evidence of any such agreement, nor, he might add, was there any evidence of a custom to that effect. The defendant remained therefore with his rights unimpaired. The plaintiff had wrongfully treated what passed at the interview as a final repudiation by the defendant of the contract and as a declaration by the defendant of his inability to carry it out. The plaintiff could not now, having then taken up that position, aver his readiness and willingness to carry out the contract. He could not aver any excuse relieving him from the obligation of showing readiness and willingness to carry it out. The plaintiff therefore could not succeed in this action. It was endeavoured to show that the plaintiff was entitled to succeed on the alternative ground—namely, that he had not treated the contract as at an end on October 4, and that the defendant had not performed the condition before the date fixed for completion. That right could not co-exist with the right to treat the contract as at an end. How could a person, who treated the contract as at an end on October 4 and consistently adhered to that position, pursue the other remedy which was based upon his readiness and willingness to complete? The point was nowhere better treated than by Lord Esher in "Johnstone v. Milling" (16 Q.B.D., 460, at p. 467). It was quite unnecessary therefore to discuss what Mr. Kidd would have done or what he did subsequently thereto as to giving his consent to the transfer of the loan.

LORD JUSTICE ROMER concurred. The law applicable to such conditions as appeared in this contract was well settled. These conditions were not uncommon in contracts between vendors and purchasers of real estate, that was to say, a condition that the vendor would procure the person who had lent money on mortgage of the property to accept the purchaser as the mortgagor in lieu of the vendor. The vendor had until the time fixed for the completion of the purchase, or, if there was no time fixed for completion, then until after the lapse of a reasonable time, for performing the condition. Until the time for completion had arrived he was at liberty to prove the assent of the mortgagee to accept the purchaser as mortgagor. It was true that though the condition need not be fulfilled until the day fixed for completion, the purchaser was not bound in all cases to wait until that date. He (the Lord Justice) knew of four such exceptions, though he did not say that the list was an exhaustive one. First, the purchaser might show by sufficient evidence that the condition had been practically fulfilled before the day fixed for completion. Secondly, the purchaser might show that the vendor had substantially and practically admitted that the condition was incapable of fulfilment. Thirdly, there might be an agreement between the vendor that a particular refusal by the mortgagee to accept the purchaser as mortgagor should be treated as final and conclusive, and that agreement need not be expressed, but might be implied from the circumstances. Fourthly, it might be that a particular refusal of the mortgagee was so acquiesced in and treated by the vendor as to justify the purchaser in coming to the conclusion that the matter was at an end, and in treating the refusal as final. Those were the four cases. It lay upon the purchaser to prove the special circumstances which would justify him in treating the contract as at an end. If he treated the contract as at an end before the time for completion without any justification, the vendor could treat the purchaser as having broken the contract, and the vendor would be relieved from further carrying out the contract or performing the condition. The purchaser in such a case could not recover any deposit paid by him. Certain cases as between vendor and purchaser had been referred to in which the purchaser before the time for completion ascertained that the vendor had not the title to give him which he professed to have, and that there were no legal means of completing the title before the time fixed. It was clear that in such a case the purchaser was entitled at once to treat the contract as at an end, upon the simple ground that the vendor could not ask the purchaser to wait on in the mere hope of the vendor being able to buy or otherwise acquire his title. Those cases had no application to the present case. The only case which had any bearing upon the point was "Davis v. Nibbett," which was a case of an agreement to assign the lease of a farm subject to the approval of the assignee as a tenant by the landlord. The case was heard on demurrer, and the plea that was demurred to was treated by the Court as an averment of a final and irrevocable disapproval of the proposed tenant by the landlord. The case, therefore, fell within one of the four cases stated above. In the present case the plaintiff was not justified upon the facts in assuming that the first refusal of Mr. Kidd to transfer the loan was to be treated as final and conclusive. There was no agreement that it should be so treated, and it was not treated as such by the vendor, nor did he lead the purchaser to think that he was so treating it. On the contrary, the vendor treated it as temporary only, and he was intending to make further efforts to have the condition fulfilled. The plaintiff was, therefore, not entitled to treat the contract as at an end. That being so, it was not necessary to inquire into what happened subsequently. But, if it had been necessary to inquire whether the condition had been subsequently fulfilled, he should hold that it had. The mortgagee consented to leave the mortgage standing for the whole amount, subject to the condition that the principal should be paid off by annual instalments. Seeing that the principal money due under the mortgage was repayable on demand, it was clear to him that the condition in no way prevented the assent of the mortgagee from being a fulfilment of the condition in the contract, for two reasons. In the first place, because, upon the facts, the mortgagee was only insisting as against the purchaser upon the same terms as those on which the vendor had the mortgage. If so, the purchaser had nothing to complain of, as he was only entitled to get the transfer of the mortgage on the same terms as the vendor had it. In the second place, the purchaser could not complain of the condition as to repayment of the principal money by annual instalments because the principal money due under the mortgage was repayable on demand and the sole result of his not paying an instalment would be a liability to pay the whole sum on demand. All that it meant was that the mortgagee by accepting payment by instalments would be doing what he was not bound to do. If it were necessary, therefore, he should hold that the condition had been fulfilled.

UPPERTON V. SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY AND ANOTHER.*

Metropolis—Police Acts—Pension—Annual pay —Special service allowance—Pension, how calculated.

This was an appeal by case stated from the justices of London. Frederick Upperton, the appellant, a police-constable, appealed to the London quarter sessions from the decision of the Chief Commissioner of Police for the metropolis refusing to reconsider a claim made by the appellant for an increased amount of pension. The quarter sessions dismissed the appeal subject to a case stated for the opinion of the High Court. The appellant joined the metropolitan police force on December 30, 1872, and retired on January 2, 1899, whereupon he became, by virtue of the Police Act, 1890, entitled to a pension equal to two-thirds of his annual pay at that date. He was awarded a pension of £55 9s. 4d. a year, being 52 times the sum of £1 1s. 4d., such sum being two-thirds of £1 12s., the ordinary pay of a constable of the appellant's rank and service. For nine years prior to 1894 the appellant had served on special duty at the Houses of Parliament during the sittings of Parliament, receiving 7s. a week special service allowance in addition to his ordinary pay while so doing. In 1894 he was selected for permanent special duty at the House of Lords, and continued upon such special duty, receiving the special service allowance, until the date of his retirement. This 7s. a week was payable by the Commissioner of Police, and was paid partly as a recognition of good conduct and partly because by being withdrawn from ordinary duty the appellant to some extent lost his chance of promotion. The sum of 7d. a week was deducted from the appellant's ordinary pay as a contribution towards the pension fund in accordance with section 15 of the Police Act, 1890, but no deduction was made from the 7s. special service allowance. During absence owing to sickness the special service allowance is usually stopped and is paid to the constable who actually performs the special duty. Schedule 1 of the Police Act, 1890, provides that the pension of a constable on his retirement shall be within the maximum and minimum limits therein prescribed, "so, however, that the pension shall not exceed two-thirds of his annual pay." Two points were raised on behalf of the appellant—(1) that in calculating the pension the 7s. a week special service allowance should be taken into account, and (2) that the annual pay was 365 times the daily pay, and not 52 times the weekly pay.

Mr. E. H. Pickersgill appeared for the appellant, and Mr. Macmorran, Q.C., and Mr. Grain for the respondents.

The COURT differed in opinion upon the first point, and the appeal on that point accordingly failed. They allowed the appeal on the other point.

MR. JUSTICE CHANNELL said the main difference between the Police Act, 1890, and the prior Acts was that in the Act of 1890 police-constables were given a pension as of right. The Act did not fix the amount of the pension, but provided that the pension should be in accordance with the scale adopted by any police force, and such scale was to be within maximum and minimum limits mentioned in the schedule. In the metropolitan police force the maximum allowed by the Act had been adopted, so that the pension of the appellant must be dealt with according to the maximum laid down by the Act. Schedule 1, where the provisions as to pensions were to be found, ended as follows:—"So, however, that the pension shall not exceed two-thirds of his annual pay." The appellant's pension had been granted on the assumption that it was two-thirds of his annual pay. The question, therefore, was, What was the meaning to be given to "annual pay"? Schedule 1 was the only part of the Act in which the term "annual pay" was used. But the term "pay" was used in other parts of the Act. Pay and allowances seemed to be treated separately. In the case of the metropolitan police force the staff appeared to have been entitled under the Metropolitan Police Staff (Superannuation) Act, 1875, to pensions in respect of allowances as well as in respect of their pay. Section 32 (5) of the Act of 1890 provided that "the rate and conditions of pension of the Chief Commissioner of Metropolitan Police and the Assistant Commissioners shall be regulated by the provisions of this Act, and not under the Metropolitan Police Staff (Superannuation) Act, 1875, but the Chief Commissioner and the Assistant Commissioners shall be entitled to pension under the provisions of this Act in respect of any emoluments in respect of which they are entitled to superannuation allowances under the Metropolitan Police Staff (Superannuation) Act, 1875." Those officers were, therefore, to come under the Act of 1890 as regards pension calculated upon their pay, and they were to have the additional benefit of the Act of 1875. That implied that "pay" in the Act meant pay strictly so called, and that there were other things which were not strictly pay. Pay in the ordinary sense would cover any money remuneration for services, and prima facie the 7s. a week special service allowance came within that definition. But in the Act the word pay was evidently used in the special meaning in which it had got to be used between police-constables and those who employed them. The appellant was employed on duty at the House of Lords. A considerable number of police-constables were employed about the Houses of Parliament while the Houses were sitting, and these men received, while they attended on that duty, a shilling a day out of money provided by Parliament for that purpose. A weekly sheet was made out which the constables signed tents. Their Lordships could not agree with the views so expressed. The respondent admitted in his evidence (as, indeed, is plain without his admission) that what was proposed to be reduced was the £35,000 to below £30,000, or (in other words) that the two sums are co-extensive. It was not, therefore, a mere question of the meaning of the words "the total cost of the works" standing alone, but the meaning of "the estimate of £35,000" had also to be considered. Those words point to something which was known to and in the contemplation of both parties to the contract, and with reference to which they contracted, and in order to construe and apply the contract they must ascertain what was included in "the estimate of £35,000," on the reduction of which the contract depended. Extrinsic evidence was always admissible, not to contradict or vary the contract, but to apply it to the facts which the parties had in their minds and were negotiating about. The rule was thus stated in "Taylor on Evidence" (eighth edition, vol. 2, section 1,194):—"It may be laid down as a broad and distinct rule of law that extrinsic evidence of every material fact which will enable the Court to ascertain the nature and qualities of the subject-matter of the instrument, or, in other words, to identify the persons and things to which the instrument refers must of necessity be received." In "Grant v. Grant" (L.R., 5 C.P., 727, at p. 728) Mr. Justice Blackburn quoted judicially the following passage from his valuable work on "Contract of Sale" (p. 49):—"The general rule seems to be that all facts are admissible which tend to show the sense the words bear with reference to the surrounding circumstances of and concerning which the words were used, but that such facts as only tend to show that the writer intended to use words bearing a particular sense are to be rejected." Various cases might be cited in which those principles had been applied. In "Ogilvie v. Foljambe" (3 Mer., 53) Sir William Grant said:—"The defendant speaks of 'Mr. Ogilvie's house,' and agrees 'to give £14,000 for the premises,' and parol evidence has always been admitted in such a case to show to what house and to what premises the treaty related." In "Macdonald v. Longbottom" (1 E. and E., 977) Lord Campbell said:—"This was an offer made to the plaintiffs and accepted by them of 16s. per stone for 'your wool,' to be delivered in Liverpool. The only question, therefore, is what was the subject-matter of the contract described as 'your wool'? I am of opinion that when there is a contract for the sale of a specific subject-matter oral evidence may be received for the purpose of showing what that subject-matter was of every fact within the knowledge of the parties before and at the time of the contract. Now, Stewart, the defendant's agent, had a conversation before the contract with one of the plaintiffs, who stated what wool he had on his own farm and what he had bought from other farms. The two together constituted 'his wool,' and with the knowledge of these facts the defendant contracts to buy 'your wool.' There cannot be the slightest objection to the admission of evidence of this previous conversation, which neither alters nor adds to the written contract, but merely enables us to ascertain what was the subject-matter referred to therein." And in "Smith v. Thompson" (8 C.B., 44) evidence was admitted of previous letters to show that a sum of money transmitted by an employer to his clerk for "business purposes" was properly applied by the clerk in payment of his own salary. Of course, if the words in question had a fixed meaning not susceptible of explanation, parol evidence was not admissible to show that the parties meant something different from what they had said. That was not so in the present case. Their Lordships thought that "the total cost of the works" might mean the cost to the owner of the completed railway, and they thought that any person receiving the letter with a knowledge of the previous circular and of the conversation of the previous day according to Chapman's version (which the jury evidently believed) might, and would, have so understood it. Their Lordships were, therefore, of opinion that the evidence objected to was admissible, and Mr. Justice Cohen was right in the course which he took at the trial of declining to construe the contract without the assistance of the jury. The weight and import of the evidence were for the jury to consider, and their verdict in favour of the present appellants was decisive of the view they took as to the effect of it. In the opinion of their Lordships there were no sufficient grounds for disturbing it, even if they dissented from it, which they were far from doing. Their Lordships would, therefore, humbly advise her Majesty that the order of the Supreme Court be reversed, and, instead thereof, it be ordered that the rule nisi be discharged, with costs to be paid by the respondent, who must also pay the costs of the appeal.

Court of Appeal (A. L. Smith, } 1900.
Collins, and Romer, L.J.J.) } Feb. 17.

MASON V. A. R. DEAN (LIMITED); MOORE AND SONS, THIRD PARTIES.*

Master and Servant—Master's liability to servant
—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897—
"Undertakers," who are.

Where a building is being constructed by several persons, not jointly, but each doing a separate part, each and all of them are "undertakers" within the meaning of sec. 7 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Judge of the County Court of Lancashire, holden at Salford, on a special case stated by an arbitrator, who had been appointed by the County Court Judge to hear an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. The applicant for compensation was Jane Mason, the widow of Frederick William Mason, who had been killed in the course of his employment by a fall from a scaffold. The employers of the deceased man were A. R. Dean (Limited), who carried on business at Birmingham as furnishers and decorators. The accident happened on February 10, 1899, at the Lyceum Theatre, Eccles, near Manchester. The theatre was then an incomplete building, exceeding 30ft. in height, and it was being constructed by means of a scaffolding. Messrs. Moore and Sons had prior to the date of the accident contracted with the building owner for the construction of the building and for the erection of the scaffolding from which the deceased man fell. Under powers reserved in Messrs. Moore and Sons' contract the architects let off to A. R. Dean (Limited) certain decorative work. The scaffolding used by the deceased and his fellow-workmen was erected by Moore and Sons at the expense of the building owner. At the time of the accident the deceased man was engaged in doing for his employers, A. R. Dean (Limited), part of the work which they had contracted with the building owner to do—namely, painting the ceiling of the theatre. He was walking on the scaffolding when one of the planks gave way, and he fell to the pit floor and was instantly killed. The applicant made the employers respondents to the arbitration, claiming compensation from them. The respondents delivered a defence, in which they denied liability on the ground that the employment of the deceased was not an employment to which the Workmen's Compensation Act applied; and they also alleged that Messrs. Moore and Sons or their workmen erected the defective scaffolding and were the persons responsible for the scaffolding. The respondents delivered to Moore and Sons a notice of claim to indemnity against all liability on account of any accident caused by the scaffolding. At the hearing of the arbitration before the arbitrator appointed by the County Court Judge, it was contended on behalf of the applicant that the respondents were undertakers within the meaning of section 7, subsection 2, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, and that they were engaged on work of construction in a building exceeding 30ft. in height, and then being constructed by means of a scaffolding. It was contended on the part of the respondents that the work which they had contracted to do was not work of construction within the meaning of the Act, and that they were not undertakers within the meaning of the Act. The arbitrator held that the respondents were undertakers, and that they were engaged in the construction of a building exceeding 30ft. in height, such building being then in the course of construction by means of a scaffolding, and he awarded the applicant the sum of £300, with costs. At the request of the respondents the arbitrator stated a case for the opinion of the County Court Judge, submitting the following questions:—(1) Whether the respondents were undertakers in the construction of a building within the meaning of the Act; (2) whether the employment in the course of which the said personal injuries were caused to the deceased workman was employment to which the Workmen's Compensation Act applies. The County Court Judge set aside the award of the arbitrator with costs, on the ground that, though the respondents were undertakers engaged in the construction of a building within the Act, yet the case of "Wood v. Walsh and Sons" ([1899] 1 Q.B., 1,009) showed that painting the ceiling of the theatre was not an employment within the Act. The applicant appealed.

Mr. R. W. Harper appeared for the applicant; Mr. C. A. Russell, Q.C., and Mr. Byrne for the respondents; and Mr. Ames for the third parties.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that in his opinion the respondents were liable in this case. The County Court Judge had held that they were not liable, thinking himself bound so to hold by reason of the decision in "Wood v. Walsh and Sons." But that case really had nothing to do with the present. Messrs. Moore and Sons, a firm of builders, had undertaken the work of building a theatre at Eccles. By the terms of the contract the building owner was at liberty to give some portions of the work to other persons, and he accordingly placed a portion of it in the hands of the respondents. While the respondents were carrying out their part of the work the deceased man, who was in their employment and was engaged in the work, met his death by falling through a scaffolding. The question was whether the respondents were undertakers within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act. The Act only applied to certain classes of employers, as shown by section 7, subsection 1. Did it apply to the respondents? It applied to "employment by the undertakers, as hereinafter defined, on, in, or about any building which exceeds 30ft. in height and is either being constructed or repaired by means of a scaffolding or being demolished." Here the building was not completed. The respondents were put on to do certain work which would help to bring it to completion. The contract of the respondents with the building owner showed that the work they had to do included the putting up of a ceiling, the erection of a proscenium, and the fixing the private boxes with columns, caps, &c. No doubt a good deal of the work was decoration pure and simple. But there was ample to show that they had also to perform structural work. The building was over 30ft. high, and it was being constructed by means of a scaffolding. It was clear that the deceased man was employed on a building within the Act. Was he employed by undertakers within the meaning of the Act? By subsection 2 of section 7 "undertakers" meant, in the case of a building, the persons undertaking the construction, repair, or demolition. Ought that to be construed as meaning the persons undertaking the construction of the whole building or did it also include the persons undertaking the construction of a substantial part of a building? In his opinion a person who undertook the construction of a substantial part of a building was an undertaker within the Act. He therefore thought that the judgment of the County Court Judge was wrong, and that the applicant was entitled to the compensation which had been awarded to her by the arbitrator.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS was of the same opinion. The respondents' specification clearly embraced work which must be described as construction rather than decoration, and the judgment of the County Court Judge could not be supported on that ground. With regard to the other question, it seemed to him to be immaterial what particular sort of work the workman was doing at the time of the accident. The point to consider was whether his employment was an employment within the Act and whether it was employment by undertakers within the meaning of the Act. Here the respondents were persons undertaking the construction of part of a building, and, in his opinion, they were undertakers within the Act.

LORD JUSTICE ROMER agreed. He thought that where a building was being constructed by several persons, not jointly, but each doing a separate part, each and all of them came within the definition of "undertakers" in section 7. But only that undertaker was liable to pay compensation in whose employment the workman was at the time of the accident.

Mr. AMES said that the third parties had been served with notice of the appeal, and asked that their costs might be allowed.

The COURT refused to make any order as to the costs of the third parties.

Court of Appeal (Lindley, M.R., Vaughan Williams and Romer, L.J.J.) 1900.
Feb. 19.
ALLEN V. THE GOLD REEFS OF WEST AFRICA (LIMITED).
Company—Articles of Association—Alteration—Lien on shares.

Held (Vaughan Williams, L.J., dissenting), that a company can alter its articles so as to extend the lien which it previously had over unpaid shares for debts due to it from its members to fully paid-up shares issued to the vendor before the date of the alteration.

This was an appeal by the company against a decision of Mr. Justice Kekewich's. It raised a question of company law of great importance—viz., as to the right of a company to alter its articles so as to extend the lien which it previously had over unpaid shares for debts due to it from its members to fully paid-up shares issued before the date of the alteration; and a further question—whether, assuming this right to exist, it was affected by the fact that the fully paid-up shares were vendors' shares. There was also a subsidiary question as to the validity of a notice of a meeting sent to the registered address of a member known by the company to be dead. The action was brought by the executors of Emilio Zuccani, who was the registered holder of vendors' fully paid-up shares and also of partly-paid shares in the defendant company, for a declaration that the defendants had no lien upon the fully paid up shares, and for an injunction to restrain the forfeiture of the partly-paid shares. Mr. Justice Kekewich held that the forfeiture was bad because the notice threatening forfeiture claimed too much interest, and also because it was wrongly addressed; and he also held that the company had no lien on the paid-up shares of the testator, because the notice of the meeting to be held for the purpose of altering the articles by extending the lien to these shares was bad as being wrongly addressed. His Lordship also doubted whether the company had power to alter its articles for the purpose of retrospectively affecting the existing rights of the owner of a particular group of shares without his consent. The facts are fully stated in the judgment of the Master of the Rolls.

Mr. Warrington, Q.C., and Mr. Dunham were for the company; Mr. Renshaw, Q.C., and Mr. D. M. Kerly were for the plaintiffs.

The appeal was heard on January 18, 19, and 20 last. The Court then gave judgment upon the question of forfeiture, affirming the decision of Mr. Justice Kekewich upon the ground that the notice claimed too much interest; but they reserved judgment upon the question of the right of the company to a lien on the fully-paid shares. Upon this point their Lordships delivered judgment allowing the appeal (Lord Justice Vaughan Williams dissenting).

The MASTER of the ROLLS said:—This is an appeal from a judgment of Mr. Justice Kekewich granting an injunction restraining the defendants from enforcing a lien on some fully paid-up shares in the company and belonging to a deceased shareholder named Zuccani. The appeal is not only important to the parties to it but it raises several questions of great general interest relating to the power of limited companies to alter their articles, and especially to their power to alter their articles so as to affect shares standing in the names of deceased shareholders, and to the effect of an alteration duly made on vendors' fully paid-up shares issued before the alteration is made. The facts are as follows:—The defendant company was formed and registered under the Companies Act, 1862, with limited liability. Its memorandum of association declared its nominal capital to be £90,000, divided into 360,000 shares of 5s. each. The fifth clause of the memorandum declared that the original shares, or any of them, or any other shares which might be afterwards created, might be issued fully paid up and with such preference, privileges, or priority over or postponement to the remaining or any other shares of the company in respect of dividends or otherwise as might be determined. The memorandum was accompanied by articles of association, which will be referred to presently, and which made a marked distinction as regards lien and transfer between shares fully paid up and shares not fully paid up. Both classes of shares were issued. Zuccani, as the nominee of the vendor to the company, had a number of fully paid-up shares allotted to him, and he held 27,885 of these when he died. It was not suggested that these shares were not his own. There is no evidence of any special bargain conferring upon Zuccani any special rights in respect of these shares. In addition to these fully paid-up shares Zuccani applied for and had allotted to him 60,000 ordinary 5s. shares, not paid up. These were applied for and allotted on the terms of the company's prospectus and articles of association: Nothing in this appeal turns on the prospectus. Calls were from time to time made in Zuccani's lifetime on the unpaid-up shares of the company. He did not pay these calls when they became due, and as early as May, 1896, and thenceforward during his life letters were sent to him pressing for payment of his arrears. Although Zuccani did not pay his calls, he constantly paid up quantities of shares in full before their amounts had been called up. In other words, he from time to time not only paid all the calls due on some of his shares, but he also prepaid the uncalled-up amounts of the same shares. He did this constantly all through 1896, and in that way he was able to sell and transfer the shares so paid up free from all liability to calls and from all lien in favour of the company. From the money so obtained by him he made remittances to the company on account of his calls in arrear. His object in fully paying up batches of these shares in the way described obviously was to obtain shares which he could put on the market free from all claims and demands by the company. Why the directors allowed him to do this is not explained. It was obviously an accommodation to him, and I cannot find any evidence to show that it was anything more. All the shares thus paid up were transferred by him in his lifetime; he did not hold any of them when he died, and it is unnecessary, therefore, to consider what special rights, if any, his executors might have had in respect of such shares if he had continued to hold any of them up to the time of his death. Zuccani died on February 4, 1897. He left a will which was proved in March, 1897, by the plaintiffs, his executors. When he died he held the 27,885 fully paid-up vendors' shares already mentioned. He also held 36,435 other shares not fully paid up, and he owed the company over £8,000 in respect of these. This sum did not include interest, which amounted to a large additional sum. The plaintiffs did not register themselves as members of the company in respect of Zuccani's shares, and they had not assets enough to pay his liabilities. No one can blame the directors for endeavouring to obtain payment of the money due from Zuccani's estate to the company by any legal means. Steps were taken to have his estate administered in the Chancery Division, and the company could, of course, have carried in a proof for its debt. But other and more summary means were had recourse to. The articles of association as they stood when Zuccani died contained a power to forfeit shares in respect of which any money was due to the company. The company attempted to exercise this power, but the Court has held that, owing to mistakes made by the company, the forfeiture declared was invalid. The power of forfeiture only extended to shares not fully paid up. The articles gave to the company no power to refuse to register a transfer of fully paid-up shares. The directors did, however, refuse to register a transfer of some paid-up shares on January 29, 1897. But they were wrong in so doing, and that transfer was ultimately passed. Again, the company had no lien whatever on fully paid-up shares. A lien on such shares or the possibility of a lien on them renders them unquotable on the Stock Exchange, and it is usual in articles of association conferring a lien on shares expressly to exclude fully paid-up shares from any lien. Article 29 did this. The articles of the company gave it a lien on unpaid-up shares, not only for money due from their holder to the company in respect of such shares, but for all debts, liabilities, and engagements of the holder to the company; and on proper notice and default of payment power was given to the company to sell the shares subject to such lien. Moreover, the directors were empowered to refuse to register a transfer of any shares on which the company had a lien. The lien so conferred by the articles clearly extended to all Zuccani's unpaid shares, and did not cease on his death. It continued to be as available against his executors (although not themselves members) as it was against him in his lifetime. (See Article 45.) But, independently of any article, a lien on property does not cease on the death of the owner of the property. So far, therefore, as Zuccani's unpaid-up shares are concerned, the company was entitled to the lien and power of sale conferred by Articles 29 and 30. I do not understand that this was disputed. The directors, however, desired to extend the lien and power of sale and power to refuse to register transfers to Zuccani's fully paid-up shares, for he was the only person entitled to fully paid-up shares from whom any calls were due. Accordingly steps were taken to pass a special resolution to alter Article 29 by striking out the words "not being fully paid," and a resolution to that effect was passed on February 18, 1897, and was confirmed on March 8, 1897. Notice convening these meetings was sent addressed to Zuccani at his registered place of address; and the notice came to the knowledge of his executors. The directors knew that he was dead; but I cannot agree with the learned Judge that the resolution was invalid by reason of any defect in the notice. Notices of meetings have only to be given to members and the executors were not members. If no notice at all had been sent to the executors or to Zuccani's registered address the omission would not, in my opinion, have affected the propriety of holding the meetings or the validity of the resolutions passed at them. Article 45 expressly provided that notices of meetings need not be sent to executors who had not become members. To hold that meetings of companies could not be properly held unless the notices convening them were given to the unregistered legal personal representatives of all deceased members would be to paralyse the transaction of business, and would be contrary to the ordinary principles applicable to corporate bodies and, indeed, to other associations as well. The regularity of the proceedings to alter the articles by no means, however, disposes of the matters in controversy. The facts above stated raise the following very important questions, viz.:—(1) Whether a limited company, registered with articles conferring no lien on its fully paid-up shares, can by special resolution alter those articles by imposing a lien on those shares? (2) Whether, if it can, the lien so imposed can be made to apply to debts owing by fully paid-up shareholders to the company at the time of the alteration of the articles? (3) Whether, if it can, fully paid-up shares allotted to vendors of property to the company are in any different position from other fully paid-up shares issued by the company? (4) Whether, assuming the altered articles to be valid and to be binding on the general body of the holders of fully paid-up shares in the company, there are any special circumstances in this particular case to exclude the fully paid-up shares held by Zuccani from the operation of the altered articles? The articles of a company prescribe the regulations binding on its members (Companies Act, 1862, section 14). They have the effect of a contract (see section 16); but the exact nature of this contract is even now very difficult to define. Be its nature what it may, the company is empowered by the statute to alter the regulations contained in its articles from time to time by special resolutions (sections 50 and 51); and any regulation or article purporting to deprive the company of this power is invalid on the ground that it is contrary to the statute, "Walker v. London Tramways Company" (12 Ch.D., 705). The power thus conferred on companies to alter the regulations contained in their articles is limited only by the provisions contained in the statute and the conditions contained in the company's memorandum of association. Wide, however, as the language of section

50 is, the power conferred by it must, like all other powers, be exercised subject to those general principles of law and equity which are applicable to all powers conferred on majorities and enabling them to bind minorities. It must be exercised, not only in the manner required by law, but also bona fide for the benefit of the company as a whole, and it must not be exceeded. These conditions are always implied, and are seldom, if ever, expressed. But if they are complied with I can discover no ground for judicially putting any other restrictions on the power conferred by the section than those contained in it. How shares shall be transferred, and whether the company shall have any lien on them, are clearly matters of regulation properly prescribed by a company's articles of association. This is shown by table A in the schedule to the Companies Act, 1862 (clauses 8, 9, 10). Speaking, therefore, generally, and without reference to any particular case, the section clearly authorizes a limited company, formed with articles which confer no lien on fully paid-up shares and which allow them to be transferred without any fetter, to alter those articles by special resolution, and to impose a lien and restrictions on the registry of transfers of those shares by members indebted to the company. But then comes the question whether this can be done so as to impose a lien or restriction in respect of a debt contracted before and existing at the time when the articles are altered. Again, speaking generally, I am of opinion that the articles can be so altered, and that, if they are altered bona fide for the benefit of the company, they will be valid and binding as altered on the existing holders of paid-up shares, whether those holders are indebted or not indebted to the company when the alteration is made. But, as will be seen presently, it does not by any means follow that the altered article may not be inapplicable to some particular fully paid-up shareholder. He may have special rights against the company, which do not invalidate the resolution to alter the articles, but which may exempt him from the operation of the articles as altered. The conclusion thus arrived at is based on the language of section 50, which, as I have said already, the Court, in my opinion, is not at liberty to restrict. This conclusion, moreover, is in conformity with such authorities as there are on the subject. "Andrews v. the Gas Meter Company" ([1897] 1 Ch., 361) is an authority that, under section 50 of the Companies Act, 1862, a company's articles can be altered so as to authorize the issue of preference shares taking priority over existing shares, although no power to issue preference shares was conferred by the memorandum of association or by the original articles. The answer to the argument that the company could not alter existing rights is that, within the limits set by the statute and the memorandum of association, the rights of shareholders in limited companies, so far as they depend only on the regulations of the company, are subject to alteration by section 50 of the Act. The decision of the late Lord Justice Chitty in "Pepe v. the City and Suburban Building Society" ([1893] 2 Ch., 311) is in principle also clearly in point. A member of a building society, who had given notice of withdrawal, and who by the rules, as they then stood, became entitled to a certain sum of money, was held to be deprived of his right to that sum by an alteration made in the rules before he had ceased to be a member. This case went very far, but it has been treated as correct in "Botten v. the City, &c., Building Society" ([1895] 2 Ch., 441). It was urged that a company's articles could not be altered retrospectively, and reliance was placed on Lord Justice Rigby's observations in "James v. the Buena Ventura, &c., Syndicate" ([1896] 1 Ch., 466). The word "retrospective" is, however, somewhat ambiguous, and the concurrence of Lord Justice Rigby in "Andrews v. the Gas Meter Company" shows that his observations in "James v. the Buena Ventura, &c., Syndicate" are no authority for saying that existing rights, founded and dependent on alterable articles, cannot be affected by their alteration. Such rights are in truth limited as to their duration by the duration of the articles which confer them. But, although the regulations contained in a company's articles of association are revocable by special resolution, a special contract may be made with the company in the terms of or embodying one or more of the articles, and the question will then arise whether an alteration of the articles so embodied is consistent or inconsistent with the real bargain between the parties. A company cannot break its contracts by altering its articles, but, when dealing with contracts referring to revocable articles, and especially with contracts between a member of the company and the company respecting his shares, care must be taken not to assume that the contract involves as one of its terms an article which is not to be altered. It is easy to imagine cases in which even a member of a company may acquire by contract or otherwise special rights against the company which exclude him from the operation of a subsequently altered article. Such a case arose in "Swabey v. Port Darwin Gold Mines Company" (1 Megone, 385), where it was held that directors, who had earned fees payable under a company's articles, could not be deprived of them by a subsequent alteration of the articles which reduced the fees payable to directors. I take it to be clear that an application for an allotment of shares on the terms of the company's articles does not exclude the power to alter them, nor the application of them when altered to the shares so applied for and allotted. To exclude that power or the application of an altered article to particular shares, some clear and distinct agreement for that exclusion must be shown, or some circumstances must be proved conferring a legal or equitable right on the shareholder to be treated by the company differently from the other shareholders. This brings me to the last question which has to be considered—viz., whether there is in this case any contract or other circumstances which excludes the application of the altered article to Zuccani's fully paid-up vendors' shares. First, let us consider the shares. I am unable to discover any difference in principle between one fully paid-up share and another. Whether a share is paid for in cash or is given in payment for property acquired by the company appears to me quite immaterial for the present purpose. In either case the shareholder pays for his share, and in either case he takes it subject to the articles of association and power of altering them, unless this inference is excluded by special circumstances. Next let us consider whether a vendor who makes no special bargain except that he is to be paid in fully paid-up shares is in any different position from other allottees of fully paid-up shares. I fail to see that he is, unless he stipulates that his shares shall be specially favoured. Zuccani bargained for fully paid-up shares and he got them. The imposition of a lien on them did not render them less fully paid-up than they were before. They remained what they were. Zuccani did not bargain that the regulations relating to paid-up shares should never be altered, or that if altered his shares should be treated differently from other fully paid-up shares. I cannot see that the company broke its bargain with him in any way by altering its regulations or by enforcing the altered regulations as it did. I have already drawn attention to clause 5 of the memorandum of association. Having regard to its plain language no allottee of shares, whether a vendor or an ordinary applicant, can justly complain of injustice or even hardship if his rights under the original articles are modified to his disadvantage. Every allottee was told by the memorandum that his rights as a shareholder were subject to alteration, and no allottee acquired any rights except on these terms unless, of course, some special bargain was made with him. If Zuccani had not been indebted to the company, could he have successfully maintained that the company had no power to alter the articles and so make his shares liable to a lien and consequently less marketable than before? I take it that it is clear that he could not. But I arrive at this conclusion only because the bargain with him has not been broken. Zuccani's indebtedness to the company confers on him, or his executors, no rights against it. But it is his indebtedness which creates the embarrassment from which they seek to escape. The fact that Zuccani's executors were the only persons practically affected at the time by the alterations made in the articles excites suspicion as to the bona fides of the company. But, although the executors were the only persons who were actually affected at the time, that was because Zuccani was the only holder of paid-up shares who at the time was in arrear of calls. The altered articles applied to all holders of fully-paid shares, and made no distinction between them. The directors cannot be charged with bad faith. After carefully considering the whole case, and endeavouring in vain to discover grounds for holding that there was some special bargain differentiating Zuccani's shares from others, I have come to the conclusion that the appeal from the decision of the learned Judge, so far as it relates to the lien created by the articles, must be allowed. His decision as to the forfeiture having, however, been affirmed, each party should be left to pay his own costs.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS differed. In the course of his judgment, he said,—In the present case the company by the articles then in force reserved to themselves a lien upon all shares not being fully paid, and then purchased a property by the issue of fully-paid shares; and the question is whether they could, on the very day after the contract, it might be, materially affect the consideration given by passing a resolution that the fully-paid shares thus given as a price should be subject to a lien for all debts, obligations, and liabilities of the vendor to the company, whether such debts, obligations, and liabilities should have actually arrived or not, and thus render the shares unmarketable. I think not. I think that, notwithstanding the statutory powers of alteration, the basis of the contract of purchase was that the property should be paid for in marketable shares. I think that the very object of the exception in Article 29 of fully-paid shares from lien was to render those shares marketable, and, as they chose to pay for the property in shares thus made marketable, I think that to allow the company to subject the vendors' shares to a lien would be to make the alteration of the articles retrospectively affect existing rights. I think, moreover, that the resolution was not passed in good faith, being really passed merely to defeat the existing rights of an individual shareholder. My observations have no bearing on shares fully paid up in pursuance of calls in the ordinary way, but it is worthy of observation that Zuccani did, in respect of shares other than vendors' shares, prepay such shares with the assent of the company for the purpose of freeing those shares from lien. I doubt if the company could have subjected these shares to lien after receiving prepayment.

LORD JUSTICE ROMER agreed with the Master of the Rolls. He said,—A company such as this may undoubtedly by its articles of association provide for a lien on the shares of its shareholders in respect of any debts for the time being due from them to the company, and, if the original articles do not provide for the lien, the company may subsequently, by duly altering its articles, give itself such a lien; and the fact that the original articles did not provide for a lien would be in itself no ground for justifying a shareholder who was indebted when the articles were altered in saying that he contracted the debt or that he took his shares in reliance on there being no lien, and that the new articles must not operate so as to make the lien thereby given extend to his existing debt. A shareholder must be taken to have known that the articles might be so altered as to give the lien. And certainly a shareholder could not say as against the company that he was entitled to any special rights because he did not pay his debts. And the same considerations apply to the case where the original articles give only a limited lien, as, for example, a lien limited to debts due for unpaid calls. The company might by subsequent articles extend the lien, and a shareholder would have no right to object to the extended lien because he happened to be indebted to the company. Of course, by the above observations I have not been dealing with exceptional cases. I can imagine a case, for example, where by the memorandum of association certain provisions as to lien are made part of the constitution of the company which could not be affected by any alteration of the articles. And special contracts might be made with particular classes of shareholders or individuals, or special obligations to them might be incurred by the company, and that even by virtue of the original articles alone, which would prevent the articles being altered as against them. But, putting aside such exceptional cases, the observations I have made as to the general law are in my opinion sound. His Lordship then dealt with the facts of the case, and came to the conclusion that there was no sufficient ground for holding that the lien given by the amended article was not good against Zuccani's executors.

HOWCROFT AND WATKINS V. PERKINS.*

Sale of Goods—Goods not according to contract—Conditions of sale—Non-warranty clause in invoice—Reasonableness.

This was an action, tried before Mr. Justice Channell on January 13, upon a cheque for £25, drawn by the defendant Perkins, and payable to the plaintiffs' order. The defendant did not dispute his liability upon the cheque, but set up a counter-claim under the following circumstances:—The plaintiffs, Messrs. Howcroft and Watkins, are wholesale seedsmen, and the defendant is a nurseryman. The case for the defendant was that, in or about October, 1898, he purchased of the plaintiffs a quantity of celery seed known as "Clayworth Prize," and which they warranted to be Clayworth Prize. This they delivered in or about January, 1899. Most of the seed he sowed, and in due course raised and set out 14,000 plants, but when they were matured he found they were not Clayworth Prize but a very inferior common root known as turnip-rooted. He said that if they had been Clayworth Prize he could have sold them for 1s. 6d. per dozen, but they would only realize about 6d. a dozen. When it was in seed Clayworth Prize could not be distinguished from common seed, and he therefore had to rely entirely upon the plaintiffs' warranty. Upon behalf of the plaintiffs, it was disputed that they in fact supplied anything but Clayworth Prize seed, but it was further contended that even if the seed were turnip-rooted it was sold to the defendant subject to the following terms of sale which were endorsed upon the invoice for the seed sent by them to the defendant, and that such terms expressly excluded any warranty. The terms were as follows:—"Howcroft and Watkins give no warranty, express or implied, as to description, quality, productiveness, or any other matter of any goods they send out, and will not be in any way responsible for the crop. If the purchaser does not accept the goods on these terms they are at once to be returned."

Mr. J. C. Earle appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. P. T. Blackwell for the defendant.

["Howcroft v. Laycock," 14 The Times L.R., 460, and "Reynolds v. Wrench," 23 L.J., N.C., 27, were referred to.]

MR. JUSTICE CHANNELL held that there must be judgment for the plaintiffs. The defendant knew, in fact, that it was common for wholesale seedsmen to have terms of sale of this kind, and as he had had a similar invoice in a previous transaction he must be taken to have known that the usual terms of the plaintiffs were put upon their invoice. One of the terms of the contract expressly said that if the purchaser did not accept the goods on these terms they were to be at once returned. Under those circumstances "Watkins v. Rymill" (10 Q.B.D., 178), showed that the terms of the contract upon the invoice were binding upon him. A condition of this sort with reference to seeds was reasonable, because it was impossible to distinguish between seeds by looking at them. If, instead of celery coming up, something absolutely different, as an oak tree, had grown up, the contract would not have been performed at all. But in the present case the seed was celery seed, although for the purpose of dealing with the present point, viz., the question of warranty, he would assume it was turnip-rooted celery, which would be really of a different description. The words "Clayworth Prize seed" he considered a matter of description within the meaning of the note in the warranty clause, and he must take the thing sold to be celery seed. There must be judgment for the plaintiffs on the claim and counter-claim.

BRUNNER V. WEBSTER AND BARRACLOUGH.*

Ship—Bill of lading—Exceptions from liability—
"Restraint of princes, rulers, and people"— Restraint, what amounts to—Prohibition as to imports.

In this case the plaintiffs claimed damages for the non-delivery of a cargo of rice at Galatz in accordance with the bills of lading. The facts were as follows:—The rice was shipped at Rangoon on board the defendants' ship Maling under bills of lading for Galatz. By the bills of lading "arrest and restraint of princes, rulers, and people" were excepted. The vessel sailed from Rangoon and proceeded to Alexandria where she discharged a portion of her cargo, which did not belong to the plaintiffs. The vessel's next port was Jaffa, but Alexandria being a plague-infected port, the vessel was ordered by the Turkish authorities to go to Beirut for quarantine. At Beirut, by order, she discharged all her cargo intended for Turkish ports. On June 18, the discharge at Beirut having been completed, she was in a position to proceed to Galatz with the plaintiffs' cargo, but, acting on the instructions of the defendants, who alleged that the importation of rice into Rumania was at that time prohibited by the sanitary authority of that country, the master proceeded to London, stopping en route at Malta to coal. On arrival at London the defendants refused to deliver the cargo to the plaintiffs except on being paid freight from Rangoon to Galatz and from Beirut to London. This was paid by the plaintiffs into Court, this action, in which the plaintiffs originally claimed an injunction to restrain discharge at London, having at that time been commenced; and the plaintiffs took delivery of the cargo, without prejudice to their claim for damages. The damages claimed were the difference between the value of the cargo in London and at Galatz. The defendants counter-claimed for the bill of lading freight and also for freight from Beirut to London, but in the course of the trial they abandoned the former claim. The facts as to the alleged prohibition in Rumania, as found by his Lordship, are stated in the judgment.

Mr. CARVER, Q.C. (with him Mr. F. W. Hollams), for the plaintiffs, said that there were four points involved:—(1) Was there a prohibition by the Rumanian Government of the importation of rice? (2) If so, had the defendants taken the proper steps to enable them, if possible, to fulfil the contract? (3) What damages had the plaintiffs sustained? (4) Were the defendants, on their counter-claim, entitled to any freight. The first question was one of fact, and turned on the meaning and effect of orders made by the Council of Ministers of Rumania and the administration of these orders by a Dr. Obregia, the Director-General of the Rumanian Board of Health, and it was submitted that, in fact, the importation of rice was not prohibited. Even if there was a prohibition, that did not justify the ordering of the cargo to London at the time they did. The question was whether the restraint existed so long as to defeat the commercial object of the voyage. In "Hadley v. Clarke" (8 T.R., 359) the delay, under an embargo, was for two years. In "Jackson v. the Union Marine Insurance Company" (L.R. 10, C.P., 125) and in "Esposito v. Bowden" (7 E. and B., 763) the contracts were still executory; and the latter was a case where illegality affected the performance of the contract. The principle applicable was laid down by Lord Justice Brett in "Nelson v. Dahl" (12 Ch. D., at p. 593). [MR. JUSTICE KENNEDY referred to Pollock on Contracts, p. 279.] In "Geipel v. Smith" (L.R., 7 Q.B., 404) the contract was executory; this appeared in the judgment of Mr. Justice Blackburn, at p. 414. In "The Teutonia" (L.R. 4, P.C., 171) the contract was partly executed. In the present case the defendants, having taken the cargo on board, were bound to fulfil their contract, if it could be done within a reasonable time. Mere apprehension of a prohibition was insufficient; and in any event the ship did not wait a reasonable time, as she sailed from Beirut on June 24 under orders from London of the 21st, and the prohibition, if any, had been withdrawn by the 27th, by which time she could not have reached the Danube had she left Beirut on the 21st. If apprehension of restraint was sufficient, it must be after full inquiry, which had not been made here. On the fourth point the law was clearly laid down in "Hunter v. Prinsep" (10 East, 378) by Lord Ellenborough.

Mr. JOSEPH WALTON, Q.C., and Mr. J. A. HAMILTON, for the defendants, contended that the importation of the rice into Rumania was prohibited, and that the ship had acted reasonably. The first question was whether, under the circumstances, the owners were justified in abandoning the voyage. In "Jackson v. the Union Marine Insurance Company" the contract was not wholly executory. With a cargo on board the shipowner still had duties where his obligation to deliver at the destined port was at an end. "Bensaude v. Thames and Mersey Marine Insurance Company" (1 Com. Cas., 395). In this case the prohibition was a restraint. It could not be the duty of the ship to wait for a change in the law; and on June 24 the law was a permanent obstacle. As to freight, the shipowner would have been entitled to discharge the cargo at Beirut if it was a proper port; but it was not, and at all events he was entitled to a reasonable payment for bringing it to a reasonable destination—i.e., to London.

MR. JUSTICE KENNEDY, in giving judgment, said that the action was brought to recover damages from the owners of the steamship Maling for breach of the contract contained in the bill of lading under which the plaintiffs' goods were shipped. There was a counter-claim for various heads of expenditure, but substantially for freight, and the counter-claim was now confined to freight from Beirut to London. The plaintiffs' goods, consisting of rice, were shipped under bills of lading to be discharged at Galatz, subject to certain exceptions, of which one was, "arrest or restraint of princes, rulers, and people." On June 18, the ship being then at Beirut, a question arose as to whether the discharge of the plaintiffs' cargo at Galatz would be prevented by an ordinance of the Rumanian Government. Messrs. Ewell, who were Lloyd's agents and also the defendants' agents at Galatz, represented to the defendants that the importation of rice from Rangoon was prohibited at Galatz, and that the landing of the cargo at Galatz would not be permitted. On the other hand, the plaintiffs protested that this was incorrect, and they required the defendants to fulfil their contract by proceeding to Galatz. The fact was that there was in force in Rumania at this time a certain official document, which had been referred to as the circular, which was an order emanating from the Council of Ministers intended to protect the country from the danger of the importations of disease. Paragraph 3 of the order was as follows:—"The introduction into the country of the following goods arriving from any part of Egypt or any other suspected stations to be prohibited:—Fruit, vegetables, cheese," and certain other articles. Messrs. Ewell made inquiries of a Dr. Obregia, who was director-general under the Minister of the Interior and who was in charge of the Sanitary Department. Dr. Obregia's view, which he expressed to Messrs. Ewell and also to the English Consul, was that the importation of rice was prohibited, and he stated that he should prevent the cargo from being landed. Dr. Obregia, it was clear, was acting under a misapprehension as to the effect of the order, which did not refer to rice. The question was whether the defendants were justified in treating this intimation as such a restraint, within the meaning of the bill of lading, as excused them from carrying out their contract. His Lordship was of opinion that on the receipt of the opinion of Dr. Obregia the defendants would not have been responsible for a reasonable delay incurred in ascertaining whether the vessel would really be refused admission to the port of Galatz. But the defendants contended that they were at that time entitled to treat the contract as being impossible of performance. His Lordship was satisfied that the interpretation of the law expressed by Dr. Obregia was untenable and would not have prevailed if the vessel had gone to Galatz. The defendants, in taking the course they did, without further delay for inquiry, took the risk of their apprehensions being unfounded. No doubt there might be a state of things, as in "Nobel's Explosive Company v. Jenkins" (12 The Times L.R., 522, and 1 Com. Cas., 436), in which the restraint was one, in a sense, consisting of fear. In that case, war having been declared between Japan and China, the master feared that if he proceeded the vessel would be seized by a Chinese man-of-war ; and it was held that in the circumstances he was justified in not proceeding. But, generally speaking, the shipowner must prove more than a reasonable apprehension ; he must prove such a state of facts as justified him in saying that a restraint actually existed. The defendants, without waiting a reasonable time, had sent the ship to London, and there was nothing in the clause in the bill of lading to justify or excuse them in so doing. His Lordship was far from saying that a de facto restraint might not be a sufficient justification for the shipowner, if it lasted long enough, but here there had been no delay at all. Even if he were wrong on this point, his Lordship was of opinion that the defendants must fail on the counter-claim, because there was no principle of law under which the defendants could claim to be paid the cost of carrying the cargo to London against the express wish of the plaintiffs. There would, therefore, be judgment for the plaintiffs on the claim and counter-claim with costs.

FIELDEN V. MAYOR, &C., OF MORLEY.*

Practice—Costs—Solicitor and client costs—Public Authority.

Sec. 1 of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, applies to all actions, including those in the Chancery Division, but not to appeals.

This was an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (the Master of the Rolls and Lords Justices Chitty and Collins) dated August 8, 1898, affirming a judgment of Mr. Justice Byrne dated April 28, 1898. The case is reported below in 14 The Times L.R., 566 ; and on the question of costs in 14 The Times L.R., 576 ; L.R. [1899] 1 Ch., 1 ; 67 L.J., Ch., 611. The object of the action was to restrain the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the borough of Morley from causing or permitting water to overflow on the appellant's land from a certain catchwater constructed by the corporation under the Morley Corporation Act, 1890, and for damages. The statement of claim in the action raised a further claim in respect of trespass by the corporation to lands of the appellant, but the substantial question in the action was whether the corporation had, in constructing the said catchwater and certain works connected therewith, exceeded their statutory powers under the Morley Corporation Act, 1890. The Morley Corporation Act, 1890, recites that the corporation had, in accordance with the provisions of the Public Health Act, 1875, established waterworks and were supplying their borough with water, but such supply was inadequate to meet the existing and growing demands of the inhabitants of the borough, and it was expedient that the corporation be empowered to construct the additional works and to acquire the water supply by the Act authorized. By the 6th section of the Act it is enacted that subject to the provisions of the Act the corporation may make and maintain in the manner described the waterworks and other works therein mentioned, including a reservoir situate in the townships of Erringden and Sowerby, in the county of York, to be formed by an embankment placed across the Withens Clough, and an aqueduct or conduit commencing at a watercourse at the edge of Turley Hole and High House Moor, and terminating at the southern end of the said reservoir embankment, "together with all necessary and proper embankments, culverts, channels, outfalls, weirs, gauges, pipes, roads, approaches, and conveniences connected with the said works, or any of them, or necessary or proper for inspecting, maintaining, repairing, cleansing, or managing the same. Provided that the authority in this Act contained to construct the said reservoir shall not relieve the corporation from any right of action to which, except for such authority, they would be liable in the event of the bursting or failure of the said reservoir." It is provided by the 18th section of the Act, which is a section for the protection of John Fielden and the present appellant, that all lands, rights, easements, interests, and privileges required by the corporation from the owner or owners for the time being of the estates in the townships of Sowerby and Erringden, in the county of York, belonging to John Fielden and the present appellant, or both or either of them, for the purposes of the Act should be acquired and held subject to the provisions therein set forth, including inter alia the provision following :—“(b) The corporation shall construct, maintain, and keep the catchwaters, conduits, and lines of pipes for conveying the water through the said estate watertight, and the corporation shall from time to time make good any damage done or which may occur to the said estate, or the owner, or his tenants, during the construction or maintenance of the works by reason or in consequence of the leaking, overflow, or any failure of any of the above-mentioned works in the said estate authorized by this Act.” The other provisions of the 18th section are immaterial for the purposes of this appeal, with the exception of provision (d), which imposes on the corporation the obligation to make passages or roadways over “any uncovered catchwater or conduit,” words which throw some light on the meaning of the word “watertight,” as used in provision (b). The 20th section of the Act is as follows :—“Subject to the provisions of this Act, the corporation may enter upon, take, and use such of the lands shown on the deposited plans and described in the deposited book of reference as they may require for the purposes of this Act, and may from time to time, for the purpose of their waterworks, collect, impound, take, use, get, and appropriate such of the waters of the Withens Clough, Fletcher Dike, Jack Clough, Rudstoops Clough, and their tributaries as can or may be intercepted, collected, or impounded by the Withens Clough reservoir and the aqueducts or conduits described as works No. 2 and No. 3 by this Act authorized, and all waters found in, on, or under any of the lands acquired by the corporation.” Mr. Justice Byrne dismissed the action, and under the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, gave the defendant corporation costs as between solicitor and client.

Mr. Fletcher Moulton, Q.C., Mr. Cripps, Q.C., and Mr. Leigh Clare were for the appellant ; Mr. Eve, Q.C., and Mr. R. J. Parker, for the respondents, were not heard.

The LORD CHANCELLOR in moving that the appeal be dismissed, said the point was a very short one. The whole question as argued was this. Section 6, taken by itself, gave the corporation limited powers to execute these works if they obtained the proper authority from the owners of the land from whom they purchased. But it did not give these powers, but provided that the land should be purchased and paid for. That was intelligible. But he declined to follow the argument that section 6 should be construed by itself. Whatever might be the case in other Acts in respect of which such a question might arise, he would not for this purpose go beyond this section of the statute. There might be a section which authorized the doing of certain things. There was no doubt that the corporation must purchase the land in respect of which they were going to erect these works. So far he was in agreement with the appellant. But then the question arose from the use and maintenance of the works. Was there no other provision which extended the liability for the user of the works? It must be assumed that the nature of the work and the situation of the property were present to the mind of the Legislature. Let it be supposed that the Legislature had expressed this knowledge, which it must be assumed to have possessed, by way of recital before the 18th section. Could any one doubt that when the Legislature was authorizing the making of this channel or cut across the plaintiff's land and when the plaintiff, having these facts put before the committee by way of recital, was complaining of the works so authorized and of the consequential injury to him caused by the maintenance of the work, could anybody suggest that this 18th section could have any other operation than to protect the gentlemen named therein from injury to their land by the escape of the water from the channel made by the respondents? In what other way could injury be done? The Legislature was, therefore, not dealing with the transfer of property, which was dealt with by the 20th section, but with the consequential injury from the maintenance and user of the works for which it expressly provided a form of remedy. In the event of overflow or leakage or other causes of such injury, what was to be done? In such an event the corporation were from time to time to pay damages, and to repair and make good any damage done by the injury so resulting. It seemed to him to be inconsistent with that theory, which was manifest in the 18th section, to say that the statute assumed they were to buy the land. If they were to buy the land there would be no necessity for the 18th section, because they would be dealing with their own land. But the section assumed that it was to remain the plaintiff's land; and if in the use and maintenance of that cut or channel injury was done, then by the 18th section compensation was to be paid to the plaintiff. He agreed with Mr. Justice Byrne and the Court of Appeal, and felt obliged to say that he never knew of a more trumpety and frivolous action. The appeal must be dismissed.

The other noble and learned Lords concurred.

A conversation ensued on the effect of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, by which, wherever persons acting in the execution of statutory and other public duties obtain judgment against a person suing them, the costs are to be taxed as between solicitor and client and paid by the unsuccessful plaintiff. Their Lordships agreed with the Court of Appeal that the statute applied to all actions, including what used to be called suits in Chancery, but that the solicitor and client costs were not recoverable in appeals.

Divorce—Nullity—Variation of Settlements—
Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859 and 1878.

The Court has jurisdiction to vary settlements in the case of a decree of nullity of marriage on the ground of impotence, but held in this case that there was by the terms of the settlement no property which the Court could deal with for the benefit of the petitioner.

This was a divorce motion which has occupied the attention of the Court on several occasions. The facts sufficiently appear from his Lordship's judgment, which was delivered yesterday.

Mr. Bargrave Deane, Q.C., and Mr. Danekwerts, Q.C., appeared for the petitioner; Mr. Jelf, Q.C., Mr. R. J. Parker, and Mr. Priestley for the respondent.

MR. JUSTICE GORELL BARNES said as follows:—Two questions are raised in this case, one of general importance—viz., as to the construction of two sections of the Matrimonial Causes Acts of 1859 and 1878—and the other depending upon the terms of an ante-nuptial settlement made on the marriage of the petitioner and respondent and dated May 27, 1885. The parties were married on May 28, 1885, the petitioner being then under age, and afterwards they resided together; but on October 22, 1895, the petitioner commenced a suit in this Court against the respondent, claiming a declaration that her marriage with him was null and void, on the ground of the impotence of the respondent. This suit was heard before the President, and a decree nisi was pronounced by him on December 21, 1896, and this decree was made absolute on June 28, 1897. The petitioner on June 12, 1899, by leave of the Court, presented a petition to the Court under the said Acts to allow a variation of the said settlement for her benefit. The petition having been referred to Mr. Registrar Pritchard, he reported that the respondent raised, amongst other points, the question of the jurisdiction of the Court to vary settlements in the case of a marriage declared void by reason of impotence, and, therefore, the matter was brought before the Court, and the questions which I now have to decide were by arrangement argued before me. The first point taken by the respondent was that the powers of the Court conferred by the said sections could not be exercised in the case of a decree of nullity of marriage on the ground of impotence, and that the sections only applied to cases where there were or might have been children. The said fifth section is as follows:—"The Court, after a final decree of nullity of marriage or dissolution of marriage, may inquire into the existence of ante-nuptial or post-nuptial settlements made on the parties whose marriage is the subject of the decree, and may make such orders with reference to the application of the whole or a portion of the property settled either for the benefit of the children of the marriage or of their respective parents as to the Court shall seem fit." It was decided in the case of "Thomas v. Thomas" (2 Sw. and Tr., 89) that this clause gave no power to the Court to deal with settlements in cases where no child of the marriage had been born, and in the cases of "Bird v. Bird" (L.R., 1 P. and D., 231) and "Corrance v. Corrance" (ib. 495) that the Court had no power to do so unless there was issue of the marriage living at the time of the application. These decisions turned on the use of the word "parents" in the latter part of the section, and the criticisms in the judgments in those cases apparently led to the passing of the third section of the Act of 1878, which is in the following terms:—"The Court may exercise the powers vested in it by the provisions of section 5 of the Act of the 22nd and 23rd years of Victoria, chapter 61, notwithstanding that there are no children of the marriage." The argument for the respondent was that, as under the said fifth section the powers of the Court could only be exercised where there was issue of the marriage living at the time of the application, the marriages referred to in the words in the first part of the section—"final decree of nullity of marriage or dissolution of marriage"—must be marriages capable of being productive of children and that the third section of the Act of 1878, in extending the powers of the Court to cases where there are no children of the marriage, only did so with reference to the class of marriages contemplated by the said fifth section. This argument is ingenious, but in my opinion endeavours to place a restricted meaning on the first words of the said fifth section which they never were intended to bear. In my opinion the words "final decree of nullity of marriage or dissolution of marriage" are used in their ordinary meaning, just as they are in other sections of the Matrimonial Causes Acts, and apply to any marriages declared null or dissolved. The section then meant that the Court, after any decree of nullity of marriage or dissolution of marriage, might inquire as to the existence of settlements, and then, if there was issue living, might make orders as contemplated by the latter part of the section; and now under the said third section of the Act of 1878 these orders may be made although there is no issue of the marriage. I am of opinion that under the two sections combined the Court has jurisdiction in this case to deal with the settlement in question. The point raised by the respondent upon the terms of the settlement was that, having regard to the terms of the settlement, there is no property settled which in the events which have happened the Court can, or ought, in the circumstances to order to be applied for the benefit of the petitioner. Under an indenture of settlement dated December 8, 1874, made between the respondent's father (who died before the date of the marriage settlement) and the respondent and certain trustees the lands and hereditaments comprised in the schedules to the marriage settlement of May 27, 1883, together with other hereditaments, were limited (subject as to part to a jointure rent-charge of £1,200 payable thereout to the respondent's mother during her life and to a term of 500 years for securing the same) to such uses, upon such trusts, and with and under such powers, agreements, and declarations as the respondent should, by any deed or deeds, with or without power of revocation and new appointment to be executed by him after his father's death, or by his will, or any codicil or codicils thereto, from time to time appoint, but subject and without prejudice to any lease and every contract for a lease or leases subsisting at the date of the said indenture of settlement, and subject thereto, to the use of the respondent and his assigns for his life without impeachment of waste, with divers remainders over. And in the same indenture was contained a power for the respondent after his father's decease by deed or will to charge the settled premises with the payment to himself or any other person of any money not exceeding £8,000 and interest as therein mentioned, and to appoint all or any part of the same premises for any term or terms of years for securing the same, but which power had not at the time of the marriage settlement been exercised. And in the same indenture was also contained a power for the respondent either before or after his marriage with any woman by deed with or without power of revocation and new appointment, or by will or codicil, to appoint to any woman whom he might marry for life or for any less period as from the day of his death if she should survive him, any yearly rent-charge or rent-charges of any amount whatsoever payable after his father's death, whether the respondent should survive him or not, such rent-charge or rent-charges to be in bar or not to be in bar of dower and free bench as to the respondent should seem fit, and to be charged upon and payable out of all or any of the premises by the said indenture of settlement assured without any deduction and to be paid at such times and in such manner as to the respondent should seem meet, and to appoint to such woman usual powers and remedies for recovering and enforcing the same. And to appoint the premises so charged to any person or persons for any term or terms of years with or without impeachment of waste upon trusts for better securing payment of the rent-charge or rent-charges by mortgage (with a power of sale if thought fit), or otherwise as to the respondent should seem meet. By the marriage settlement made between the respondent, the petitioner, her father, and certain trustees the respondent in consideration of the intended marriage covenanted with the trustees that if the said intended marriage should take place the respondent would, during the joint lives of himself and the petitioner, pay to the trustees a yearly sum of £200 to accrue from day to day, but to be payable by equal quarterly payments, the first of such payments to be made on such of the quarterly days as should happen next after the solemnization of the said intended marriage, and the trustees were to pay the said annual sum of £200 as the same should become due so long as the same should continue payable to the petitioner, but so that she should not have any power of anticipation. And in consideration of the said intended marriage and in exercise of the special power vested in him by the said indenture of settlement, the respondent limited and appointed to the use of the petitioner and her assigns during her life in case the said intended marriage should take effect and she should survive him the rent-charges following—that is to say, if and so long as his mother should be living, the yearly rent-charge of £1,300, and from and after her death the yearly rent-charge of £1,600, the said rent-charges or such of them as should take effect to be in full for her jointure and in bar of all dower and free bench whatsoever, and to be charged upon and issuing out of all the hereditaments and premises comprised in the first schedule thereto (subject as to part of the said hereditaments to the said yearly rent-charge of £1,200 and the said term of 500 years, and subject as to all the said hereditaments to the powers of leasing, and sale, and exchange, and management contained in the said indenture of settlement), such rent-charges to be considered as accruing from day to day, but to be payable quarterly without any deduction except succession duty, if any, the first of such payments as to the said rent-charge of £1,300 to be paid at the end of three calendar months after the death of the respondent if the petitioner and the respondent's mother should then both be living, and as to the said rent-charge of £1,600 to be made at the end of three calendar months after the death of the survivor of the respondent and his mother if the petitioner should then be living. And in consideration of the said intended marriage, and in exercise of the special power vested in him for that purpose by the said indenture of settlement, the respondent as beneficial owner appointed the hereditaments and premises thereinbefore charged with the said jointure rent-charges (subject, nevertheless, as last aforesaid) unto and to the use of the trustees for the term of 1,000 years to commence from the death of the respondent to secure the payment of the said rent-charges. And in consideration of the said intended marriage, and in exercise of the general power of appointment vested in him by the said indenture of settlement and of all or any other power in that behalf him enabling, the respondent as beneficial owner appointed the hereditaments and premises comprised in the second schedule to the marriage settlement to the use of the trustees for the term of 1,200 years, to commence from the solemnization of the said intended marriage, without impeachment of waste (but subject as therein mentioned), upon trust to raise the sum of £20,000 with interest for the same at 4 per cent. per annum, computed from the solemnization of the said intended marriage and to stand possessed thereof upon trust for investment, and to pay the interest and annual produce to the respondent and his assigns during his life, and] after his decease as to the corpus of the fund and the annual produce thereof in trust for the issue of the marriage as the respondent should appoint and in default as the petitioner should after the respondent's death appoint, and in default for the children equally except as in the deed provided, and in default of issue attaining a vested interest in trust for the respondent. And the deed contained a proviso that no part of the £20,000 or of the interest thereof should be raised during the lifetime of the respondent except with his consent in writing. The respondent's mother is now dead. The petitioner's application is that by some form of order the marriage settlement should be varied so that the petitioner should receive at once a considerable allowance. The principal argument in favour of the petitioner to meet the point raised by the respondent was that the whole of the hereditaments and premises comprised in the schedules to the marriage settlement were property settled by that settlement, and that the Court could, therefore, under the terms of the said fifth section, which gives the Court power to make orders with reference to the application of the whole or a portion of the "property settled" for the benefit (by the effect of the said fifth section and the third section of the Act of 1878) of children or parties, order that the whole or a portion of the said hereditaments and premises be applied for the benefit of the petitioner. The petitioner's counsel, while maintaining that the whole of the hereditaments and premises could be applied by the Court for her benefit, did not contend that the Court in its discretion would apply the whole of this property for her benefit. The respondent, no doubt, had practically a complete power of disposition over the estates in this case when he entered into the marriage settlement subject to the mother's interest, but by that settlement he only affected the estates by creating two charges, one on one part of them and the other on the other part. And it seems an extraordinary proposition that because a charge, it may be a very small one, is created on a large real estate by a marriage settlement the whole estate can be dealt with by the Court under the powers conferred by the sections aforesaid. In my opinion the words "property settled" have not the meaning contended for, but refer to the property the benefit of which is by the marriage settlement conferred on the parties or their children in the ordinary way. Several cases were cited in argument on this point, but they do not appear to me to be of much assistance, except, perhaps, the case of "Micklethwait v. Micklethwait" (4 C.B., N.S., 790), the judgments in which are in favour of the respondent (see especially p. 858). It is therefore necessary to refer to the terms of the settlement, the substance of which I have set out above, to see what was really dealt with by the settlement. Now, first there is the covenant to pay £200 a year to trustees for the benefit of the petitioner. The point made by the respondent with regard to this was that the covenant was either still in force or was at an end; and that if it were in force there was no necessity for this application, while if it were not in force, either because the marriage had been declared void, and therefore had not taken place within the meaning of the covenant, and because there was thus no consideration for the covenant, or because the covenant had come to an end and ought to be read as applicable only to the petitioner if she were the respondent's wife, in consequence of the clause as to anticipation, then there was now no property so far as this covenant is concerned upon which the Court could make an order. The only answer made by the petitioner's counsel was that the covenant was in force and that the Court ought to enforce it. Well, if so, it must be enforced by the trustees in the ordinary way, and there is no necessity for this application, and, if it is not in force there is nothing existing as to the application of which the Court can make an order. The case of "Worsley v. Worsley" (L.R., 1 P. and D., 648) was cited for the petitioner, but it does not bear on the present case. In that case there was a separation deed between the husband and the wife, and the husband afterwards obtained a decree of divorce, and then the husband applied to the Court to reduce the amount of his covenant in the deed, and the Court did so, holding the deed to be a post-nuptial settlement. There appears to have been no clause in the deed providing for the event which happened—viz., the unfaithfulness of the wife—and the provisions of the deed could be enforced to the full extent unless the Court reduced the payment. The next subject-matter which can be considered as property settled by the marriage settlement is the jointure rent-charge limited and appointed to the petitioner and the term of 1,000 years to secure it. The point made by the respondent was that no order could be made as to the application of this, because in the circumstances it was not property which could be dealt with. The reasons suggested for this were, first, that the jointure rent-charge and term could only come into force if the marriage should take effect, and that, as the marriage has been declared void, it did not take effect, and the jointure rent-charge and term cannot come into force, and the settlement was without consideration. The cases of "Chapman v. Bradley" (4 D.J. and S., 71) and "Pawson v. Brown" (13 Ch.D., 202) appear to me to support these reasons. The answer made by the petitioner's counsel was mainly the principal point above mentioned, that the property settled included all the estates mentioned in the schedules to the marriage settlement. I have already dealt with this point. But it was further urged that the marriage was not void, but voidable, and had taken effect. The petitioner had the right to elect whether to treat the marriage as void or not, and at her instigation it has been declared void, and in my opinion has not taken effect within the meaning of the deed. The second reason in support of the respondent's point was that the jointure and term could not commence till after the death of the respondent, and this seems clear upon the terms of the deed. It was, however, strenuously urged by Mr. Deane for the petitioner that it was common practice for the Court to order a settlement to be read as if a party to it were already dead, and that it could do so in this case. This argument was, in my judgment, based on a misconception. It is true that in certain cases—for instance, where property is settled in trust for a respondent for life and after his or her death for a petitioner for life, with remainder to children, and in default of children in trust for the settlor, and in other similar cases—it is found convenient, instead of an order in terms directing the trustees to pay the income at once to the petitioner, to effect the same object by ordering the life interest of the respondent to be extinguished, as if he or she were already dead. But the important question in the present case is whether there is any property settled, and, if property is only to come into settlement upon the death of a person, no order of the Court can bring it into settlement before that time. There is no power to bring into settlement a fund or estate, which is not to come into settlement until a certain event happens, before it happens, in fact. Therefore, no order as to the application of this jointure could have any effect before the death of the respondent. Moreover, before the trustees could act upon an order as to the application of the jointure they would have to recover the money, and in the circumstances which have happened—viz., the marriage not having taken effect, the respondent being alive and the purposes for which the jointure was created, that is to say, to provide for a widow, being impossible of performance—I am unable to see how the trustees could enforce the security. With regard to the power to raise the £20,000, though the wording as to the commencement of the term of 1,200 years is not quite the same as in the case of the jointure rent-charge, the consideration is the marriage, and the term is to commence from the solemnization thereof, and as the marriage has been declared void for similar reasons to those given with regard to the jointure rent-charge, the fund has not, and will not, become property which the Court can deal with. Moreover, this fund cannot be raised during the lifetime of the respondent except with his consent in writing, which has not been given, and therefore the fund has not yet come into existence, and after his death I do not see how the trustees could be compelled to raise the fund except for the benefit of children, if there had been any. The broad position in the case appears to be this—that no property was transferred to and vested in trustees at the time of the marriage in the way in which this is commonly done under a marriage settlement, and that unless the estates themselves can be treated as having been “property settled” within the meaning of the section there is no property as to the application of which the Court can or ought to make an order. As I have already said, the estates cannot, in my opinion, be so treated. They were not property settled by the marriage settlement, which only purported to carve out of them (so to speak) certain interests which, in the events that have happened, have not come into existence. I suggested in the course of the case that a settlement between the parties was desirable, as the petitioner is without means and the respondent is wealthy, and the case stood over more than once with the view to an arrangement, but the respondent finally expressed himself as unwilling to make any proposal while legal proceedings are taken against him, and therefore the matter was fully argued, and I have now to deal with the case according to the legal principles applicable to it. For the reasons which I have given, the petition for variation of the settlement must be dismissed.

Privy Council Appeals—Canada—Temperance Act, 1864—Construction—Penalties for offences.

This was an appeal by special leave from a judgment of the Superior Court for Lower Canada of May 5, 1899.

The Hon. Edward Blake, Q.C., and Mr. R. C. Smith, Q.C. (both of the Canadian Bar), appeared for the appellant; Mr. L. E. Panneton, Q.C. (of the Canadian Bar), and Mr. Mayne for the respondent.

SIR RICHARD COUCH, in delivering their Lordships' judgment, said,—The question in this appeal arose upon an Act of the Legislature of Canada (27 and 28 Vict., c. 18), commonly called the Temperance Act of 1864. Section 12 of this Act prohibits the sale of any spirituous or other intoxicating liquor, unless it be for exclusively medicinal or sacramental purposes, or bona fide use in some art, trade, or manufacture. Section 13 is as follows:—“Whoever, by himself, his clerk, servant, or agent, exposes or keeps for sale, or directly or indirectly, or on any pretence or by any device, sells, or barter, or in consideration of the purchase of any other property gives to any other person any spirituous or other intoxicating liquor or any mixed liquor capable of being used as a beverage, and a part of which is spirituous or otherwise intoxicating, in violation of the 12th section of this Act, shall incur a penalty of not less than $20 nor more than $50 for each such offence, and whoever in the employment or on the premises of another so exposes or keeps for sale, or sells, or barter, or gives in violation of the said section shall be held equally guilty with the principal, and shall incur the same penalty.” Section 17 provides that two or more offences by the same party may be included in one complaint, provided the time and place of each offence is stated; but, whatever may be the number of the offences included in one complaint, the maximum of penalty imposable for them all shall in no case exceed $100. On June 9, 1898, the appellant made a complaint to the district magistrate for the district of St. Francis, in the Province of Quebec, that the respondent on or about April 23 then last past had sold and delivered intoxicating liquors, and received payment for the same, contrary to this Act, whereby he had become liable to pay $50, with costs. On June 30, 1898, the respondent was convicted by the district magistrate of having on April 23 then last sold and delivered to one George Mount intoxicating liquors contrary to the Act, and adjudged to forfeit and pay to the appellant $50, to be applied according to law, and also to pay $29 76 cents for costs. On July 13, 1898, the appellant made a similar complaint to the same magistrate of an offence committed by the respondent on April 19 then last past, and the respondent was on July 20, 1898, convicted of selling intoxicating liquors to one J. H. P. Armitage on April 19 contrary to the Act, and adjudged to forfeit and pay to the appellant $50, to be applied according to law, and 90 cents for costs. In addition to these convictions there were at different times between June 8 and July 21, 1898, 27 other convictions of the respondent on the complaints of the appellant by the same magistrate of similar offences committed on different days between March 26 and May 19, the penalty in each case being $50. On September 15, 1898, the Superior Court for Lower Canada, on the petition of the respondent, ordered a writ of certiorari to issue, and on April 5, 1897, the writ was issued in the case of the second of the convictions before mentioned—viz., for the sale on April 19 to Armitage, being No. 526 in the records of the magistrate's Court. A return having been made to the certiorari the Superior Court, on May 5, 1899, pronounced its judgment annulling the conviction, and on July 14, 1899, her Majesty, by an Order in Council, gave the appellant special leave to appeal against this judgment upon the appellant submitting to pay the costs of this appeal incurred by the parties on both sides in any event, if it should appear advisable to the Judicial Committee so to direct when the appeal came on for determination, and also to abide by any recommendation which their Lordships might see fit to make as to the enforcement of penalties by the appellant against the respondent. The judgment of the Superior Court, delivered by Mr. Justice Lemieux, appears to be founded on the opinion that, according to section 17, the Legislature thought that the penalty of $100 was sufficient punishment for all the breaches of the law up to the time of the prosecution and during the three months previous to it, that being the limitation of time from the committing the offence for the prosecution for it, and that the complaint of June 9 covered and included all offences previous to that date; that as one or more offences of the same nature against the Act could be included in the same prosecution a complaint made at a particular date for a single offence is presumed to be made and to comprehend all the offences against the Act up to the date of the complaint (Rec., pp. 39, 40). Their Lordships are quite unable to agree with the Superior Court in this opinion. It is an addition to section 17 for which there is no authority either in the words of it or by implication. The purpose of section 17 appears to be to prevent a prosecution under the Act where only one offence is charged failing by reason of the evidence not being sufficient to prove it or in consequence of a variance in the complaint from the evidence of the time when or the person to whom the intoxicating liquor was sold if more than one offence has been committed and the limit of the penalty to $100 indirectly restrains the use of that power. There is no reason for thinking that "may" is to be imperative and the same as "shall." There is nothing which shows it is intended to have other than its natural meaning. If, as the Superior Court was of opinion, the Legislature thought a penalty of $100 was sufficient punishment for all offences committed within three months previous to the complaint their Lordships do not doubt but that it would have said so and provided for it. The learned Judge supported his opinion by references to Russell on "Crimes" and the "American and English Encyclopedia of Laws," in which the principle is laid down that, "where the evidence necessary to support the second indictment would have been sufficient to procure a legal conviction upon the first, the plea of autrefois acquit is generally good." The meaning of this is that where the same facts would justify a conviction for two different offences (say, burglary and petty larceny) a man who has been convicted for one offence cannot be tried over again on the same facts for the second offence. This principle has no application to the present case. Evidence that the defendant supplied liquor to B at a given hour and place would not support a complaint that he supplied liquor to A at another hour or place, notwithstanding that both complaints might have been included in one proceeding. Their Lordships are not aware of any general principle in criminal law which would support the view of the Superior Court. The magistrate has a discretion as to the amount of the penalty between $20 and $50, and where, as in the present case, there are many complaints by the same person of separate offences, it would be right to exercise it. They are, therefore, of opinion that the conviction of the respondent should not have been quashed, and will humbly advise her Majesty to reverse the judgment of the Superior Court. Their Lordships note with satisfaction the statement of the learned counsel for the appellant that the penalties on the conviction of the respondent will not be enforced, but they do not think it necessary to include an undertaking to that effect in the report which they will make to her Majesty. In pursuance of the undertaking of the appellant on the leave to appeal, their Lordships direct the appellant to pay the respondent's costs of this appeal, to be taxed as between solicitor and client.

RICHARDSON V. STORMONT, TORD, AND CO. (LIMITED).*

Stock Exchange—Rules—Defaulting member—Assets—Rule 176, construction of.

This was an appeal from a judgment of Mr. Justice Mathew, reported in The Times of April 13, 1899. The plaintiff was the official assignee of the Stock Exchange. The action was brought to recover £187 10s., being the balance of the price of 2,105 preference shares in the Western Australian Market Trust (Limited), alleged to have been sold by the plaintiff to the defendants. The defence was that the shares had been purchased by the defendants, not from the plaintiff, but from a Mr. Reaveley, who owed the defendants a sum equal to that sued for, which the defendants claimed to be entitled to set off against the price of the shares. It appeared that Reaveley had been a member of the Stock Exchange, and that in April, 1898, he became a defaulter. At that time a debt of £5,339 was due to him from the Western Australian Market Trust (Limited). By the rules of the Stock Exchange it was the duty of the official assignee to take possession of the assets of a defaulting member and distribute them among his creditors in the Stock Exchange. The plaintiff accordingly took steps to recover the debt of £5,339 from the Market Trust. The company could not pay, and a scheme of reconstruction was proposed. The plaintiff attended the meetings and was fully cognisant of all that was done. A scheme was agreed to and sanctioned by the Stock Exchange Committee, by which a new company was formed to take over the liabilities of the old company and discharge them by paying 12s. in cash and 8s. in shares. The plaintiff empowered Reaveley to execute a deed giving effect to the scheme. By virtue of the deed Reaveley became entitled to the shares standing in his name. At the time of Reaveley's default the defendants were clients of his, and a sum of £187 10s. was due from him to the defendants, being part of a larger sum which had been deposited with him by the defendants as cover. Before the shares were handed over to Reaveley, he wrote to the plaintiff saying that friends of his, meaning the defendants, were willing to buy the shares at 3s. The plaintiff answered Reaveley's letter accepting the offer. In his next letter Reaveley mentioned the defendants' as the buyers. The sale was carried through at 3s. a share, but the defendants in paying the purchase money deducted therefrom the sum of £187 10s., the amount of the debt due from Reaveley to them. The cheque for the money was left with the plaintiff's assistant, but the plaintiff, on being made aware of what had been done, at once claimed the full amount from the defendants, and began this action. Mr. Justice Mathew thought that the result of the evidence was that the defendants dealt with Reaveley in the purchase of the shares, not as a principal, but as agent for a disclosed principal—namely, the plaintiff; and he therefore gave judgment for the plaintiff. The defendants appealed.

Mr. Rufus Isaacs, Q.C., and Mr. MacIntyre appeared for the defendants; Mr. Herbert Reed, Q.C., and Mr. F. M. Abrahams for the plaintiff.

The COURT, without calling upon counsel for the plaintiff, dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that he agreed with the judgment of Mr. Justice Mathew. The first question was as to the construction of rule 176 of the Rules of the Stock Exchange, which provided that the official assignee should collect the assets of a defaulting member and distribute them amongst his creditors in the Stock Exchange. What was the meaning of "the assets"? Did it mean the defaulter's Stock Exchange assets or all his assets? Prima facie it meant all the assets which he had, and there was a strong indication of opinion on the part of the House of Lords in the case of "Tomkins v. Saffery" (3 App. Cas., 213) that it meant all his assets without limitation. He therefore held that rule 176 meant that the official assignee should collect the whole of the assets of the defaulting member and distribute them among his Stock Exchange creditors. The second question was whether the official assignee could sue. On this question he adopted the reasons given in the judgment of Mr. Justice Mathew, and he thought the official assignee could sue. Further, he thought there was in this case good evidence of a direct bargain between the defendants and the official assignee that the price of 3s.

a share should be paid without any set-off. The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS said he was of the same opinion. The effect of rule 176 was to constitute a cessio bonorum on the part of Reaveley of all his assets. It seemed to him that the case in the House of Lords was practically a decision to that effect. The plaintiff, therefore, clearly became owner of the shares, and the defendants could not refuse to pay the price to the true owner.

LORD JUSTICE ROMER delivered judgment to the same effect.

SYKES AND ANOTHER V. SOWERBY URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL.*

Local Government—Sewers—Vesting in local authority—Exceptions—"Sewers made by a person for his own profit"—Public Health Act, 1875, sec. 13 (1).

Decision of Divisional Court ([1899] 1 Q.B., 979) reversed.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs from the decision of the Divisional Court (Mr. Justice Darling and Mr. Justice Channell) reversing the judgment of the Halifax County Court Judge; reported in [1899] 1 Q.B., 979. The plaintiffs were quarry owners, and they brought an action for an injunction to restrain the defendants, who were the local sanitary authority, from sending polluted water into a stone drain within the defendants' district which had been made by the plaintiffs' predecessors in title to carry away the rain and surface water from their quarry, and for damages. Some 20 years ago the plaintiffs' predecessors in title constructed a drain within the defendants' district to collect and carry into a public sewer in the district of another local sanitary authority the rain and surface water which came on to their land down a lane known as Carr-lane, within the defendants' district, and which would otherwise have flowed into the quarry. As the quarry workings advanced the course of the drain was from time to time altered. In 1896 the defendants turned polluted water into this drain for the purpose of enabling it to pass through it into the public sewer. The plaintiffs alleged that in consequence their drain was insufficient to carry off the water, and the water percolated into the quarry, and flooded it and rendered the working more expensive. The defendants contended that the drain was a "sewer" vested in them, and was not the private drain of the plaintiffs. The County Court Judge held that the drain was a "sewer" within the definition of that term in section 4 of the Public Health Act, 1875: that by section 13 it would vest in the defendants unless it came within exception (1) as a sewer made by the plaintiffs for their own profit. He found that the drain was constructed for the more economical and convenient working of the quarry and in order that the land might be worked more profitably. He held therefore that the drain not having been made for sanitary or ordinary drainage but for the more beneficial use and occupation of the land was a sewer made by the plaintiffs for their own profit, within exception (1) in section 13, and consequently did not vest in the defendants. The defendants, therefore, had no right to discharge water into the drain. He accordingly granted the injunction, and assessed the damages at £20. The Divisional Court held that the exception did not apply, and entered judgment for the defendants. The plaintiffs appealed. By section 13 of the Public Health Act, 1875, "all existing and future sewers within the district of a local authority, together with all buildings, works, materials, and things belonging thereto, except (1) sewers made by any person for his own profit . . . shall vest in and be under the control of such local authority."

Mr. Butcher, Q.C., and Mr. T. F. Byrne appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. J. Lawson Walton, Q.C., and Mr. W. J. Waugh appeared for the defendants.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that he agreed that this drain was a "sewer" within the Public Health Act, 1875. The County Court Judge found that the drain was constructed for the more economical and convenient working of the quarry and in order that the land might be worked more profitably, and that as the drain was not made for sanitary drainage purposes, but for the more beneficial use and occupation of the land it was a sewer made by the plaintiffs for their own profit within exception (1) in section 13. The Divisional Court reversed that decision. Section 4 of the Public Health Act, 1875, defined "drain" as "any drain of and used for the drainage of one building only, or premises within the same curtilage, and made merely for the purpose of communicating therefrom with a cesspool or other like receptacle for drainage, or with a sewer into which the drainage of two or more buildings or premises occupied by different persons is conveyed." The drain in the present case was not a "drain" within that definition. A "sewer" was defined in section 4 as including "sewers and drains of every description, except drains to which the word 'drain,' interpreted as aforesaid, applies, and except drains vested in or under the control of any authority having the management of roads and not being a local authority under this Act." In his Lordship's opinion this drain was a "sewer" within that definition. That being so, did it vest in the defendants as the local authority? That depended upon section 13, which was in Part 3 of the Act, headed "Sanitary Provisions." That section provided that all existing and future sewers should vest in the local authority, except, first, "sewers made by any person for his own profit." Those words had been the subject of decision on many occasions. The decisions showed that house drains did not come within the exception. The drain in the present case was not a house drain. Considering the findings of the County Court Judge, why was it not a drain made for the plaintiff's profit? It was made in order that he might work the quarry more economically and conveniently. In "Minehead Local Board v. Luttrell" ([1894] 2 Ch., 178) Mr. Justice Romer went through the prior authorities and pointed out that all of them related to house drains. It was there held that sewers made by a landowner for the purpose of draining a town, the greater part of which stood on his own lands, and for the use of which sewers he levied and was paid a sewer rate by all persons whose houses were connected with his sewers, were sewers made by him for his own profit, and did not vest in the local authority. Then in "Croystale v. Sunbury-on-Thames Urban Council" ([1898] 2 Ch., 515) Mr. Justice Stirling held that a sewer, which was not made for ordinary drainage purposes, but to enable the land on which it was made to be occupied more profitably, or to avoid expenditure which would otherwise have to be incurred in order that the occupation might be equally beneficial, was made for the profit of the owner within the meaning of the section, and did not vest in the local authority. Upon the facts and findings of the County Court Judge in the present case he (the Lord Justice) was of opinion that this sewer was made for the profit of the plaintiff within exception (1) in section 13, and therefore did not vest in the defendants. The appeal must therefore be allowed.

*Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS concurred. It would seem as if the definitions in section 4 swept everything which could be described as a drain into the ambit of the Public Health Act, 1875, and though the provisions of Part 3 of the Act were described as "Sanitary Provisions," a drain made for a non-sanitary purpose, prima facie, would come within the Act. How were such drains excluded from the Act? That was done by introducing exceptions in section 13. An ordinary agricultural drain would, apart from the exceptions, be swept into the ambit of the Act, and it was only got out of the Act by means of exception (1) in section 13. In his opinion this drain was made for the profit of the plaintiffs within the meaning of the exception, and therefore did not vest in the defendants.

LORD JUSTICE ROMER delivered judgment to the same effect.

Decision of Mathew, J. (15 The Times L.R., 330, affirmed.)

This was an appeal from the judgment of Mr. Justice Mathew's in favour of the plaintiffs, reported in 15 The Times L.R., 330; 4 Com. Cas., 209. The plaintiffs were the owners of the steamship Brenda, and they claimed from the defendants, the charterers of the vessel, a proportional part of the cost of the discharge of a cargo of timber at the Surrey Commercial Docks. The charter-party, which was the Chamber of Shipping Wood Charter (Scandinavia and Finland), 1898, contained the following clause:—"The cargo to be brought to and taken from alongside the steamer at charterers' risk and expense, any custom of the port notwithstanding." It was admitted by the plaintiffs that, in the absence of any provision in the charter-party negating it, there was a custom in the Port of London with regard to timber ships which enlarged the ordinary meaning of "alongside" and "delivery" by requiring the shipowner to do work outside his ship, in placing the timber in the barge or on the quay, but that such custom did not require him to stow the timber in the barge, or to stack it on the quay. The sum claimed in this action represented the cost of discharging from the ship's rail into barges and on to quay. The defendants denied that the above clause in the charter-party imposed upon them any liability for the cost of discharge into barges or on to quay. Mr. Justice Mathew held that the custom was by the terms of the charter-party excluded, and gave judgment for the plaintiffs. The defendants appealed.

Mr. ENGLISH HARRISON, Q.C., and Mr. D. C. LECK, for the defendants, contended that the words in the charter-party, "any custom of the port notwithstanding," referred to the previous words, "at charterers' risk and expense," and not to the words, "to be brought to and taken from alongside." The custom was therefore applicable. They referred to "Aktieselkab Helios v. Eokman" (2 Com. Cas., 70, 163; [1897] 2 Q.B., 83); "Stephens v. Winttingham" (3 Com. Cas., 169); "The Nifa" ([1892] P., 411).

Mr. T. E. Scrutton, for the plaintiffs, was not called upon.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that in his opinion the judgment of the learned Judge was right. The parties had taken good care to cut out the custom of the port. Apart from any custom the shipowner had only to offer the cargo over the ship's rail, and it was the duty of the consignee to take it from there. The operation was a joint operation, the shipowner bringing the cargo to the ship's rail and the consignee taking it from there. In the present case the charter-party excluded any custom of the port. That exclusion was not limited to the words "at charterers' risk and expense," but covered the whole sentence. That being so, it was the duty of the charterers to take the cargo when it was offered to them over the ship's rail. They did not do so, and they must refund to the shipowners the expense incurred by them in taking it from the ship's rail into barges and on to the quay.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS agreed. Apart from the custom of the port the words "brought to and taken from alongside" meant brought to and taken from the ship's rail, and that meaning could only be extended by the custom of the port. If, therefore, the custom of the port was excluded, as in his opinion it was in the present case, the extended meaning sought to be given to the words was not applicable.

LORD JUSTICE ROMER agreed. He thought the argument of the defendants was too fine. The meaning of the clause in question in the charter-party was that, in considering the relative obligations of the shipowners and charterers as to loading and discharging the cargo, the custom of the port was to be disregarded, and the case was to be governed by the general law apart from any custom.

BOWEN V. DUC D'ORLÉANS.*

Contract—Offer and acceptance—Negotiations for sale—Statute of Frauds.

Held, no concluded contract.

This was an appeal by the defendant from the judgment of Mr. Justice Wills, reported in The Times of May 8, 1899. The action was brought by the plaintiff, an electric launch builder, who was the owner of a portion of Eel-pie Island, on the Thames at Twickenham, to recover damages for an alleged breach of contract by the defendant to purchase his interest in the island. In 1897 the defendant, who occupied York-house, Twickenham, was anxious to secure the island. The matter was placed by him in the hands of Messrs. Rogers, Chapman, and Thomas, estate agents, and the plaintiff put himself in communication with them and offered to sell his interest to the duke for £4,500 on the condition that he would grant him back a lease of certain works on the island. A long correspondence passed between Messrs. Rogers, Chapman, and Thomas, who were admitted to be the duke's agents in the matter, and the plaintiff's solicitors and the duke's solicitors, Messrs. Farrer and Co., and the plaintiff executed the contract for sale. The Duc d'Orléans declined to sign the contract on the ground that he had made it a condition that he would buy the whole island or no part of it at all. The defendant contended that he did not enter into an agreement to purchase the plaintiff's portion of the island, the matter not having gone beyond negotiation; and if there was such an agreement, it was one which did not comply with the Statute of Frauds. The question as to this turned wholly on the correspondence between the representatives of the parties. The plaintiff, on the other hand, maintained that the correspondence showed that there was a concluded agreement, and that there was a sufficient memorandum signed by the defendant's agents to satisfy the Statute of Frauds. The plaintiff also submitted that the defendant was bound by the signature of his solicitors to the finally agreed draft contract. The learned Judge came to the conclusion that a concluded contract was made on or about February 25, 1898, and that two letters of February 25 and March 23, signed by Messrs. Rogers, Chapman, and Thomas, the latter containing the draft contract, amounted to a sufficient memorandum in writing to satisfy the Statute of Frauds. It appeared that this draft contract, when received by the defendant's solicitors, was sent by them to Messrs. Rogers, Chapman, and Thomas in order to get the defendant's approval, and Messrs. Rogers, Chapman, and Thomas, on March 23, returned the draft to the defendant's solicitors approved by them with certain observations on it, and the defendant's solicitors sent it on to the plaintiff's solicitors. The latter made certain alterations in it, and returned it to the defendant's solicitors, who, on April 1, wrote to the plaintiff's solicitors that they approved of the draft as altered and signed by them. Mr. Justice Wills said that the defendant's solicitors were only employed as solicitors to put the contract into shape, and that the draft signed by them on April 1 did not satisfy the Statute of Frauds, but that, as above stated, the letters of February 25 and March 23, and the draft contract enclosed in the last letter, contained a sufficient memorandum in writing of the contract to satisfy the statute, and that the subsequent discussion upon the contract was merely as to putting it into form. He accordingly gave judgment for the plaintiff and assessed the damages at £1,540.

Mr. Dickens, Q.C., and Mr. Muir Mackenzie appeared for the defendant; Mr. Robert Wallace, Q.C., Mr. E. M. Pollock, and Mr. Harold S. Simmons appeared for the plaintiff.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that the point which was taken here was not taken before Mr. Justice Wills. In order to succeed, the plaintiff must make out two things; first, that there was a contract de facto; and secondly, that there was a sufficient memorandum in writing of the contract signed by the party to be charged or by his agent thereunto lawfully authorized. In his opinion the plaintiff could not succeed unless he made out that Messrs. Farrer and Co., the defendant's solicitors, were agents for the defendant to enter into a contract for him. There was not a particle of evidence that Messrs. Farrer and Co. were acting otherwise than as solicitors for the defendant. The agents to effect the contract were Messrs. Rogers, Chapman, and Thomas. Messrs. Farrer and Co. were employed to draw up the contract in point of form and to get it stamped, and it was no part of their duty as solicitors to enter into a contract for the defendant. In his opinion the plaintiff could not succeed unless he made out that on April 1, 1898, Messrs. Farrer and Co. were authorized as agents to enter into the contract. He was unable to agree with Mr. Justice Wills that there was a concluded contract on or before March 23. But he preferred to rest his judgment on this, that the plaintiff had to rely on the signature of Messrs. Farrer and Co., and that signature was not sufficient within the Statute of Frauds. The appeal would therefore be allowed, but there would be no costs of the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS agreed. It was clear law that a solicitor employed to put a contract into shape was not an agent whose signature was sufficient within the Statute of Frauds. The question was whether upon the documents they could get a memorandum in writing to satisfy the Statute of Frauds. Mr. Justice Wills spelt the memorandum principally out of the letters of February 25 and March 23 and the draft contract. That learned Judge thought that the former letter contained every term of the contract, except the duration of the lease. That letter, however, would not bind the purchaser to take the property subject to a right of way across it. There was nothing in the letter about a right of way. That letter admittedly was not sufficient in itself. The learned Judge, thinking that the only other term of the contract necessary to get was the duration of the lease, got that from the letter of March 23 enclosing the draft contract. If that letter and the draft amounted to an unqualified acceptance of the terms by the defendant through his agent, he should agree with Mr. Justice Wills; but upon the face of the documents an exception was taken which went to the root of the contract and was not a mere matter of form—namely, that the draft contract was made subject to a right of way, which was not accepted. Therefore that was not a sufficient memorandum within the statute, and in the exchange of documents which followed no such memorandum could be found.

LORD JUSTICE ROMER was of the same opinion. In his view there was no concluded contract at all. But assuming that there was a concluded contract, in order to get a memorandum in writing of it to satisfy the Statute of Frauds the plaintiff must rely upon Messrs. Farrer and Co.'s signature on April 1. But Messrs. Farrer and Co. were only employed as solicitors, and it was no part of their duty to sign a contract for the purchaser. There was therefore no memorandum in writing to satisfy the statute. His Lordship added that it was a hard case upon the plaintiff.

CASS V. BUTLER.*

Master and Servant—Master's liability to servant
—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897—
“Undertakers,” who are.

A sub-contractor is not an “undertaker” within the Act.

This was an appeal from the decision of Judge Greenhow, the Leeds County Court Judge, in proceedings to assess compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. The respondent, Ann Cass, was the widow of Henry Cass, who, at the time of the accident, was a painter in the employment of the appellant, and she claimed compensation under the Act on behalf of herself and her children, and also on behalf of Cass's mother. It appeared that a builder and contractor named Isaac Gould had entered into a contract to build and complete an electrical station. Gould then entered into a sub-contract with the appellant, who was a painter, that the latter should do the whole of the painting work of the building. The building was being constructed by means of a scaffolding, and was over 30ft. in height. On June 17, 1899, Cass was engaged in painting the iron girders of the roof, and was standing on the scaffolding belonging to Gould, which was used in the erection of the building. While Cass and another man named Crowther, also in the employment of the appellant, were so engaged a plank broke and they fell and were killed. It was admitted that this new building was being painted for the first time. The County Court Judge held that the appellant was an "undertaker" within the meaning of the Act, and that the painting of the new building was "construction," and he made an award of £235 6s. in favour of the respondent. By section 4 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, "Where, in any employment to which this Act applies, the undertakers as hereinafter defined contract with any person for the execution by or under such contractor of any work, and the undertakers would, if such work were executed by workmen immediately employed by them, be liable to pay compensation under this Act to those workmen in respect of any accident arising out of and in the course of their employment, the undertakers shall be liable to pay to any workman employed in the execution of the work any compensation which is payable to the workman . . . by such contractor, or would be so payable if such contractor were an employer to whom this Act applies. Provided that the undertakers shall be entitled to be indemnified by any other person who would have been liable independently of this section." By section 7, subsection 2, the term "undertakers" is defined to mean, in the case of a building, "the persons undertaking the construction, repair, or demolition."

Mr. RUEGG, Q.C., and Mr. A. POWELL, for the appellant, contended that the appellant was not an "undertaker" within the meaning of the Act. The contractor, Gould, was the undertaker, as he was "undertaking the construction" of the building within the definition of "undertakers" in section 7, subsection 2. A sub-contractor was not an undertaker. Section 4 clearly showed that the contractor was liable as the undertaker, though he might be entitled to be indemnified by the sub-contractor. This was not like the case of "Mason v. A. R. Dean (Limited)" (ante, p. 212), where different contractors agreed with the building owner to do separate parts of the construction, and in that case the Court held that each contractor was an undertaker. In the present case one contractor agreed with the building owner to do the whole of the work, and he sub-contracted with the appellant for the painting work. The appellant was therefore not liable. Secondly, painting was not "construction." In "Wood v. Walsh and Sons" ([1899] 1 Q.B., 1,009) it was held that painting the outside of an old house was not "repair." There was no distinction between that case and the present. The decision of the County Court Judge was therefore wrong.

Mr. TEMPLE FRANKS, for the respondent, contended that there was nothing in the Act to show that a sub-contractor could not be an "undertaker." In "Mason v. A. R. Dean (Limited)" it was decided that there could be several undertakers in respect of the construction of one building. If that were so, a sub-contractor could be an undertaker, and whether he was so or not was a question of fact in each case. The County Court Judge found that in this case the appellant was an undertaker, and no appeal lay from his finding. Section 4 was not against the respondent. That section merely provided a remedy against the contractor in addition to that against the sub-contractor. If the sub-contractor was a man of straw, then the applicant could proceed against the contractor. That was the object of section 4.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that in his opinion the County Court Judge was wrong. Though the Judge's notes were very meagre he understood the facts to be these:—Gould was a builder and contractor, and he contracted with the building owner to construct the building. Gould then entered into a sub-contract with the appellant, who was a painter, whereby the appellant contracted with Gould to do the whole of the painting of the building. The appellant employed a man named Cass as a painter upon the painting work of the building. The building was a new one and had never been painted before, and one point taken was that the painting was "construction" within the meaning of section 7. That point it was not necessary to determine, because the other point taken was sufficient to decide the case. It was said that the appellant was not an "undertaker" within the Act; that Gould was the undertaker, and that if any one was liable Gould was liable. The question in other words was whether a sub-contractor was an "undertaker" within the Act. It was said on the other hand that the respondent had the option of suing either the contractor or the sub-contractor, as they were both "undertakers." To his Lordship's mind, this latter contention was not correct. That was not the meaning of the Act. "Undertakers" were defined in section 7, subsection 2, so far as material, as meaning persons undertaking the construction, repair, or demolition of a building. In the present case, who had undertaken the construction of this building? The answer must be, Gould. In "Mason v. A. R. Dean (Limited)" a firm named Messrs. Moore and Sons had contracted with the building owner for the construction of a theatre, but under powers reserved in Messrs. Moore and Sons' contract the building owner entered into a contract with A. R. Dean (Limited) for the latter to do the decorative work. The deceased man was in the employment of the latter firm, and he was killed while at work on the theatre. This Court held that, as A. R. Dean (Limited) had entered into a contract direct with the building owner to construct part of the building, they were "undertakers" within the Act, and liable as such. That was an entirely different case from the present where a contractor had agreed with the building owner to construct the whole building, and had let out part by a sub-contract to a sub-contractor. Section 4 was strong to show that a sub-contractor was not an "undertaker" within the Act.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS and LORD JUSTICE ROMER agreed.

IN RE MAUDSLAY, SONS, AND FIELD (LIMITED).*

Conflict of Laws—Company—Receiver for debenture-holders—Creditor attaching foreign debt due to company—French law.

MR. JUSTICE COZENS-HARDY gave judgment in a motion, which raised an important point on private international law, as follows:—By an order made by the Vacation Judge on October 11, 1899, in three actions by debenture-holders receivers were appointed of the undertaking and of the property whatsoever and wheresoever, both present and future of the defendant company, comprised in certain securities therein mentioned. The company has not been wound up. Thomas Piggott and Co. (Limited), whom I will call the claimants, are the holders of a dishonoured acceptance of the company. Among the assets of the company is a debt due from a French firm, Delaunay et Cie. The claimants registered in Paris the dishonoured bill of exchange, and served on Delaunay et Cie. on November 25, 1899, a certain document, the effect of which, and of a subsequent document served on November 24 in Paris, is fully explained by the affidavit of the French advocates, which all parties agreed to accept, in the following terms:—"According to the French law a debt can be assigned or charged, but in order to be operative as against third parties (which denomination includes the creditor's own creditors) it is imperative—(1) that the assignment or charge should be by instrument in writing; (2) that the ad valorem registration duty should have been paid thereon; and (3) that formal notice in writing of the assignment or charge should, after such registration, be served upon the debtor by an officer of the French Court called or named a huissier. This formal notice can be replaced by the debtor's formal acknowledgment of the assignment or charge in a notarial French deed. When these requirements have been complied with and not before the transferee acquires a legal title to the debt as against third parties as from the date of the formal notice. An assignment or charge of a debt not perfected by registration and subsequent notice to the debtor passes no title whatever to the debt as against third parties, including the assignor's own creditors. We are informed that the above-named plaintiffs claim to hold debentures or debenture stock issued by the defendant company in a form purporting to charge all the property of the defendant company whatsoever and wheresoever, present and future, which by English law comprises the moneys as payable or to become payable to the defendant company by Messrs. Delaunay, Belleville, et Cie. under the conventions mentioned in paragraph 3 of this our affidavit. We say that in the absence of such registration and notice as aforesaid any such debentures or debenture stock has not, according to French law, passed to the holders thereof the moneys payable or to become payable to the defendant company from Messrs. Delaunay, Belleville, et Cie. under the said conventions or given to them any charge upon or interest in the same as against third parties as aforesaid. We are further informed that receivers or sequestrators of all the property comprised in the said debentures or debenture stock have been appointed by this Court on behalf of the said debenture or debenture stock holders. We say that according to French law the said receivers or sequestrators, as such, have no right whatever to receive the above-mentioned moneys, and could not recover the same and would receive no recognition whatever in the French Courts as against attaching creditors. According to French law any creditor, whether French or foreign, who seeks to enforce his claim on a debt owing in France can only do so in accordance with French law, irrespective of the cause of action and of the place where it arose. According to French law any creditor, whether French or foreign, can, if he holds an acknowledgment of debt signed by his debtor, such as a bill or acceptance, attach in the hands of a third party the sums or bills which may belong to his debtor, and thus prevent same being handed over to him. No Judge's authority is required, nor is it necessary that the creditor, if foreign, should be entitled to follow the same course in his own country, French law disregarding entirely foreign laws in matters of procedure which are exclusively governed by the lex fori. We have perused the document now produced to us and marked 'B,' which is a copy certified by the process server of the proceedings taken at the request of Thomas Piggott and Co. (Limited). The proceedings comprise the attachment ('opposition') notice of attachment ('dénouciation d'opposition'), the counter notice of attachment ('contre dénouciation d'opposition'), and have been taken in accordance with French law and constitute an attachment in due form upon which Messrs. Thomas Piggott and Co. (Limited) are entitled to rely to force their claim against the moneys payable, or to become payable to the defendant company, by Messrs. Delaunay, Belleville, et Cie. The notice of attachment contains a citation for the defendant company to appear before the Tribunal Civil of the Seine, who has alone jurisdiction to declare the attachment valid and order the funds attached to be paid over to the attaching creditors. According to French law, when the judgment declaring an attachment valid has become final it operates as an assignment of the funds attached to the attaching creditor, who is entitled to recover same from the party owing same, notwithstanding any subsequent attachments. As long as the judgment declaring the attachment valid has not become final any other creditor could follow the same course as the one followed by Messrs. Thomas Piggott and Co. (Limited) if they have an acknowledgment of debt as aforesaid, and in such case all attachments would rank pari passu, the date of the respective attachments giving no cause of preference. When several attachments are notified it is often the practice of the person receiving the attachments to pay the funds he holds into the Caisse des Dépôts et Consignations subject to the attachments so as to assure a legal distribution of same." After stating that the motion now before him was to restrain the respondents from continuing proceedings in France and interfering with the receiver, it had been ordered to stand over on terms of the receivers paying £530 into Court and the claimants withdrawing proceedings in France and having reserved to them the same right to recover their debt and costs out of the £530 they would have had against the debt of Delaunay et Cie., his Lordship continued:—"The motion now comes on before me to determine whether the claimants are or are not entitled to payment out of the fund in Court, it being arranged that (if necessary) the claimants should be treated as applying for liberty to proceed notwithstanding the appointment of receivers. I must decide this case on the footing that the parties now occupy the same position as they did on December 21. At that date the claimants had acquired an inchoate and imperfect title, which would have been in due course made absolute by the Court in Paris unless this Court had thought fit to intervene. It will be convenient to consider the case first without reference to the appointment of the receivers and on the assumption that the debenture-holders have a security, which is no longer a floating security but has become enforceable. It is plain that, according to English law, the debenture-holders have by contract with the company a charge upon all the assets of the company, including this French debt, and the first question which arises for consideration is this, Does the existence of the charge, which is undoubtedly valid according to English law, entitle the debenture-holders to prevent the claimants, who are unsecured creditors and not debenture-holders, from asserting and enforcing such rights as are given to them by French law against this French debt? In other words, is there any equity in favour of the debenture-holders as against the claimants? I think this question must be answered in the negative. The very point seems to have been decided by Vice-Chancellor Wood and Lord Chelmsford in the "Liverpool Marine Credit Co. v. Hunter" (L.R., 4 Eq., 62; 3 Ch., 479) in the case of a ship. The mortgagees of a ship were then held not entitled to prevent an English unsecured creditor of the shipowner from taking proceedings at New Orleans which would result in judgment against the ship in disregard of the mortgage, the Court of Louisiana declining to recognize the mortgage as valid. See also "Norton v. Florence Land Co." (7 Ch.D., 332). It was urged before me that this doctrine applies only to immovable property, or to movable property having actual locality, and that a chose in action has no locality. "Lee v. Abdy" (17 Q.B.D., 309). But for many purposes a debt is deemed to have a locality. See "Commissioners of Stamps v. Hope" ([1891] A.C., 476); or, as it is sometimes stated, a quasi-locality. It seems to me that I must treat the debt due from Delaunay et Cie. as being situate in France and subject to the French law, and I cannot therefore prevent the claimants at the suit of the debenture-holders from taking such proceedings as the law of France allows for recovering their debt out of this French asset. The next question, or rather the same question in a different aspect, is this. The debenture-holders having, according to English law, a good assignment of the French debt, but having according to French law no such assignment, and the claimants having according to French law a good inchoate charge or assignment, which ought to prevail? It seems to me that I am bound to hold that that assignment which alone is recognized by the law of France ought to prevail, and that the claimants have a better title than the debenture-holders. This is the view taken by Mr. Dicey in his work on the Conflict of Laws (Rule 141):—"An assignment of a movable which cannot be touched—i.e., of a debt, giving a good title thereto according to the lex situs of the debt (in so far as by analogy a situs can be attributed to a debt) is valid." I am not satisfied that the authorities cited by him necessarily involve this principle, but I think it is correct, and, indeed, is a necessary consequence from the admission that a debt has a locality or quasi-locality. Apart, therefore, from the appointment of receivers, I think the claimants ought to succeed. It remains to consider whether the appointment of receivers makes any difference. It was argued with great force that the receivers were appointed over all the property comprised in the debentures, and that it was a contempt of Court to intercept the property which ought to come into the hands of the receivers. On the other hand, it was argued that the order appointing receivers in this general form did not extend to property abroad, and that in any view there had been no interference with the possession of the receivers such as would constitute a contempt. It is not altogether easy to ascertain the origin, nature, and extent of the powers of a receiver. A receiver is an officer of the Court, and the Court does not allow the possession of its officer to be interfered with without its leave. When the Court appoints a receiver it requires the parties to the action to give up possession to the receiver of the property comprised in the order, and treats them as guilty of contempt if they refuse to do so. The Court will grant a receiver a writ of possession (Order XLVII., Rule 2) or a writ of assistance "Wyman v. Knight" (39 Ch.D., 165) to enable him to recover possession. And it will order tenants to attorn to the receiver. So long as the property is within the territorial jurisdiction of the Court there is no difficulty, at least in theory, in putting the receiver in actual possession, and when the receiver is in possession the Court does not allow his possession to be interfered with without leave. For example, no judgment creditor of the company would be allowed to levy execution upon the property of the company in England now in the possession of the receivers. It is well settled that the Court can appoint receivers over property out of the jurisdiction. This power, I apprehend, is based upon the doctrine that the Court acts in personam. The Court does not and cannot attempt by its order to put its own officer in possession of foreign property, but it treats as guilty of contempt any party to the action in which the order is made who prevents such steps being taken as are necessary to enable its officer to take possession according to the laws of the foreign country. [His Lordship here referred to the cases "Keys v. Keys" (1 Bea., 425), "Smith v. Smith" (1 Hare, Appen. lxxi.), and "Houlditch v. Marquis of Donegall" (8 Bli., N.S., 301).] In other words, the receiver is not put in possession of foreign property by the mere order of the Court. Something else has to be done, and until that has been done in accordance with the foreign law, any person not a party to the suit who takes proceedings in the foreign country is not guilty of a contempt either on the ground of interfering with the receiver's possession or otherwise. For this purpose no distinction can be drawn between a foreigner and a British subject. I have not been able to find any authority on which this precise point has been discussed, but on general principles I think I should not be justified in holding that the claimants by taking proceedings in Paris were guilty of a contempt of Court. If, however, I am wrong in this view, and there has been a contempt, it seems to me that I ought to allow the claimants to proceed notwithstanding the appointment of receivers. It cannot be reasonable that I should deprive English creditors of a right against French assets, which French creditors undoubtedly enjoy. Upon the whole I think the application fails, and I must order payment of the dishonoured bill and the costs of the French proceedings and the costs of this application out of the funds in Court, and the plaintiff will pay the amount, if any, by which the fund in Court is insufficient to answer the costs.

PABSONS V. THE NEW ZEALAND SHIPPING COMPANY (LIMITED).*

Ship—Bill of lading—Short delivery—Incorrect description of goods in bill of lading—Onus of proof on shipowner—Bill of Lading Act, 1855, sec. 3.

The plaintiff claimed damages for the non-delivery of certain carcasses of lambs shipped from New Zealand on board the steamship Fifeshire. The defendants were the agents of the owners of the Fifeshire and had signed the bills of lading. The facts and arguments are fully stated in the judgment. Section 3 of the Bills of Lading Act, 1855, upon which the plaintiff relied, is as follows:—"Every bill of lading in the hands of a consignee or endorsee for valuable consideration representing goods to have been shipped on board of a vessel shall be conclusive evidence of such shipment as against the master or other person signing the same, notwithstanding that such goods or some part thereof may not have been so shipped, unless such holder of the bill of lading shall have had actual notice at the time of receiving the same that the goods had not been in fact laden on board, provided that the master or other person so signing may exonerate himself in respect of such misrepresentation by showing that it was caused without any default on his part, and wholly by the fraud of the shipper or of the holder, or some person under whom the holder claims."

MR. JUSTICE KENNEDY read the following judgment :—This is an action brought by the plaintiff, the consignee in London of a quantity of lambs' carcasses from Timaru, New Zealand, against the defendants, who were the agents in New Zealand for the owners of the steamship Fifeshire, in which the goods were carried, and who signed the bills of lading. The claim is for damages for short delivery of 154 carcasses. Each of the bills of lading, two in number, relating to the claim in this action describes the goods included in it as "marked and numbered as in the margin," the body of the bill of lading in the one case giving a total of 1,166 carcasses, and the marginal description containing (inter alia) "Sun Brand, 488 X., 226 carcasses." The body of the bill of lading in the other case, gives a total of 1,076 carcasses, and the marginal description contains (inter alia) "Sun Brand, 622 X., 608 carcasses." On the ship's arrival in London 53 carcasses of the former description, so far as regards the figure 488, and 100 carcasses of the latter, so far as regards the figure 622, were found to be wanting. But there were on board 21 carcasses marked "Sun Brand, 388 X.," and 102 carcasses marked "Sun Brand, 522 X.," which were not required by any other importer, and to which no bills of lading, given in respect of the cargo laden on the Fifeshire, related, except, as the defendants contend, the two bills of lading already mentioned of which the plaintiff was the holder. If these carcasses were treated as carcasses included in these two bills of lading, although incorrectly described in the marginal description, as being marked "488" instead of "388" in the one case, and "622" instead of "522" in the other, there was still a deficiency in the number ready for delivery of 31 carcasses. The plaintiff in this action claims damages for the non-delivery of 154 carcasses. The defendants admit the claim in regard to the deficiency of 31 carcasses, and in respect of that they paid into Court, after service of the writ of summons, a sum of £29, which exceeds the net invoice cost at the rate of 8s. 8d. per stone of 8lb. By the terms of the bill of lading the shipowners' liability in case of loss, or detention, or injury to goods for which they may be responsible is to be calculated on, and in no case to exceed, the net invoice cost. I hold that the defendants are entitled to the benefit of this clause, and therefore in regard to the plaintiff's claim as regards 31 carcasses, the plaintiff's claim is satisfied by the payment into Court. In regard to the larger subject of the claim—123 carcasses—the main issue is this. The defendants say :—"The 21 'Sun Brand, 388 X.,' and the 102 'Sun Brand, 522 X.,' really formed part of the plaintiff's consignment, and were erroneously described in the margins of the two bills of lading, in the one as '488' instead of '388,' and in the other as '622' instead of '522.' We carried these carcasses as part of the goods included in the two bills of lading; we tendered the plaintiff these as part of his consignment; we therefore performed our contract, and his refusal to accept them as part of his goods was unjustifiable." The plaintiff, on the other hand, does not admit the fact that these carcasses did form part of his consignment in the sense of being shipped, and intended to be included in the totals set forth in the bills of lading; and further he says, as a matter of law, that the defendants, having by their manager, W. Bennett, signed the bills of lading, are concluded by section 3 of the Bills of Lading Act, 1855, and cannot be allowed to prove an error in the marginal statement of the bills of lading as to the numerical marking of 123 of the carcasses (21 in the one case and 102 in the other). He contends that these bills of lading, so signed, are not only conclusive evidence against the defendants of the total number of carcasses therein respectively stated to be shipped and of the carcasses being of the quality

"Sun Brand, X.," and of the grade of weight designated in the margin in the case of one bill of lading by the final letter "8" and in the other by the final letter "2," but also conclusive evidence of the shipment of quantities designated in the margins of these bills of lading with the marginal markings "622" and "488." Upon the evidence and statements before me, I find the facts, so far as they appear to me to be material, to be these :—The Sun Brand is a registered brand of the shippers, the Christchurch Meat Company (Limited), under whose form of bill of lading signed by the defendants' manager the meat in question was shipped. That brand and the "X." denote quality; of the three-figure numbering, whether 488, 388, 622, or 522, the final figure is important because it denotes what may be called the classification of weight, as—e.g., 35-40lb., or as the case may be. The duplication of this figure, 88, 22, and so on is a peculiarity of these shippers to indicate both that the meat comes from their factories, as the killing and freezing places appear to be called, and that the meat is their own property, and has not been frozen and shipped by them as agents for other persons. The first figure, as e.g., the 6 in 622, or the 4 in 488, simply records the date of killing and freezing, and so for the purposes of his own accounts it has its use or importance for the shipper, just as the duplication of the 2 or the 8 has; but neither the first figure, nor the duplication of the following figure has, as I understand the evidence, any distinctive value as regards the market for the meat. In other words, and to sum up, given the "Sun Brand" and "X." and the final figure, the meat is as a commercial article absolutely unaffected in character or value whether it is marked "522" or "622," "488" or "388." Secondly, I find as a fact that in practice, and according to the course of business in shipment, the only tally at Timaru made on behalf of the ship is a tally of the number of carcasses. The work proceeds rapidly day and night, and no attempt is made to check the shipper's marks or numbers upon the individual carcasses. The carcasses are brought in insulated vans from the freezing store, some distance away, to the mole or breakwater where the ship lies, and thence are shot at once down a shoot through the ship's side into the refrigerating chamber of the ship. Thirdly, I find as a fact in regard to the carriage and discharge that there were no other shipments on board the Fifeshire of "Sun Brand, X.," with duplicated 2 or duplicated 8 under any bills of lading other than those of which Parsons became the holder; nor were there any claims by any other consignees for the 21 "388" or the 102 "522," which the defendants sought to deliver to the plaintiff as part of his consignment. So far as I can discover in the documents, though I do not, on my note, find any oral statement in evidence to that effect, no "Sun Brand" at all were shipped under any bills of lading except these to any consignees. In the result I have come to the conclusion upon the question of fact that the defendants have discharged the burden of proof which undoubtedly lay upon them, and that the true inference from the evidence is that the 21 "Sun Brand, 388 X.," and the 102 "Sun Brand, 522 X.," which the defendants asked the plaintiff to take as part of his consignment, did respectively form part of the quantities set forth in the two bills of lading, and were by the shipper's error incorrectly included in the respective marginal specifications under "488" and "622." Upon the point of law I have come to the conclusion that the defendants are not prevented by section 3 of the Bills of Lading Act, 1855, from showing and relying upon these facts in order to establish that 21 fewer carcasses "Sun Brand, 488 X." and 102 fewer carcasses "Sun Brand, 622 X.," were shipped than are stated in the margins of the bills of lading, and that these were shipped as part of the total quantities stated in these bills of lading respectively, 21 "Sun Brand, 388 X.," and 102 "Sun Brand, 522 X." I so hold upon the ground that in my view the section referred to does not operate to make the bill of lading conclusive as to the statement of marks upon the goods shipped where those marks do not affect or denote substance, quality, or commercial value. To interpret this statutory enactment, as Mr. Danckwerts for the plaintiff has invited me to interpret it, so as to prevent the party treated as the party responsible for the carriage of goods under a bill of lading and I will assume signing the bill of lading, from showing, not that he has carried fewer goods than the bill of lading specifies, or goods different in substance or quality or value from those which are specified in the bill of lading, but that the bill of lading has been incorrectly filled up in regard to the statement of the mark put upon parcels of goods by the shipper for the purposes of identification or record would be, as it appears to me, to strain the meaning of the section. It was not unfairly urged, I think, by Mr. Carver, for the defendants, that if the statute operates in such a case as this the shipper who signed a bill of lading would be conclusively bound by a clerical error in description of an immaterial mark in a bill of lading. No authority, as it appears to me, has been cited which really supports such an interpretation. "Bradley v. Duniface" (31 L.J., Ex., 210; 32 L.J., Ex., 22) is, I think, distinguishable. The weight there, as the judgment of the Exchequer Court delivered by Mr. Justice Wightman points out, was of some importance in the contract. The plaintiff's counsel suggested in this case an importance of the mark in regard to insurance; but it appears to me that a difficulty in matters outside the contract of the shipment or the nature and value of the goods themselves is not a matter which ought to affect the question of the applicability of the statute to such a case as the present. Taking this view of the case, it is unnecessary for me to consider the three other points which Mr. Carver also relied on. First, that the defendants, on the face of the bills of lading, signed as agents only for the shipowners, as, in fact, they were, and therefore could not be successfully sued; secondly, that in regard to the Bills of Lading Act, 1855, section 3, by the operation of the clause of these bills of lading, "The ship will not be responsible for correct delivery unless each package is distinctly, correctly, and permanently marked by the merchant before shipment with a mark or number and address," the effect of that section, if otherwise such as the plaintiff contended for, would be destroyed (see "Jessel v. Bath," L.R. 2, Ex., 267); and, thirdly, that, as the value and nature of the carcasses offered to the plaintiff by the defendants were the same as those of such carcasses as should have been delivered to him under the marks stated in the bills of lading, the plaintiff, as he was tendered an equivalent, could claim no damages. I will only say, so far as regards the last point, that it seems to me now, as I said during the argument, untenable. A carrier who fails to deliver cannot avoid the consignee's claim for damages by offering something which is not the thing to which the consignee is entitled, because it would be an equivalent in value. The first point is not, I think, open to the defendants, because they have accepted in this action the position of the shipowners as carriers of the goods. There is more, I think, to be said for the second point, but I prefer to rest my judgment upon the ground which I have stated.

Judgment for the defendants.

Mr. DANCKWERTS stated that there were some other carcasses marked "Sun Brand X. 62" and "48" but not with the duplicated final figure, shipped to consignees other than the plaintiff.

The learned JUDGE said that that fact did not in any way affect his judgment.

SEATON V. BURNAND.*

Decision of the Court of Appeal (15 The Times L.R., 297), ordering a new trial, reversed.

This was an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal, dated March 25, 1899, that the verdict of a special jury and the judgment of Mr. Justice Bigham, on the trial of the action on January 11 and 12, 1899, in favour of the plaintiff—appellant in the House of Lords—should be set aside and a new trial heard. The case is reported below (15 The Times L.R., 297; L.R. [1899], 1 Q.B., 782; 68 L.J., Q.B., 631). The questions in this appeal arose out of a curious policy at Lloyd's—viz., one guaranteeing the solvency of a person who was surety for a debt of large amount. Mrs. Seaton, the appellant, plaintiff in the action, claimed £240 under a contract in writing dated December 2, 1897, underwritten by the respondent Burnand for £240, whereby the respondent guaranteed the solvency of Sir Frederick Seager Hunt, in respect of a promissory note for £15,000 given by Major-General Barwell, payment whereof was guaranteed by the said Sir Frederick Seager Hunt. The respondent in his defence pleaded:—(i.) That the appellant by the said contract represented and warranted and it was a condition precedent to liability under the contract:—(a) That the appellant had advanced to Major-General Barwell the sum of £15,000; (b) that the said loan of £15,000 had been made by the appellant to the said Major-General Barwell in the ordinary course of business, and either without interest or at a reasonable rate of interest. That the said representations were untrue and the said warranty was broken, and the said condition precedent was not performed. (ii.) That the appellant represented to the respondent thereby inducing him to enter into the contract:—(a) That the said Sir Frederick Seager Hunt was a man of great wealth, and that his only other liability was a bill for £25,000 or thereabouts; (b) that the transaction was a loan made in the ordinary way of business but that as the lender was a lady her husband desired to obtain the contract of guarantee sued upon for better security. That the said representations were untrue in fact and that they were made fraudulently or recklessly. (iii.) That the appellant fraudulently concealed from the respondent, thereby inducing him to enter into the contract, the following facts:—(a) That part of the alleged advance was only a renewal of an old loan; (b) that 30 per cent. interest and a bonus was being charged; (c) that the appellant's name was only used in the transaction to conceal the fact that the transaction was in fact being carried out by another. That these facts were well known to the appellant but were unknown to the respondent and were material to be known to him. Mrs. Seaton, the appellant, who was a lady of considerable private means, on October 21, 1897, advanced to Major-General Barwell £4,500 on the security of his promissory note for that amount becoming due on January 24, 1898. Such advance was effected by payment of a sum of £4,125 to Major-General Barwell, being £4,500 less interest for the period of three months. This loan was guaranteed by Sir Frederick Seager Hunt. In November, 1897, Major-General Barwell was desirous of procuring a further advance out of part of which the loan of October, 1897, should be repaid, and on December 3, 1897, Mrs. Seaton advanced to him a sum of £15,000 on the security of his promissory note for that amount becoming due on June 6, 1898. Such advance was effected by handing back to Major-General Barwell the promissory note for £4,500 which was not due till January 24, 1898, and by giving him a cheque for £8,250, the balance of the £15,000 being retained to satisfy the interest on the advance. This loan also was guaranteed by Sir Frederick Seager Hunt. Major-General Barwell agreed in writing on December 3, 1897, to pay interest on £15,000 at the rate of 30 per cent. if the note was not paid on maturity. Mrs. Seaton desired a further security for repayment, and accordingly through Mr. Lion, a broker at Lloyd's, proposals were made to the respondent, Mr. Burnand, a broker and underwriter at Lloyd's, who with others had for some years made a business of guaranteeing loans, to guarantee the solvency of Sir Frederick Seager Hunt. Mr. Lion and Mr. Burnand were both called as witnesses at the trial, and there was a conflict of evidence as to what passed between them, but it was common ground that after receiving from Mr. Lion the original request to guarantee the loan, Mr. Burnand (who stated that he said, "It is a funny thing—we will see whether Sir Frederick Seager Hunt is as rich as all this. We will go and ask") went with Mr. Lion and Mr. Fleming, another broker and underwriter, to Mr. Shand, the manager of Parr's Bank, where Mr. Burnand banked, on two occasions to make inquiries as to the pecuniary position of Sir Frederick Seager Hunt, and was informed by Mr. Shand that Sir Frederick Seager Hunt had a certain amount of paper out, but he (Mr. Shand) thought he was good for this loan. Mr. Burnand said in his evidence that on hearing this he thought he had the best authority on the subject, and a slip containing a proposal for guarantee was prepared and initialled by those underwriters, who were ready to guarantee Sir Frederick Seager Hunt's solvency. The original premium asked on this slip was 40s. per cent. for six months, which was altered by the first underwriter, Mr. Heath, to 50s. per cent., representing a payment at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum on the original loan by Mrs. Seaton. Neither Mr. Burnand nor any other underwriter asked any question at the time as to the rate of interest which Mrs. Seaton was receiving on the original loan, but Mr. Burnand said at the trial that he presumed between 8 and 9 per cent. was being paid. Thereupon the contract sued on was on December 2, 1897, drawn up and signed by each of the guarantors, being stamped with a 6d. stamp for each person guaranteeing. At the conclusion of the evidence Mr. Justice Bigham submitted to the counsel for the parties the questions he proposed to ask the jury. Sir Robert Reid, Q.C., who was the leading counsel for the respondent, after consultation with Mr. Carson, Q.C., who was with him, and Mr. Lawson Walton, Q.C., who appeared for Mr. Heath, another guarantor, stated that there were no additional questions or any variations in the questions asked, which he could suggest. Counsel for the applicant also agreed to the questions proposed, which were as follows:—(1) Was the transaction one of exceptional risk? (2) Did the plaintiff know it to be so? (3) Did the conduct of the plaintiff amount to a representation that it was not a transaction of exceptional risk? (4) Did the defendants in taking the risk act upon the representation?

No. 16.—Vol. XVI.

(5) Was the representation made fraudulently, that is to say, with a view to induce the underwriters to take the risk? Mr. Justice Bigham asked the jury, in the first place, to answer the first question agreed upon. He suggested to the jury that from the admitted fact that the appellant was paying the respondent at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum for the guarantee, and that the respondent knew or must have known that she was getting more than that for herself, the respondent must have known that a high rate of interest was being paid for a loan guaranteed by a man supposed to be very wealthy. The Judge pointed out that the respondent must have known that at least 10 per cent. was being paid for the loan, but that he might not have known that as much as 30 per cent. interest was to be paid, and that it was for the jury to say whether this was not, by reason of the high rate of interest in fact charged, such an exceptional risk as Mr. Burnand would not in the ordinary course of business and from the facts disclosed contemplate. The jury, after a very short deliberation, answered this question in the negative. Mr. Justice Bigham after the answer of the jury to the first question, asked Sir Robert Reid as counsel for the respondent, Mr. Burnand, whether he wanted the other questions put, and after discussion it was agreed that the other questions need not be put except the fourth, which, at the request of plaintiff's counsel, was put to the jury. This question was as follows, as finally explained:—"Did Mr. Burnand solely rely upon the information which he got from Shand, or did he rely upon the information which he got from Shand plus the information he got from Lion?" The jury, after some deliberation, answered that he relied on the information of both. On these findings Mr. Justice Bigham entered judgment for the appellant, with costs. On January 19, 1899, the respondent, by his solicitor, gave notice of an application to the Court of Appeal that the judgment of Mr. Justice Bigham should be set aside and that judgment should be entered for the respondent, Mr. Burnand, or that a new trial should be had on the grounds, inter alia, that the verdict was against the weight of the evidence, and that the Judge had misdirected the jury by omitting to give them certain directions. The respondent's motion for a new trial came on for hearing before Lords Justices Smith, Collins, and Romer on March 6, 10, and 13, and on March 25, 1899, the Court gave judgment declining to enter judgment for the respondent, but granting a new trial. Lord Justice Smith was of opinion that the following question should have been left to the jury:—"Whether, taking into account the statement made to the underwriters, it was a concealment of a material fact not to disclose to them the circumstances under which the loan to the major-general had been made and the rate of interest which was demanded and obtained?" The learned Judge also thought that the question left by Mr. Justice Bigham, "Was the transaction one of exceptional risk?" required more explanation to the jury, and that if it meant, "Was it a risk which, in the circumstances under which it was tendered to the underwriters, was exceptional in the sense that it in fact differed materially from what the underwriters on the facts disclosed might naturally suppose it to be?" the answer of the jury required reconsideration. At the close of his judgment the Lord Justice was of opinion that the questions which should be left to the jury should embrace the following:—"Taking what was stated with what was left unstated, was there a concealment, designed or undesigned, varying materially the risk undertaken to be run? Whether there was any mis-statement of a material fact, and, if so, were the defendants influenced by such mis-statement in underwriting the policy? Lords Justices Collins and Romer agreed with this judgment. The appellant, in her reasons, submitted that the question put to the jury with the assent of the respondent was correct. That the summing up of the Judge contained the proper directions to the jury, and that he was not asked by the respondents to give any of the directions or to enter the judgment suggested by the respondents in their notice of appeal. That there was evidence upon which the jury could reasonably answer the question as they did answer it, and that the answer given by the jury was correct. That the respondents agreed at the trial that it was not necessary to put any further questions to the jury. That the verdict and judgment were correct. For the respondent the main reasons were that the contract made between the appellant and the respondent was one of insurance. That the law as to concealment, non-disclosure, and misrepresentation, and uberrima fides applicable to contracts of marine, fire, and life insurance were equally applicable to the contract in question, whether the same was a contract of insurance or one of guarantee. That in the present case there was concealment or non-disclosure of material facts, and want of uberrima fides, such as vitiated the contract and entitled the respondent to judgment, or at all events that there was evidence of such concealment and non-disclosure and want of uberrima fides, and the question as to whether the facts were material ought to have been left to the jury. That the verdict was against the weight of the evidence, and that the learned Judge misdirected the jury as to the effect of concealment and non-disclosure, and by not giving them any direction as to such effect, and not leaving to them the question as to the materiality of the facts concealed.

Sir E. Clarke, Q.C., Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. Scrutton were counsel for the appellant; Sir R. T. Reid, Q.C., Mr. Lawson Walton, Q.C., Mr. Carson, Q.C., Mr. Willes Chitty, and Mr. F. Newbolt for the respondent.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in moving that the decision of the Court of Appeal should be reversed, said that, but for the respect due to the learned Judges below, the case might be very summarily disposed of. Many topics had been urged which were irrelevant to the question to be determined. This was a transaction in which a person borrowing money at a high rate of interest—30 per cent. or more—was guaranteed by a gentleman of good commercial credit at that time. The lender insisted upon the additional guarantee of a policy at Lloyd's for the purpose not of establishing his right to have the money paid, but to guarantee the solvency of a gentleman of whose solvency there was not the smallest reason for doubt. He did not know that there had been any suggestion that there was any fact known to the lender, and not disclosed, which would have diminished by a feather's weight belief in Sir F. Seager Hunt's solvency. In these circumstances, Lloyd's undertook, or underwrote, this policy for the guarantee of Sir F. Hunt's solvency. That was the contract into which they entered and upon which they were now sued. The case set up by the respondents was not that there was anything affecting the solvency of Sir F. Seager Hunt, but that the whole transaction should have been explained to those who were going to enter into the policy. His Lordship entirely differed—and could not agree that any such circumstance could or ought to have affected the mind of any one entering into this contract. He did not think any such idea occurred to any of these gentlemen. As business men, what did they do? Did they inquire into the original loan or how it came to be made? No; they did the natural thing to do. They inquired at the bank into the commercial reputation of Sir F. Seager Hunt, and then they entered into this contract. It appeared to him that this was the beginning and end of the whole case. There was no protest that anything had been kept back, nothing known to the appellant which could have affected Hunt's credit, except what was afterwards said about the nature of the loan itself. To his mind that was the whole question and the parties could not go back further. It was easy to use the phrase "the whole transaction must be explained." If by that was meant the only thing guaranteed—viz., Hunt's solvency, the respondent knew all there was to be known. There was not a fragment of evidence bearing upon this question. But it was said that this was not an ordinary transaction. He did not know what that meant. The transaction itself, one of guarantee of somebody's solvency who was liable for somebody else's debt, was itself of a somewhat extraordinary character. But all this was known, it was the very nature of the transaction. He was not aware before this case that arrangements of this kind were made the subjects of policies at Lloyd's. Then after the event it was said that the underwriters ought to have known the circumstances of the loan and ought to have had their minds directed to them. People often persuaded themselves as to what they would have done if the circumstances had been different. So then it was said that the underwriters would not have taken this risk if they had known the loan was to be at 30 per cent. He declined to discuss whether or not the loan was actually made at that time. That question was never essentially contested. What was put before the Judge and stated by him much more favourably to the defendants than he would himself have stated it was that £15,000 was the gross sum to be paid, not so much interest and so much principal, but a lump amount. Business men would know that interest was included; and if they had thought it material would have inquired into the items. The first was distinctly put before Mr. Burnand in cross-examination, who said that no question was asked about interest. Mr. Burnand said it would have been material to know if it had been as much as 30 per cent. But they thought it might be 8 or 9 per cent., as it was a friendly transaction. His Lordship had during the argument observed that 8 or 9 per cent. was a strange rate to charge in a friendly transaction. But the whole case showed that it was idle to base the matter on the information given or withheld of the character of the loan. This admission of Mr. Burnand's was decisive. It had also been suggested that the verdict was against the evidence; and Mr. Lawson Walton had contended that no reasonable jury could have found such a verdict. His Lordship was sorry to differ from the learned counsel, as he should himself have so found if he had been a jurymen. It was not only a reasonable verdict but the only possible one. The Court of Appeal, whose judgment was relied upon, did not enter into the question which had been so vehemently argued before the House, but formulated other questions. But at the trial the Judge gave counsel at the Bar the opportunity of asking whether any other question should be put, and the defendant's counsel suggested no additional question and no variation of those which were put. In these circumstances it would indeed be a loose mode of administering justice to permit the issues to be submitted to another jury. He therefore moved that the decision of the Court of Appeal should be reversed.

LORD MACNAGHTEN concurred.

LORD MORRIS agreed with the Lord Chancellor that the Judge had laid the case before the jury in a manner which was too favourable to the defendant. The only risk was the solvency of Sir F. Seager Hunt. No doubt his failure to meet his liabilities would lead to the obligation of the defendant to pay the money, and there was no suggestion that Mrs. Seaton had kept back anything which would have affected belief in Hunt's solvency, which was thought to be unimpeachable. Counsel on both sides acquiesced in the questions submitted to the jury, and yet the Court of Appeal suggested other questions. If there had been any extraordinary miscarriage of justice—and there certainly was none—the question might be different. But in an ordinary case the parties must be bound by the course of the trial when counsel on both sides have agreed as to the issues to be submitted to the jury. Then it was said the Judge had failed to dwell upon some points in the transactions. Well, a Judge was not a literary critic, engaged in an exhaustive survey, and if counsel did not call attention to such points they must suffer the consequences.

LORD SHAND was of the same opinion. The Court of Appeal had made out a case for the respondent which he had not made for himself at the trial. It was said that the rate of interest was so extraordinary that it ought to have been disclosed. Mr. Burnand was a witness, but admitted he did not inquire. In his Lordship's opinion it was not material to know the interest. The only question was one of Hunt's solvency, and the underwriters made the only inquiry which concerned them and were satisfied, and the Judge had placed the case before the jury as favourably to the respondent as possible.

LORD DAVEY concurred.

LORD BRAMPTON held that there had been no fraud and no concealment, and no information about the nature of the transaction could have had any possible bearing on the solvency of Sir F. Seager Hunt.

LORD ROBERTSON said that in the Court of Appeal the question was fully discussed whether the respondent's liability was one of insurance or purely of guarantee. That question had been entirely superseded by the appellant's counsel. Mr. Joseph Walton formulated his case thus. Assuming that disclosure was incumbent, as in the case of insurance—and the Court of Appeal relied upon the duty of disclosure—the disclosure necessary must be of facts material to the formation of a judgment as to the risk incurred. But, according to Lord Justice A. L. Smith, the question whether anything was material was one for the jury. His Lordship's concurrence in the motion of the Lord Chancellor was based on the ground that this question had been determined by the jury. The question submitted by the Judge must be regarded in connexion with the explanations with which he furnished the jury, and the latter were in full possession of the whole case.

The appeal was accordingly allowed.

GREENWELL AND ANOTHER V. HOWELL AND ANOTHER.*

Practice—Costs—Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893—Public right of way—Act of trespass by county surveyor and deputy clerk of the county council by instruction of county council—Action against county surveyor and deputy clerk of the council—"Public duty"—Solicitor and client costs.

Decision of Bruce, J. (ante, p. 130), affirmed.

This was an appeal from the decision of Mr. Justice Bruce as to costs after the trial of an action with regard to an alleged right of way (reported ante, p. 130). The question raised was an important one under the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893. The action was one for trespass, and was brought by the owners of Marden Park, in Surrey. The defendants alleged that a certain way in the parish of Godstone was a public highway. A dispute having arisen as to whether the way was a public highway, the Surrey County Council, upon the petition of the parish council under section 28, subsection 4, of the Local Government Act, 1894, resolved to exercise the powers and duties of the district council under that section in regard to the protection of the alleged public right of way, the district council having failed to take proceedings in respect thereof. Thereupon some letters passed between the plaintiffs or their solicitors and the clerk of the county council, and in the result a letter was written on behalf of the plaintiffs to the clerk of the county council stating that they had removed the obstructions complained of on the way, without admitting that the way was a public way, and that they would prosecute any one trespassing thereon. They stated that, in order that the question of right might be tried before a competent tribunal, they were prepared to bring an action of trespass against any person so trespassing, thus giving an opportunity of raising the question whether a public right of way existed or not. They suggested that the question of right might be conveniently raised by the county council authorizing their surveyor or some other person, on their behalf, to commit a nominal trespass, as was usually done in such cases. Thereupon the defendants, who were the county surveyor and the deputy-clerk of the county council, acting under the instructions of the county council, drove along the road in question, thus committing the alleged act of trespass. The plaintiffs then brought the present action. The learned Judge held that the public right of way had been established, and gave judgment for the defendants. The defendants thereupon applied for costs as between solicitor and client under section 1 of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vict., c. 61). The learned Judge, in giving judgment upon this point, said that the defendants had brought themselves within the provisions of the Act. It was the duty of the county council in the circumstances to appoint persons to drive along the road for the purpose of testing the public right of way, and the defendants were the persons who were directed or ordered by the county council to test the right. They drove along the road as the servants of the county council, and their act was the act of the county council; and therefore, in his opinion, it was an act done by the defendants in pursuance of a public duty, because, in doing what they did, they were acting in pursuance of the authority of the county council. He accordingly ordered the plaintiffs to pay costs as between solicitor and client. By section 1 of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, "where, after the commencement of this Act, any action, prosecution, or other proceeding is commenced in the United Kingdom against any person for any act done in pursuance, or execution, or intended execution of any Act of Parliament, or of any public duty or authority, or in respect of any alleged neglect or default in the execution of any such Act, duty, or authority, the following provisions shall have effect:—(a) The action, prosecution, or proceeding shall not lie or be instituted unless it is commenced within six months next after the act, neglect, or default complained of . . . ; (b) wherever in any such action a judgment is obtained by the defendant it shall carry costs to be taxed as between solicitor and client." The plaintiffs appealed from the order as to costs on the ground that the above provision only applied where the action was brought against the local authority.

Mr. Neville, Q.C., and Mr. McSwinnery appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Jelf, Q.C., and Mr. George Humphreys for the defendants.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that the plaintiffs were the owners of certain land over which there was a suggested public right of way. There was a dispute whether a public right of way existed. The plaintiffs threatened to prosecute any one trespassing upon the way. It was then arranged between the plaintiffs and the county council that the proper way of testing the question was by some one on behalf of the county council committing a nominal act of trespass. Accordingly, by the direction of the county council, to the knowledge of the plaintiffs—if that had anything to do with the matter—the two defendants, who were officials of the county council, drove along the way in question. An action of trespass was then brought. What was done was done, not under any agreement, but under an arrangement between the plaintiffs and the county council. At the trial the learned Judge gave judgment for the defendants. Thereupon the defendants said that they were entitled to costs as between solicitor and client under section 1 of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893. Section 1 of that Act provided, so far as material, that where any action was commenced against any person for any act done in pursuance, or execution, or intended execution of any Act of Parliament, or of any public duty or authority, certain results, which he would mention subsequently, were to follow. Pausing there, the section did not say that the action must be against a public body, but against “any person.” The section went on to provide in Clause (a) that in such a case the action must be commenced within six months next after the act complained of. Could the plaintiffs have brought this action after six months had elapsed since the act of trespass? In his opinion they could not; but if such a defence were to be set up it must be pleaded. The section then went on to provide, in Clause (b), that wherever in any such action a judgment was obtained by the defendant it was to carry costs to be taxed as between solicitor and client. It was clear that, in committing the act of trespass, the defendants were acting under the direction of the county council for the purpose of enabling an action of trespass to be brought to raise the question in dispute. Was that act of the defendants done in pursuance, or execution, or intended execution of any Act of Parliament, or of any public duty or authority? That brought him to section 26 of the Local Government Act, 1894. By subsection 1 of that section it was the duty of the district council to protect all public rights of way, and to prevent as far as possible the stopping or obstruction of any such right of way, where the stoppage or obstruction thereof would in their opinion be prejudicial to the interests of their district. By subsection 3 the district council might, for the purpose of carrying into effect the section, institute or defend any legal proceedings, and generally take such steps as they deemed expedient. By subsection 4, if the district council failed in their duty under the section, the county council might resolve that the powers and duties of the district council should be transferred to the county council. It seemed plain to him that when any one set up an obstruction on a public way—his Lordship did not care whether the obstruction was of a physical character or took the form of a threat of legal proceedings—it was the duty of the district council, or, if the county council had taken over the duties of the district council, it was the duty of the county council, to take proceedings to preserve the rights of the public, or to defend proceedings taken against them by the landowner, or to take such steps as they might deem expedient for that purpose. Having regard to the provisions of the Act of 1894, it seemed to him clear that the act of the defendants was done in pursuance of the public duty imposed by that Act, and therefore came within the protection of section 1 of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893. He agreed with Mr. Justice Bruce.

It was said that it had not been pleaded in the defence that the defendants were acting under the direction of the county council. In his opinion it was not necessary, nor, indeed, would it be proper, to plead that fact, as it was no defence to the cause of action, but would be like a plea to damages. The appeal would therefore be dismissed.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS agreed. The Act of 1893 extended its protection not only to the principals, the public body, but also to the individuals who carried out the mandate of the public body. The only question remaining was whether the defendants acted in pursuance of a public duty under the Local Government Act, 1894. It seemed to him clear that upon the facts they did so act. The point could not be better put than it was in the judgment of Mr. Justice Bruce.

LORD JUSTICE ROMER agreed.

HANNAN'S LAKE VIEW CENTRAL (LIMITED) v.
ARMSTRONG AND CO.*

Bill of Exchange—Banker—Cheque crossed generally—Negligence—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, sec. 82.

Held, on the facts, that there was negligence on the part of the bankers disentitling them to the protection of sec. 82 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882.

Judgment was delivered in this case, which was tried before his Lordship on the 21st and 22nd inst. The facts appear sufficiently from the judgment.

Mr. C. A. Russell, Q.C., and Mr. J. Mansfield appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Rufus Isaacs, Q.C., and Mr. F. M. Abrahams for the defendants.

MR. JUSTICE KENNEDY read the following judgment:—The plaintiffs in this case are a company registered with limited liability and the defendants are bankers. On November 16, 1897, the plaintiffs' then secretary, one Henry Montgomery, paid into his private account with the defendants a cheque for £542 drawn in favour of the plaintiffs or order by the British Australian Mines Agency (Limited) under the hand of two of that company's directors and the said Henry Montgomery, who at that time was secretary of the British Australian Mines Agency (Limited) as well as of the plaintiff company. It was crossed generally, and when paid in at the defendants' bank to the private account of the said Henry Montgomery it bore the endorsement “Hannan's Lake View Central (Limited), H. Montgomery, secretary.” The name was in Montgomery's handwriting. The other words of the endorsement were stamped or typewritten by him. The defendants placed the amount to the credit of Montgomery's account, crossed the cheque specially to Brown, Janson, and Co. in order to pass it through the Clearing-house, and collected the proceeds in this way from the London and County Banking Company (Limited) upon whom the cheque had been drawn. The amount credited to his account by the defendants in respect of the cheque was drawn out by Montgomery for his own purposes in the usual way as he required it. The plaintiffs claim in this action to recover this amount from the defendants. What are the facts? I am of opinion upon the evidence adduced at the trial that Montgomery acted dishonestly and without authority in endorsing the cheque to the defendants, and that he thereby misappropriated and converted to his own use the property of the plaintiffs. It is, in my view, doubtful whether, as special provision is made in article X of the articles of association of the plaintiff company for the authorization by the board of directors of two or more of the directors and secretary to endorse any negotiable securities or instruments belonging to the company which might require endorsement in order to effect or complete the negotiation or transfer thereof or to pass the property therein, it would have been within the power of the board under article XVI., if they had purported to do so, to delegate to the secretary the endorsement of cheques. It does not appear that the board ever did expressly delegate this power. What the board did do, as I understand the effect of the evidence in regard to cheques drawn in favour of the plaintiffs by third parties, was to permit the secretary to endorse such cheques for one purpose, and for one purpose only—viz., that of his paying the same into the plaintiffs' account at the City Bank. It was the secretary's duty to pay into this account all moneys received by him for the plaintiffs, and for this purpose he was tacitly at least authorized by the directors of the plaintiff company to endorse cheques which were received by him as secretary for the plaintiffs. Endorsement in legal language in relation to negotiable instruments means endorsement completed by delivery. Montgomery was permitted to endorse, but to endorse only to the plaintiffs' own bank. It was stated in the course of the evidence before me to be a general practice of limited companies for this particular and limited purpose to permit their secretaries to endorse cheques drawn payable to the order of their employers which come into the secretaries' hands as the servants of those employers. I shall assume that, so far as endorsing cheques for the purpose of paying them in to the company's bankers, the plaintiffs cannot be allowed to deny the secretary's authority. In the present case Montgomery, in endorsing the plaintiffs' cheque to the defendants, was not so dealing with this cheque, but was fraudulently converting it to his own use; and it appears to me that the defendants, in dealing as they did with the cheque and with the proceeds of it, made themselves liable to the plaintiffs for the full amount of the cheque, unless they are protected, as the defendants contend that they are, from the plaintiffs' claim by the operation of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict., c. 61), section 82. The protection of that section is given to a banker who in good faith and without negligence receives payment of a cheque crossed generally, as this cheque was, where the customer has no title or a defective title thereto; and it is enacted by the section that in such a case the banker shall not incur any liability to the true owner of the cheque by reason only of having received such payment. Now here there is no doubt that Montgomery was a customer of the defendants; he had kept an account with them since about the middle of July, 1896. It is not suggested by the plaintiffs that the defendants in this transaction acted otherwise than in good faith or were in any way privy to Montgomery's misdoings. The only question is, Did they act without negligence? What does "without negligence" mean? It means, I take it, without want of reasonable care in reference to the interests of the true owner, the principal whose authority the customer purports to have. This view was expressed by Mr. Justice Denman in "Bissell v. Fox" (51 L.T., N.S., p. 666), and his view was approved by the Court of Appeal on appeal (53 L.T., N.S., p. 193). The true owner, the principal, in the present case, is the plaintiff company. We have to see, therefore, what were the relevant facts proved or admitted in this action with regard to this question of "negligence," as that term ought to be understood according to the judicial decision which I have just cited. This large cheque was on the face of it the property of the plaintiffs. It was an order drawn in their favour by third parties upon the London and County Bank. The defendants knew not only from the form of the endorsement when Montgomery endorsed the cheque to them, but from earlier information, that he was the plaintiffs' servant in the capacity of secretary. They knew also that the plaintiffs had a banking account of their own at another London bank. It was apparent on the face of the transaction that in endorsing the cheque to them as his bankers and for the credit of his private account Montgomery was using for himself a valuable document, which was upon its face created for the benefit of his employers. Of course it was possible that his employers had authorized Montgomery so to deal with the cheque. But the defendants had not had with Montgomery any like transaction before; it was not a transaction which would be, as I understand the evidence, a customary transaction for the secretary of a company in Montgomery's position, and the question is whether the defendants, as business men, bound to act with reasonable care towards the plaintiffs, were entitled in the circumstances to assume without inquiry (which could have been made promptly and easily) that Montgomery was authorized to endorse to the defendants as he did. Upon the whole, whilst I fully appreciate the importance of not hampering by undue restriction the free flow of banking business, I feel myself bound to hold that the defendants in this case did not act, in the words of the statute, "without negligence." I have stated already the principal considerations which move me to this conclusion, and I do not think that any useful purpose would be served by my dealing minutely or in any detail with the evidence as given at the trial. But I think that I ought not perhaps to leave unnoticed some portions of the evidence given by Mr. Bodley, the defendants' chief accountant, who was a witness called by them at the trial. It appears to me to contain some material admissions against the defendants' case upon the central question of "negligence." Mr. Bodley asserted no doubt in his view that there was no irregularity upon the face of the cheque, and nothing whatever suspicious or calling for inquiry in Montgomery's conduct in the matter, or in any previous matter; that it was quite usual to find a company's cheques endorsed by the secretary alone; that there is nothing very extraordinary in the endorsement by Montgomery of a cheque paid to the plaintiff company by third persons, but, at the same time, he admitted, in the course of his cross-examination, that he did not suggest that it was a usual thing for a company to make a payment to its secretary by endorsing to him a cheque drawn in favour of the company, and he would say that it was not a usual one; that he knew that the plaintiffs in the ordinary way paid Montgomery by drawing a cheque on its own account in his favour, as the defendants had frequently had such cheques, but he had never in his own experience had an example before of the secretary of a company paying into his private account a cheque drawn by third persons in favour of the company; and that he had never known an instance of any secretary of a limited company endorsing by himself a cheque payable to his company except for the purpose of the cheque being paid in to the company's own banking account. This was his evidence, as I understand it. One argument used by Mr. Bodley against any duty of inquiry appeared to me, if the matter should have any weight at all, to make rather the other way. "Prima facie," he said, "this cheque was his master's cheque. But in the face of the way in which the account had previously been kept I do not think this put on us the duty of inquiry. I mean there had been several other large cheques which had been drawn by the company and paid into Mr. Montgomery's account." This is true enough; but then these cheques were cheques drawn by and not in favour of the company. The inference, if any inference can properly be drawn, would rather seem to be that when the directors of the plaintiff company wanted to pay money to Montgomery they paid him by their own cheque. I think that these are the only matters in Mr. Bodley's evidence which have a substantial material bearing upon the question of negligence. A good deal was elicited from him in examination and cross-examination whilst he was in the box about matters which, as there is no suggested impeachment of the defendants' good faith, appear to me to be really immaterial. On the one hand, it was elicited from him that the defendants had no reason to suspect Montgomery's honesty and respectability; that his account since July, 1896, had been kept on the right side; on the other, that he had for some time before November, 1897, maintained the credit balance by loans from the defendants on security of shares which they realized by sale for him, and that at the date of the endorsement of this cheque his account would have been overdrawn but for the amount of this cheque being placed to his credit. I think these matters have little or no bearing upon the real issue in this case, which, as I have already said, on the facts already sufficiently referred to I feel bound to decide in favour of the plaintiffs.

Court of Appeal (Lindley, M.R.,

IN RE A. B. AND CO.*

Bankruptcy—Jurisdiction—Foreigners.

Foreigners residing out of the jurisdiction are not subject to the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.

This appeal against a decision of Mr. Registrar Linklater raised a question of importance as to the operation of the bankruptcy law upon foreigners. In the present case traders, who are citizens of the United States, reside in Baltimore, and have carried on business there. They have also carried on business in London by means of a manager, and in so doing have incurred debts in London, where they have assets of value. In December last they executed in the United States a deed by which they assigned all their property to their manager at Baltimore as a trustee for their creditors. Two English creditors presented in England a bankruptcy petition against the traders, alleging the execution of this deed as an act of bankruptcy. Section 4 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, provides that "a debtor commits an act of bankruptcy in each of the following cases (inter alia):—(a) If in England or elsewhere he makes a conveyance or assignment of his property to a trustee or trustees for the benefit of his creditors generally." And by section 6:—"A creditor shall not be entitled to present a bankruptcy petition against a debtor unless (inter alia) (d) the debtor is domiciled in England, or, within a year before the date of the presentation of the petition, has ordinarily resided or had a dwelling-house or place of business in England." The Registrar held that the debtors, being foreigners not in England, were not subject to the Act. The petitioning creditors appealed.

Mr. Herbert Reed, Q.C., and Mr. Muir Mackenzie, were for the appellants; Mr. C. A. Russell, Q.C., and Mr. Carrington, for the debtors, were not called upon.

The COURT dismissed the appeal with costs.

The MASTER of the ROLLS would not say what his view might have been but for previous decisions of the Court of Appeal which were binding on the Court. But having regard to the decision in "Ex parte Blain" (12 Ch.D., 522) and "In re Pearson" ([1892] 2 Q.B., 263) this appeal must fail. Bankruptcy was a serious matter; it had been sometimes called a statutory execution. But at any rate it altered the status of the debtor. What right had the Court to alter the status of a foreigner in the absence of express words in the Act enabling it to do so? If Parliament had in express words empowered the Court to do this of course it must do it. But the Court must not, in the absence of express words, assume that the Legislature intended it to do that which might startle foreigners and might perhaps give offence to foreign Governments. Unless the Legislature had said so in plain terms the Court ought not to do this. This was the principle of the decision in "In re Pearson." In that case the Court said that section 6 was not plain enough to override that principle. His Lordship saw the difficulty about section 6, but this Court could not overrule that decision. The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

SAME—WALSH V. SAME—ROBINSON V. SAME.*

Rating—Rateable value—Mode of assessment—
Publichouse—Evidence as to situation and business done.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (15 The Times L.R., 208) affirmed.

These were appeals, all involving the same question, from a decision of the Court of Appeal (the Lord Chancellor and Lords Justices A. L. Smith and Collins) dated February 16, 1899, affirming a judgment of the Divisional Court dated May 14, 1898. The case below is reported 15 The Times L.R., 208; L.R. [1899], 1 Q.B., 667; 68 L.J., Q.B., 455. In Cartwright's case the appellant for 19 years had been and still was the tenant and occupier of the premises known as The Star and Garter publichouse, of which the Hull Brewery Company (Limited) are the owners. The appellant held the same premises under an agreement with the Hull Brewery Company (Limited) dated February 16, 1888, determinable by either party on giving three months' notice, expiring at any time, at a yearly rent of £250. By the terms of such agreement the appellant was bound to purchase all liquors sold by him from the landlords or their nominees. The Star and Garter publichouse was a fully-licensed publichouse, situate at the corner of two streets called West Dock-avenue and Hessel-road in the city and county of Kingston-upon-Hull. In both of such streets there was a good deal of traffic passing to and fro, and the situation was a good one for the publichouse trade. Though it was built as an hotel no hotel business was carried on on the said premises. By the rate for the relief of the poor, now appealed against, which was levied on or about April 10, 1897, the appellant was rated on an assessment in respect of the said premises of £850 gross estimated rental and £680 net rateable value. The assessment immediately prior thereto was £257 net rateable value. On June 17, 1897, the appellant gave notice of appeal to the general quarter sessions of the peace for the city and county of Kingston-upon-Hull against the said rate and assessment, on the ground that he was over-rated. By an agreement dated December 18, 1897, and made (inter alia) between the appellant and the respondents, and by an order of Mr. Justice Day, the matters of the said appeal were by consent ordered to be referred to the arbitration of Walter Cranby Ryde, Esq., barrister-at-law, as arbitrator. The arbitrator, after hearing the parties and the evidence adduced by them, made his award in the form of a special case for the opinion of the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice. On the hearing before the arbitrator the respondents endeavoured to justify the assessment of £850 gross annual value and £680 net rateable value by:—(1) cross-examination of the appellant as to and evidence of his weekly takings and payments; (2) evidence of the actual number of persons observed to enter the appellant's said premises during a certain period of 14 days (during which they were under observation by the respondents) and a deduction therefrom of the amount of the annual trade done upon the said premises by the appellant; (3) valuations of the said premises on the basis that such an annual trade is done upon them and including therein the value of such trade. The arbitrator rejected the evidence of and disallowed the cross-examination of the appellant as to his weekly takings and payments, and found as a fact that:—(1) the goodwill attached to the premises so far as it consists of the personal connexion between the appellant and his customers was non-existent, or, if existent, of inappreciable value; (2) the personal qualities and capacity for business or management possessed by the appellant had no effect on the trade done or the profits made in the said premises. The arbitrator further held that in fixing the amount of the assessment of the appellant's said premises it was lawful and proper to take into account:—(a) the value of the trade already done there; (b) the value of the goodwill attached to the said premises so far as it consists of the probability that the customers now resorting to the said premises will continue to do so whether the appellant continues to occupy the said premises or not. This decision was affirmed by the Court of Appeal. The appellant contended that the order of the Court of Appeal ought to be reversed or varied for the following among other reasons:—Because the said publichouse should be valued without reference to the goodwill and the trade already done there; because the arbitrator had in arriving at his valuation wrongly taken into account the goodwill of, and the trade done at, the said publichouse, and wrongly admitted evidence thereof; because the arbitrator had in fact in arriving at his valuation wrongly taken into account the personal capacity and skill of the appellant, and had not considered solely the value of the hereditaments; because on the facts found by the arbitrator the said publichouse was not exceptional, or in exceptional circumstances, so as to make the ordinary principles of assessment inapplicable.

*Reported by W. L. CABELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

*Reported by J. EYRE THOMPSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. Balfour Browne, Q.C., and Mr. H. S. Cautley were for the appellants; Mr. Bray, Q.C., and Mr. R. Cunningham Glen for the respondents.

LORD MACNAGHTEN, in moving that the appeal be dismissed, said that, speaking generally, he might say the question was one of common sense and not of law. Having regard to the plain language of the Act of Parliament their Lordships had to consider whether the arbitrator proceeded on the lines laid down in the statute. He had to inquire into what was to be done in the particular case. He was to exclude any inquiry into profits; and he was right in so doing—not that the profits would not be an element in arriving at the amount of assessment, but because inquiry into profits was, if possible, to be avoided. There was nothing a tradesman so much disliked as such an investigation. What the arbitrator had done was to take into consideration the amount of business of the publichouse. Was he wrong in that? Surely not. He was bound to do so—accurately, if he could, roughly if he could not do so with precision. The first thing the man in the street would do—if such an expression were allowable—would be to do that which the arbitrator had done. The judgment of the Court of Appeal was perfectly right.

LORD MORRIS concurred, and observed that the Act of Parliament lent no countenance to the distinction which had been set up between exceptional and ordinary cases. It only required the ascertainment of what would be a reasonable rent. A great deal of artificial language had been employed about the hypothetical tenant; but the question itself was a simple one, although no doubt the process might be different in the case of a great undertaking like a railway and of premises belonging to individuals.

LORD SHAND briefly expressed concurrence.

LORD DAVEY, being of the same opinion, demurred to the distinction drawn between exceptional and ordinary cases being elevated into a principle of law, and denied that the authorities relied upon were intended to establish any new principle of evidence.

LORD BRAMPTON and LORD ROBERTSON concurred in the judgment proposed, and the appeal was dismissed.

The other appeals were also dismissed.

MARLBOROUGH V. BALL.*

Animal—Animal feræ naturæ—Duty to keep secure—Accident caused by action of person injured.

This was an application by the defendant for judgment or a new trial in an action tried before Mr. Justice Phillimore and a special jury at Manchester. The action was brought to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff through being bitten by a zebra belonging to the defendant. The plaintiff was a working man. The defendant was the proprietor of the Chadderton-hall pleasure-grounds, at Oldham, where he kept an exhibition of wild animals. The plaintiff went with his wife and his brother-in-law to see the exhibition, and, having paid for admission, entered the gardens. While they were walking along they found the door of a stable standing open, and went in. There were four zebras inside the stable, each in a separate stall and properly tied up by a halter to the manger. The plaintiff went up to one of the zebras and stroked it. The animal kicked out, and the plaintiff being then standing against the partition, the animal pressed him through the partition, and he fell into the next stall, where another zebra bit his hand, which had to be amputated. At the trial the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff for £175.

Mr. MONTAGUE LUSH, for the defendant, in support of the application for judgment or a new trial, contended that there was no evidence on which the defendant could be held liable. The common law obligation of a person who kept animals feræ naturæ was to keep them secure, or, in other words, to prevent them from getting loose. He was liable to an action, if, in consequence of a failure on his part to comply with that obligation, any other person was injured. In such a case it was not necessary for the plaintiff to allege negligence. But in this case there had been no failure to comply with that common law obligation. Here the animals were kept secure, they were not loose. The plaintiff, therefore, had to allege negligence, and the alleged negligence appeared to be this—that the defendant did not provide a keeper, or some physical barrier to prevent people from meddling with the animals. But this allegation did not show a cause of action at all. There was no authority for saying that an action lay for not preventing the plaintiff from bringing an injury on himself. It was not sufficient for the plaintiff here to show that the door was open. The door being open might be an invitation to go in, but it was not an invitation to meddle by stroking the zebras. The plaintiff failed to show any negligence on the part of the defendant, and he had no remedy. Counsel referred to "Filburn v. the People's Palace and Aquarium Company (Limited)" (25 Q.B.D., 258); and "Memberz v. the Great Western Railway Company" (14 App. Cas., 179).

Mr. S. T. EVANS, for the plaintiff, said the foundation of the action was that zebras were dangerous animals, and it was the duty of persons who kept dangerous animals to prevent them from doing injury. The leaving the door of the stable unlocked was a default on the part of the defendant. The plaintiff was not in any way warned that these zebras were wild animals. The evidence taken altogether showed that these zebras were kept in much the same way as horses would ordinarily be kept. He referred to "May v. Burdett" (9 Q.B., 101).

The COURT allowed the application and ordered judgment to be entered for the defendant.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said it was conceded that a zebra was a dangerous animal, and that by law a man who kept a dangerous animal must do so at his peril, and that if any damage resulted, then, apart from any question of negligence, he was liable for the damage. But that was subject to this—that the person who complained of damage must not have brought the injury on himself. Where the plaintiff did something which he had no business to do—e.g., by meddling, as the plaintiff in this case had done—then the defendant was not liable. That was common law, and it was also common sense. In "Filburn v. the People's Palace (Limited)" Lord Esher expressly dealt with this point. He there said:—"It cannot possibly be said that an elephant comes within the class of animals known to be harmless by nature, or within that shown by experience to be harmless in this country, and consequently it falls within the class of animals that a man keeps at his peril, and which he must prevent from doing injury under any circumstances, unless the person to whom the injury is done brings it on himself." The action, therefore, could not be maintained on the common law liability. The plaintiff then set up a claim for negligence—viz., that the door was not kept locked, and that there was no keeper at hand. The evidence showed that the door had been shut, but had got opened. If the plaintiff had been kicked while walking along the stable an action might have lain, but the plaintiff went into the stall and meddled with the animal. Even if the fact of the door being open was an invitation to go into the stable, it was not an invitation to stroke the animals. In his opinion there was no evidence to go to the jury, and judgment must be entered for the defendant.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS said the plaintiff's case was put on the footing of these zebras being wild animals. The duty of a person who owned a wild animal, as laid down in "May v. Burdett," was to keep it secure at his peril. The evidence in this case all went to show that these animals were kept secure within the meaning of that case. In his opinion there was no evidence of any invitation to go and tamper with the animals.

LORD JUSTICE ROMER concurred.

Mr. MONTAGUE LUSH said the defendant would not ask for the costs either of the action or the appeal.

BEAL AND MYRTLE V. CARTER.*

Contract—Agreement—Construction—Land Agents—Finding a purchaser—Commission.

This was an action brought by Messrs. Beal and Myrtle, the plaintiffs, against Mr. Edward James Carter, the defendant, both of whom are auctioneers and land agents, to recover one-half of a commission of £144 received by the defendant in respect of the sale of a freehold property called Fairlight, in Kent.

Mr. Corrie Grant appeared for the plaintiffs; and Mr. Dickens, Q.C., and Mr. G. F. Hohler for the defendant.

On February 25, 1898, the plaintiffs wrote to the defendant as follows:—"We are seeking an unfurnished house in Sussex for Mr. Goddard, to contain three reception-rooms, eight bed-rooms, bath-room, stabling, and from ten to 15 acres of land. Can you send us particulars of anything suitable? We presume you will divide commission with us as usual." In reply the defendant wrote:—"I am obliged to you for your letter of yesterday, and in reply beg to send you herewith particulars of a property I have just been instructed to let at Forest Row, known as Stone-house Park. The accommodation, &c., seems to be just what your client requires, and I need hardly say I hope he will take an opportunity of seeing the place, and in the event of business ensuing I shall be only too pleased to share with you my commission." The negotiations which ensued with regard to Stone-house Park fell through. Negotiations were afterwards entered into between Mr. Goddard and the defendant on behalf of Mr. Trumble, the owner of Fairlight, which resulted in a contract for the sale of that property to Mr. Goddard. The contract was signed by the defendant, purporting to act for Mr. Trumble, but, upon an action for specific performance of the contract being brought by Mr. Goddard, Mr. Trumble pleaded that the defendant, Mr. Carter, had no authority to make the contract on his behalf, and the action was therefore abandoned. Mr. Carter, nevertheless, brought an action against Mr. Trumble for his commission, which was settled before it came on for hearing, Mr. Trumble paying the full amount claimed (£144) and costs.

Mr. DICKENS, Q.C., on behalf of the defendant, contended that the agreement to pay half commission was limited to commission paid in respect of Stone-house Park, and that negotiations with regard to that property having fallen through, and no commission having become payable in respect of it, the plaintiffs' action failed. He contended further that, even if the agreement extended to other properties, the half commission was only payable in the event of business being transacted between one of the defendant's clients and Mr. Goddard.

MR. JUSTICE PHILLIMORE, in giving judgment, was of opinion that, under the agreement between the parties, half of any commission was payable to the plaintiffs which was earned by the defendant in consequence of the introduction of Mr. Goddard to the defendant. His Lordship did not understand why Mr. Trumble paid the commission under the circumstances, but, as he had paid it, it did not lie in the defendant's mouth to say that the commission was not paid in consequence of the introduction of Mr. Goddard. There would therefore be judgment for the plaintiffs for the amount claimed, less £13 12s. 8d., being half the excess costs paid by the defendant to his solicitor in the action brought against Mr. Trumble.

H.M.S. SANSPAREIL.*

Ship—Collision—Regulations for preventing collisions—Her Majesty's battleships—Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, sec. 419 (4).

The fact that the regulations with respect to the navigation of her Majesty's ships are not made under the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, may, in cases of collision between such a ship and a vessel to which the regulations made thereunder apply, affect in some respects the statutory liability imposed on the latter vessel by sec. 419 (4) of the Act.

Judgment was given in this case, which was heard on February 8 (reported in The Times for February 9), and further argued on February 21 (reported in The Times for February 22). The facts of the case and the nature of the arguments appear fully in the judgment.

Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. Scrutton appeared for the plaintiffs; and the Attorney-General and Mr. R. B. D. Acland for the defendant.

MR. JUSTICE GORELL BARNES, in delivering a written judgment, said:—This action arises out of a collision which took place on August 7, 1899, between the plaintiffs' vessel, the East Lothian, and her Majesty's battleship Sanspareil some miles to the southward of the Wolf rock, whereby the East Lothian was sunk. The East Lothian was proceeding in tow of the tug Sir W. T. Lewis on a voyage from Nantes to Cardiff in ballast. The tug and tow were on a course of N. 9° E., and were proceeding at a speed of about six knots. The wind was about south-east and the vessel had some sail set. The tug was exhibiting the usual lights for a tug having a vessel in tow, that is to say, two bright lights in a vertical line one over the other at a distance of six feet apart, the regulation side lights, and a white light abaft the mainmast for the sailing vessel to steer by. This last light, according to the regulations, ought not to have been visible forward of the beam, but in fact it showed to some extent forward of the beam. The East Lothian had the regulation side lights and stern light. The Sanspareil was one of a large fleet of 30 ships of war proceeding up Channel. She and the other vessels were proceeding on the same course, S. 72° E., at a speed of about ten knots, and were in the following formation:—The ships were in four lines. The distance between each line was about eight cables and the distance from the bow of one vessel to the bow of the vessel behind her was about two cables. The outer lines were formed by cruisers and the inner by battleships. The Sanspareil was the leading ship of the more southerly line of battleships. She had all the lights prescribed by the Queen's Regulations burning. Those on board the East Lothian and the Sir W. T. Lewis made out the lights of the fleet at a distance of about six miles and broad on the port bow. At first the lights were taken to be those of a cluster of fishermen, but as the tug and tow drew nearer the lights were observed to be the electric lights of the fleet. The tug and tow kept their course and speed and crossed ahead of the southernmost line of cruisers. As they drew near to the Sanspareil the helm of that vessel was ported to pass under the stern of the tug, but the defendant, who was navigating the Sanspareil, being under the impression that the tug was a steamer proceeding alone, ordered the helm of the Sanspareil to be starboarded as soon as the Sanspareil was in a position to pass clear of the tug, and this was done. Shortly afterwards the defendant observed the red light of the East Lothian, and the engines of the Sanspareil were put full speed astern, but she ran into the East Lothian and sank her. This action was afterwards brought by the owners of the East Lothian against the defendant, Lieutenant Potter, to recover for the damage sustained by them. At the hearing of the case the Attorney-General, who appeared for the defendant, raised no technical defences, but treated the case as one tried in the ordinary way between the owners of two vessels. He conceded that the helm of the Sanspareil had been improperly starboarded in the circumstances. This, in effect, means that the Sanspareil could have passed under the stern of the East Lothian. The Attorney-General, however, contended that the plaintiffs' vessel must also be held to blame on two grounds. The first was that the tug infringed the regulations by exhibiting a light to guide the vessel astern, which showed forward of the beam instead of only abaft the beam. The second was that the tug and tow infringed the regulations by standing on across the track of the fleet. With regard to the first point, the rule as to the exhibition of a light to a vessel in tow is contained in the second clause of Article 3 of the regulations for preventing collisions at sea, made in the year 1897 by virtue of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894. This clause is as follows:—"Such steam vessel [that is, a tug] may carry a small white light abaft the funnel or aftermast for the vessel towed to steer by, but such light shall not be visible forward of the beam." There is no doubt that there was an infringement of this rule by the tug, and that this would affect the tow as much as the tug. The Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (57 and 58 Victoria, cap. 60), section 419 (4), provides that "where in a case of collision it is proved to the Court before which the case is tried that any of the collision regulations have been infringed, the ship by which the regulation has been infringed shall be deemed to be in fault, unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the Court that the circumstances of the case made departure from the regulations necessary." But it has been held that if the infringement of a rule could by no possibility have contributed to a collision the infringement will not be a ground for holding the vessel infringing the rule to blame. See "The Fanny M. Carvill" (13 App.Cas., 455) and "The Duke of Buccleuch" (A.C. [1891], 310). It was urged by the plaintiffs' counsel that the infringement in this case could not by any possibility have contributed to the collision in question. This was disputed by the Attorney-General. The facts bearing upon this point disclosed by the evidence appear to be these. The two towing lights forward, the white light aft, and the red light on the tug and the red side light on the East Lothian could be seen from the Sanspareil from her position forward of the beam of the tug. The defendant stated that he only noticed one white light forward, one white light aft, and the red light on the tug, and that he took the white light aft to be the second light, which a steamer of a certain size may carry under Article 2 (c), and that, therefore, the tug was considered to be a steamer proceeding alone. I cannot understand this statement, because if one light forward was noticed the other one forward ought to have been noticed too, and the small white light aft was an inferior light to the light which is referred to in Article 2 (c). The latter should show at least five miles. I understand that he did not see the red light of the East Lothian nor hear any report of the lights before the order to starboard was given. There was no evidence as to what reports, if any, were made, and, owing to the course which the case has taken, it is not necessary for the Court to determine on what person on board the Sanspareil the blame rests. Upon these facts the question for consideration is peculiarly one for the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House, who have heard this case as assessors with me, to form an opinion upon. They advise me that in their opinion the fact that the white light aft on the tug was visible before the beam of the tug could by no possibility have contributed to the collision. Whether the white light aft on the tug was visible from before her beam or not, the other lights on the tug and tow should have shown unmistakably that they were a tug and her tow. Even if the red light of the tow were not noticed at first, the two towing lights forward on the tug were plainly visible, and would indicate that she had a vessel in tow, whether the white light aft could or could not be seen. Moreover, there is nothing unusual in a tug showing to another vessel in certain positions her two white lights forward, her side light, and her white light aft, for the first three are to show as far as two points abaft the beam and the last may show from aft to abeam, and thus over two points of the circle on each side the lights overlap. Further, the small white light aft is, as I have already noticed, a different light from the light mentioned in Article 2 (c). The defendant says that he concluded it was a steamer proceeding alone by only noticing one white light forward and one aft besides the red light. I have already commented on this, and it is to be observed, further, that if he only noticed one light forward and no light had been visible aft the reason which he gave for concluding that the tug was a steamer proceeding alone shows that in this case also he would have concluded that the tug was a steamer proceeding alone, so that the fact that the white light aft was to some extent visible before the beam of the tug really made no difference whatever in the case. The second point raises a question of very considerable importance. It was contended by the Attorney-General that the tug and tow ought not to have continued their course and speed across the course of the fleet, but should either have waited till the fleet had passed across their bows or starboarded their helms and gone under the stern of the fleet, and that in continuing their course and speed they were guilty in the circumstances of an infringement of the said regulations. The particular rules referred to were Articles 19, 21, 27, and 29. These are as follows:—"Article 19.—When two steam vessels are crossing, so as to involve risk of collision, the vessel which has the other on her own starboard side shall keep out of the way of the other." "Article 21.—Where by any of these rules one of two vessels is to keep out of the way the other shall keep her course and speed. Note.—When, in consequence of thick weather or other causes, such vessel finds herself so close that collision cannot be avoided by the action of the giving-way vessel alone, she also shall take such action as will best aid to avert collision (see Articles 27 and 29)." "Article 27.—In obeying and construing these rules, due regard shall be had to all dangers of navigation and collision, and to any special circumstances which may render a departure from the above rules necessary in order to avoid immediate danger." "Article 29.—Nothing in these rules shall exonerate any vessel, or the owner, or master, or crew thereof, from the consequences of any neglect to carry lights or signals, or of any neglect to keep a proper look-out, or of the neglect of any precaution which may be required by the ordinary practice of seamen, or by the special circumstances of the case." The substance of the argument was that, although if the Sanspareil had been navigating alone, having the tug and tow crossing her course from starboard to port, she should keep out of the way of the tug and tow, and they should keep their course and speed, unless and until they might be compelled to take action as contemplated by the note to Article 21, yet that, where the Sanspareil was one of a fleet crossing the course of the tug and tow in the formation described above, Article 27 applied, and Article 21 ought to have been departed from by the tug and tow, because, owing to the difficulties which the vessels composing the fleet would have in the circumstances in navigating for a tug and tow coming in amongst them and crossing their course, and in avoiding collision with one another in doing so, due regard was not had by those in charge of the tug and tow to the dangers of navigation and collision and the special circumstances which, it was contended, rendered a departure from the rules necessary in order to avoid immediate danger. It was also contended that Article 29 applied for practically the same reason, but, as this rule does not impose any obligation and merely provides that nothing in the rules shall exonerate any vessel, or the owner, or master, or crew thereof, from the consequences of any neglect to observe certain proper precautions, this contention was not really pressed. The objections to the argument were that the articles in question do not apply so as to render the plaintiffs' vessel subject to the statutory consequences imposed by section 419 (4) of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, and that the tug and tow were not guilty of contributory negligence, and that there was no infringement of Article 27 by the tug and tow in the circumstances—that is to say, that they were right in keeping their course and speed and that there was nothing in the circumstances which rendered it improper or negligent for them to do so, or to render it necessary for them to act as suggested by the Attorney-General. First, with regard to the law applicable to the case. The regulations for preventing collisions at sea, of which the articles above referred to form part, were made by Order in Council in 1897 by virtue of section 418 of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1894, which provides that regulations so made shall have effect as if enacted in that Act, and also applies them, together with the provisions of the Act relating thereto, or otherwise relating to collisions, to all foreign ships within British jurisdiction, and they and the said provisions of the Act may by section 424 be applied by Order in Council to the ships of any country when beyond the limits of British jurisdiction if the Government of such country is willing that they should be so applied; but section 741 of the Act enacts that the Act shall not, except where specially provided, apply to ships belonging to her Majesty, and there is no special provision in the Act providing that the regulations for preventing collisions at sea are to apply to such ships. There are, however, precisely similar regulations, made in June, 1899, for her Majesty's ships by Order in Council, and these are set out in the Queen's Regulations and Admiralty instructions. These are not made by virtue of the said Act of 1894, but they are word for word the same as those made under that Act, and there are, as I understand, in addition certain special regulations for her Majesty's ships with regard to certain special lights and signals, to be used by them only. Article 13 of the regulations of 1897 contemplates such special regulations being made. The result is that, as the regulations for preventing collisions at sea (except the special regulations just referred to) are similar for her Majesty's ships and for other vessels, for all practical purposes the navigation of all vessels upon the high seas and in all waters connected therewith by navigable by seagoing vessels must be conducted as if the same regulations applied to them. This is the only reasonable way to treat the matter. In my opinion, however, the fact that the regulations made with respect to her Majesty's ships are not made under and by virtue of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, may, in cases of collision between such a ship and a vessel to which the regulations of 1897 apply, affect in some respects the statutory liability imposed on the latter vessel by section 419 (4) of the said Act. This observation does not apply to most of the regulations which have to be obeyed. For instance, an infringement by the tug in this case of the rule with regard to lights, would, as I have already pointed out, be visited by the statutory penalty unless it could by no possibility have contributed to the collision. Such a breach is not affected by the observance or non-observance by the other vessel of the regulations applicable to her. But I find a difficulty in applying the statutory penalty in cases of collision between a merchant vessel and one of her Majesty's ships, where the infringement by the former, which is complained of, is an infringement of the 27th combined with the 21st Article. This arises from the language of these rules, and may be pointed out by dealing with the present case. In navigating for each other in the circumstances of this case and acting on similar regulations, the Sanspareil would have to keep out of the way (Article 19) and the East Lothian and her tug to keep their course and speed (Article 21), subject to the effect to be given to the note to Article 21 and to Article 27, and it follows from what I have remarked above that it would be neglect of good seamanship and navigation to do otherwise, and if such neglect caused or contributed to the collision, the vessel infringing the regulations would clearly be held to blame. If, however, a breach of Article 27, combined with Article 21, by the East Lothian and her tug did not, in fact, contribute to the collision, though by possibility it might have done so, then to fix the East Lothian with blame it is necessary to rely on the statutory penalty imposed by the said section 419 (4) of the Act of 1894, and to consider strictly whether any of the collision regulations referred to in that section have been infringed by her or her tug. Now, in my opinion, the collision regulations referred to in that section are only those made by virtue of the Act, which, according to section 418, are to have effect as if enacted in the Act, and, as already noticed, the Act does not apply to her Majesty's ships. The Sanspareil, in fulfilling a duty to keep out of the way, would, strictly speaking, be acting under Article 19 of the Queen's Regulations, and not under the corresponding article of the regulations made under the Act of 1894, and, strictly speaking, the duty of the East Lothian and her tug to keep their course and speed according to Article 21 of the latter regulations was only "where, by one of these rules," the other vessel is to keep out of her way. "One of these rules" must as a matter of construction mean one of the regulations made under the said Act of 1894, and Article 27 thereof only strictly applies to the obeying and construing of the same rules. It appears to me necessarily to follow that the statutory provisions of the said section 419 (4) could not apply in the present case, even if the East Lothian and her tug did not act in accordance with Article 27. There was a further point taken by the plaintiffs with regard to the meaning of Article 27 of the regulations of 1897. It is this—that that article does not impose an obligation which can be infringed, but is to be considered solely as in exoneration of the strict duties imposed by the other articles. I am not able to agree with this view entirely. It seems to me that there is an express obligation in obeying and construing the rules to use due regard to the circumstances mentioned in the article. At the same time it is difficult to conceive a case in which there could be a finding of want of such due regard, unless it in fact contributed to the collision. So that I fail to see how there can be an infringement of Article 27 unless there has been default under it which contributes to a collision. For these reasons I am of opinion that in order to establish liability on the part of the plaintiffs for the collision in this case, it is necessary to show that there has been default on the part of the East Lothian or her tug under Articles 21 and 27 which, in fact, contributed to the collision. Even if the tug and tow were wrong in the circumstances in proceeding at full speed on the course they were on at first, it is clear that the Sanspareil could, by the exercise of reasonable care, have avoided the collision without any difficulty, and, according to well-known principles, which are stated in a convenient form in Mr. Marsden's book on the "Law of Collisions at Sea," page 25, the plaintiffs can recover in this case. I might leave the case there, but I think it desirable to express the view which the Court has arrived at with regard to the important question as to whether the tug and tow were right or wrong, as a matter of navigation, having regard to the terms of Article 27, in proceeding as they did in the circumstances. The argument of the Attorney-General upon this point was supported by a reference to the following notice to shipowners and masters, which has been issued by the Board of Trade for some time, though the masters of the tug and tow stated that they were not aware of it. His Lordship then read the notice, which warns masters of single ships to take timely measures to keep out of the way of, and avoid passing through, a squadron of warships, and continued,—The Attorney-General did not rely upon this notice as having any binding effect such as the regulations have, but as supporting his contention that for a single ship to stand on in amongst a squadron was for her to run into such danger that she should be held guilty of an infringement of Article 27 by so doing. There may possibly be cases in which, if a vessel were to keep her course and speed through a squadron of war-vessels, which ought prima facie to keep out of her way, it would be impossible or impracticable for them to manœuvre so as to keep out of her way without some or one of them either colliding with her or with some other vessel or vessels of the squadron, and in such a case the single vessel may be required to take action to avoid the danger, either by acting according to the note to Article 21 or in accordance with the provisions of Article 27. But there is at present no regulation dealing in express terms with the case of a single ship approaching a squadron of war-vessels. The general regulations for all crossing steam vessels is that the vessel which has the other on her starboard hand must keep out of the way of the other, and that the other vessel must keep her course and speed unless the circumstances referred to in the note to Article 21 or in Article 27 require her to act differently. It is necessary to consider the particular circumstances of each case. I have therefore taken the opinion of the Elder Brethren upon this point, having regard to the facts of the case, which I have set forth at the commencement of this judgment. Their opinion is that the position and movements of the fleet did not constitute such a danger of navigation or collision, or such circumstances as to render it necessary for the tug and tow to wait till the fleet had passed or to starboard and go under the stern of the fleet; in other words, they do not consider that the tug and tow acted improperly in this case in proceeding as they did, and that the Sanspareil and the other vessels of the fleet could without difficulty or danger, though possibly not without some inconvenience, have avoided them. All the vessels, except the Sanspareil, in fact did so, and the Sanspareil would have done so without any difficulty if her helm had not been star-boarded until she was in a position to pass under the stern of the East Lothian. For these reasons I am of opinion that the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment.

His LORDSHIP subsequently, at the request of the Attorney-General, stayed the reference to the registrar, assisted by merchants, to assess the damages, pending an appeal, provided that notice of appeal were given within three weeks.

DURANT V. ROBERTS AND KEIGHLEY, MAXSTED, AND CO.*

Principal and Agent—Undisclosed principal—Liability.

A contract made by a person in his own name, not purporting to make it on behalf of a principal, but intending to act for another in making it, though without authority from him, can be ratified by that other person even though the intending agent did not disclose to the other party at the time of making the contract that he was acting for some one else.

This was an application by the plaintiffs for a new trial of an action tried before Mr. Justice Day and a jury. The action was brought by the sellers of wheat to recover damages from the purchasers for breach of contract in failing to take delivery. The contract with the plaintiffs had been made by the defendant Roberts, and the plaintiffs alleged that the defendant Roberts, in making the contract, had acted as agent for the defendants Keighley, Maxsted, and Co. The case raised a question of law as to the ratification by a principal of a contract made by an agent. So far as regards this question of law, it must be taken that Roberts had authority from Keighley, Maxsted, and Co. to make a contract for them, but that in making this contract he exceeded their authority as to price; that he, nevertheless, made the contract in the hope that they would ratify what he had done; that he did not communicate to the plaintiffs the fact that he was acting for any principal; and that Keighley, Maxsted, and Co. afterwards expressed their willingness to affirm the contract which he had made. The question was whether a contract made under such circumstances, that is to say, made in his own name by one who in fact has no authority from any principal to make it, but who intends at the time to apply afterwards to a particular person to ratify it, can in law be afterwards ratified by that person. At the trial the learned Judge answered this question in the negative, and directed that judgment should be entered for the defendants.

Mr. Robson, Q.C., and Mr. Scrutton appeared for the plaintiffs in support of the application for a new trial; Mr. Carver, Q.C., and Mr. Danckwerts, Q.C., appeared for the defendants Keighley, Maxsted, and Co.

The COURT, having taken time to consider, gave judgment allowing the application and granting a new trial, Lord Justice A. L. Smith dissenting.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH delivered a written judgment, in the course of which he said:—The question in this case is whether a contract made by a principal with what I will call an unauthorized agent in the latter's name, which contract does not purport or profess to be made by the unauthorized agent on behalf of any one excepting himself, and as regards which contract he has not when he made it assumed to be acting on behalf of any one excepting himself, is capable of being ratified by a stranger if it be shown that the unauthorized agent had at the time he made the contract the undeclared intention in his own mind of making the contract for a person who had never authorized him to make it. It was said by the learned counsel for the appellants that this question had never been decided, and that the law was that, if an unauthorized agent—i.e., any one—had in his own mind, when he entered into a contract with another, the undeclared intention of making it on behalf of himself and of some other person, or of some other person alone, that other person could ratify the act of the unauthorized agent and become as if he had been a party to the contract ab initio. It struck me, when I heard this proposition put forward by the appellants' counsel, that it was not in accord with my recollection of the law; for I thought it had been long ago well engrained into the law that a stranger in such circumstances could not ratify, and, having had my memory refreshed at great length by the cases upon the subject, I find that my recollection has not played me false. It will be seen hereafter that very learned Judges over and over again have stated the law as regards ratification to be that, unless the contract made by the unauthorized agent purports or professes (which in my judgment is the same thing) to have been entered into on behalf of another, or the unauthorized agent, when he made the contract, assumed to be making it on behalf of another, then the contract made by the unauthorized agent is not capable of being ratified by a stranger to it; for to be capable of being ratified the contract must purport or profess to have been entered into by the unauthorized agent on behalf of another, or the agent must have assumed by what he did when he entered into the contract to have been acting on behalf of some person who afterwards proposes to ratify. I find that every learned Judge who has dealt with the question during the last three-quarters of a century has affirmed the doctrine of ratification to be as above stated, with a most remarkable unanimity of opinion, and there is only one solitary instance to the contrary to be found in the books—viz., the judgment of Lord Chief Justice Cockburn in the case of "Matheson v. Kilburn," mentioned in the notes to "Armory v. Delamirie," in "Smith's Leading Cases," Vol. I. There Lord Cairns and Lord Justice Brett differed from the Lord Chief Justice, and, in my opinion, decided the point now raised in this case adversely to the appellants. I find that my brothers Collins and Romer are of opinion that this doctrine of ratification has never yet been decided, and they think that it is therefore necessary to begin ab ovo, and go back to the Roman law and other ancient works to try and ascertain what is or ought to be the law upon the subject and to see whether what all the learned Judges (with the one exception) have been saying throughout the last century is correct or not. His Lordship then dealt with the English authorities and the text-books, and continued,—It will be seen that every one of the learned Judges whose judgments I have cited from, when dealing with the question of ratification, have always used the following expressions as to when a contract made by an unauthorized agent is capable of being ratified by a stranger. The contract must (a) have "professed" to have been made on behalf of another; (b) have "purported" to have been made on behalf of another; (c) have been made on behalf of another; (d) have been made in the name of another; or (e) the agent must have "assumed to act on behalf of another"; every one of which expressions, in my judgment, is wholly inconsistent with an unauthorized agent keeping locked up in his own mind a mere undeclared intention that another shall afterwards participate in the contract. In my judgment upon this doctrine of ratification the law has been settled for years. If I were to accede to the appellants' contention, I should have to differ and disagree with Lord Wensleydale in the House of Lords, with the Exchequer Chamber—which I could not do, if I desired to do so, which I do not—with the Court of Appeal, consisting of Lord Cairns, Lord Chief Justice Cockburn, and Lord Justice Brett—to which the same remark applies—with the full Court of Common Pleas presided over by Lord Chief Justice Tindal, with the full Court of the Exchequer presided over by Baron Rolfe, and then with Baron Park, before he went to the House of Lords, Mr. Justice Holroyd, Chief Justice Erle, Mr. Justice Willes, Mr. Justice Blackburn, Baron Wilde, Baron Martin, Baron Amphlett, and last, but not least, Lord Justice Bowen. With all submission to my learned brothers who disagree with me, I think even if I had the courage to try to differ with all these very learned Judges, which I have not, it would not only be useless, but it would be most mischievous at this date to try to overturn what for years has been laid down as law by these most eminent Judges without a single discordant voice, with the exception of Lord Chief Justice Cockburn's, and in my judgment, for the reasons above, this appeal should be dismissed. As my brothers, however, disagree with me, the action must go down for a new trial.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS read the following judgment:—The question raised by this appeal is whether a contract made by a person in his own name, but intending to act for another in making it, though without authority from him, can be ratified by that other person, unless the intending agent disclosed to the other party at the time of making the contract that he was acting for some one else. Roberts, the intending agent in this case, did not disclose to Durant, the seller, that he was acting otherwise than for himself, and Mr. Justice Day appears to have held that such non-disclosure rendered the contract incapable of ratification by the other defendants. In other words, that there can be no ratification by an undisclosed principal—I mean undisclosed in the sense that the existence of a principal has not been disclosed at the time of making the contract. This being the ground of decision, it is immaterial to consider whether there would be any difference as to the possibility of ratification where the intending agent who contracts as principal knows that he has no authority or that he is [exceeding a given authority, and the case where he is under a mistaken belief that he has authority, since the right of ratification is negatived in either case. For reasons which I will give more in detail later on, I think the point has never been actually decided, though there are numerous dicta upon it, which have become the foundation of statements in text-books more or less adverse to the appellants' contention; but it is raised now for actual decision, and I think it cannot be satisfactorily determined without examining how far these dicta are consonant with principle, and if not, whether they have been acted upon for so long as to render it undesirable for this Court, at all events, to interfere with them. It is clear law that an act done or a contract made by a person stating that he is acting for another, but without authority, can be ratified by that other. What, then, is the essence of this right to ratify? Does it depend on the intention with which the act was done by the would-be agent, of which what he says at the time is merely evidence, or is the open avowal of the fact by him, not merely evidence, but itself an essential condition of the right to ratify? Ratification is equivalent to a prior command, and, as between the would-be agent and the person ratifying, it can make no possible difference whether the former has avowed his intention or not. His command, had it been given beforehand, would have been equally effectually carried out whether the agent had contracted in his own name or in terms on behalf of the principal. The intention to contract for the principal must certainly exist in the mind of the agent, since in our law the act of a mere stranger cannot be ratified. That would be, not ratification, but adoption, which our law does not admit. But, given intention existing in the mind of the would-be agent, it seems impossible to suggest any reason why from the standpoint of the agent and the ratifier avowal of it to the other contracting party should be essential, unless the rights of the principal against the other contracting party are affected by it. It would seem, then, that the reason, if any, must be sought in some difference caused to the other contracting party by reason of the non-disclosure. But where the law admits, as our law does admit, a person who has authorized another to make a contract on his behalf to sue and be sued upon it, although he is not named in the contract and his agent contracts as principal without disclosing that he has a principal, every person who makes a contract with another (excluding, of course, certain special personal contracts) must be taken to know that he may have to deal with some other person on whose behalf the contract is made. He cannot complain, therefore, of non-disclosure. He loses nothing, and gains an option of suing either the party named in his contract or the principal behind him. Indeed, any ground of supposed alteration of the position of the other contracting party that might be urged in support of the view that disclosure as well as intention on the part of the agent is necessary is succinctly disposed of by Baron Rolfe in a well-known passage in delivering the judgment of the Court in "Bird v. Brown" (4 Exch., at p. 798), a passage other parts of which are usually relied on in support of the necessity of disclosure by the agent. He says:—"If A. B. unauthorized by me makes a contract on my behalf with J. S., which I afterwards recognize and adopt, there is no difficulty in dealing with it as having been originally made by my authority. J. S. entered into the contract on the understanding that he was dealing with me, and when I afterwards agreed to admit that such was the case J. S. is precisely in the condition in which he meant to be, or, if he did not believe A. B. to be acting for me, his condition is not altered by the adoption of the agency, for he may sue A. B. as principal at his option, and has the same equities against me if I sue which he would have had against A. B." It would seem, then, that neither from the point of view of the ratifier or of the other party to the contract is there any solid reason why disclosure by the would-be agent should be essential. But it has been suggested that the nature of ratification itself presupposes a contract purporting to bind the ratifier. I can find no such limitation in the word. I think it does involve the idea of something which was intended to be done on behalf of the ratifier, and which needs nothing but confirmation, not to create it ab initio, but merely to give it validity. It does not involve the existence of a contract stating anything more on its face than would have been necessary if there had been actual prior authority. Is there anything in the word "ratification" itself to make it inapplicable to a case where an agent, believing he has authority, has made a contract intending to do it for a principal but in his own name and without disclosing that he is agent? It is clear law that a contract may be ratified by a person unknown to the would-be agent himself, who contracting in his own name discloses the fact that he is acting for another. It cannot be contended, therefore, that it is essential to ratification that all the terms of the contract (in cases of contract) should have been already expressed either by words or in writing. This shows that what is essential is what is intended, and not what is expressed, and, so long as the form is capable of covering what was really intended, there is nothing in the nature of ratification itself to make it inapplicable to such a case. The doctrine of ratification would seem, as its name imports, to have come into our law from a Roman source; but, so far as I am aware, no argument can be drawn from the Digest that the person acting without authority in the affairs of another must avow that he is acting for him in order to let in ratification. On the contrary, it would seem that the contemplatio was in that as in many analogous cases the essential point. In Dig. 3, 5, 11, we find the phrase—Ratihabitio constituit tuum negotium quod tuum non erat sed tua contemplatione factum. The instance to which this observation is appended, the collection of a debt, may have involved avowal, though I am not clear that it did, but the point is that contemplatio is made the test. His Lordship then cited further passages in the Civil Law, and continued:—In the Anon. case, Godbolt, 109, following the case 7, Hen. IV., Hil. 346, emphasis is laid on the intent with which the act sought to be ratified was done. "Can he," says Chief Justice Anderson, "so father his misdemeanours upon another? He cannot, for once he was a trespasser, and his intent was manifest." This seems to point to the intention being the essential and the manifestation being only the evidence of it, and I think this view is confirmed by later authorities. In "Fuller v. Trimwell" (2 Leon, 215), an action of replevin, decided on the authority of the case in "7, Hen. IV.," it was objected that the averment that the defendant took as bailiff to another could not be traversed. The Court say, "and as to that which hath been objected, that if this traverse be allowed the meaning of the party shall be drawn in question—i.e., the meaning of him who took the cattle, the same is not any mischief, for so it is in other cases as in the case of recaption." "Buller's Case" (1 Leon, 50) is to the same effect. These cases seem conclusive that the issue to be tried is the intention. If so, what was said or done at the time would only be material as evidence of the intention of which there might be other conclusive evidence. And this quite accords with the attitude of our older lawyers in analogous cases. For instance, in the case of a person who, entering under a licence given by law afterwards abused it; "for," says Coke in the "Six Carpenters Case" (8 Rep., 106a), "the law adjudges by the subsequent act quo animo, or to what intent, he entered, for acta exteriora indicant interior asecreti," citing 11, Hen. IV., 756. The passage in the Institutes where Lord Coke quotes the maxim in the form in which it is current in English is quite consistent with those early authorities, and gives no support to the notion that actual statement by the agent is necessary. "He that receiveth a trespass and agreeth to a trespass after it be done is no trespasser, unless the trespass was done to his use or for his benefit, and then his agreement subsequent amounteth to a commandment, for in that case omnis ratihabitio retrotrahitur et mandato equiparatur." Of the more modern cases the earlier ones follow on the same lines. His Lordship then referred to "Hull v. Pickersgill" (1 Brod. and B., 282), "Soames v. Spencer" (1 D. and R., 32), "Foster v. Bates" (12 M. and W., 226), "Wilson v. Tunman" (6 M. and G., 236), "Saunderson v. Griffiths" (8 D. and R., 643), "Vere v. Ashby" (10 B. and C., 288), "Bird v. Brown" (4 Exch., 786), "Woollen v. Wright" (1 H. and C., 54), "Watson v. Swann" (11 C.B., N.S., 756), "Ridgway v. Wharton" (6 H.L., 296), and "Falcke v. the Scottish Imperial Company" (34 Ch.D., 250). It seems to me, therefore, that the supposed rule is not based on any sound reason; that, though supposed to be drawn from Roman law, it finds no support in Roman law; that it is opposed to the early English authorities; that there is no actual decision where it was raised and decided against the appellants; that the dicta which are supposed to establish it were pronounced alio intuitu, and in many instances when carefully examined with their context either do not support it or involve the contrary; and that if it is to be supported at all it must be rested on grounds of convenience only, and not of principle. As to convenience, it is, no doubt, a rule of English law that a contract really made for one person cannot be adopted by another, and there may be room for violations of this rule, if it is to depend on what is passing in the mind of the person who makes the contract, who is to be bound by it. But if this be an inconvenience, it is one which the law already tolerates, in that it allows a contract for an undisclosed principal by a person who contracts as principal himself; furthermore, the case would be rare where no other evidence would be available but the statement of the agent himself. But, even if there were inconvenience, it would not equal that which would be caused by an arbitrary limitation in the case of contracts for undisclosed principals. That it is arbitrary seems to me obvious, when it is realized how far the law has admittedly gone, and where it is that, according to the contention of the respondents, it stops short. A person may contract in his own name, and yet give rights to and against a third person from whom he had prior authority, though he gave no indication whatever to the other party to the contract that such person existed. He may by a similar contract, but without prior authority, if he avows that he intends to act for some one else, give a right to ratify to a person whom he could not name if asked, provided such person is capable of being ascertained and that he answers the description of person for whom he intended to contract. What substance is there then in avowal as a vital fact when the party of whom avowal is required is not obliged to know the name of the person for whom he intends to act, and the standard by which the right to ratify is to be tried is what description of person the unauthorized agent contemplated at the time of the contract? The doctrine of undisclosed principal is a substantive part of the law of agency, and, as far as I can trace it, it is as old in our law as the doctrine of ratification itself. There is no reason therefore why it should be subject to an anomalous exception. On the whole, therefore, though I am sensible of the great weight due to the opinion of the two Judges who formed the majority in "Matheson v. Kilburn," as well as that of my brother A. L. Smith in this case, I cannot regard that as a decision binding on this Court, though it is the only case in which the point was ever actually raised for determination. I am bound therefore to decide the case in accordance with what I regard to be principle and common sense.

LORD JUSTICE ROMER read a judgment, in which he agreed with Lord Justice Collins.

IN RE THE WELSH WHISKY DISTILLERY COMPANY (LIMITED).*

Company—Winding up—Surplus assets—Distribution by direction of the Court—Principle of distribution—Shares not fully paid up.

* Reported by D. FITCAIRN, Esq., Barrister-at Law.

His LORDSHIP gave the following judgment in a summons reserved from the 21st ult. :—This is a summons in a voluntary liquidation to ascertain the principles upon which "the surplus assets of the company available for distribution among the shareholders" ought to be distributed. The capital of the company is £100,000, divided into 19,960 shares of £5 each and 200 founders' shares of £1 each. The founders' shares are fully paid up and some of the ordinary shares are fully paid up, but a large number of the ordinary shares have only £1 15s. paid up. Assets realized by the liquidator are more than sufficient to pay all debts of the company and costs of the liquidation, but they are not sufficient to return in full the capital which has been paid up. Clause 6 of the memorandum of association is as follows :—The rights of the members shall be regulated as follows :—"(a) The net profits of the company in each financial year shall be applied as follows, that is to say, there shall first be paid thereout to the holders of the ordinary shares a dividend at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum for each year upon the amounts paid up thereon and one moiety of the surplus net profits shall belong to the holders of the ordinary shares and may be applied in payment of a further dividend upon such shares and the other moiety thereof shall belong to the holders of the founders' shares and shall be applied in payment of a dividend upon such shares ; (b) all moneys divisible amongst the holders of any class of shares shall be divided amongst the holders of such class of shares pro rata according to the amount paid up thereon for the time being ; (c) any shares forming part of the original capital of the company and any shares that may be created by the company may (but subject always and without prejudice to the rights of the holders of the founders' shares) be divided into different classes and may have such respective rights, preference, rank, guarantee, or privilege or postponement over or to one another either as to capital or dividend as shall be determined in accordance with the regulation for the time being of the company." On the part of the fully-paid shareholders it is contended that the principle established by "Ex parte Maude" (6 Ch., 51) and "Birch v. Cropper" (14 App. Cas., 525) applies to the present case. On the part of the shareholders who are not fully paid it is contended that clause 6, subsection (b), of the memorandum negatives this. I am not satisfied that subsection (b) relates to anything more than the net profits of the company referred to in subsection (a). For the present purpose, however, I assume that it extends to surplus assets distributable on the winding up of the company and also to moneys which may be returned by virtue of an order of the Court reducing the capital of the company, but in my view this assumption does not suffice to establish the contention of the unpaid shareholders. What is the meaning of the words "all moneys divisible" ? I think it wrong to confine this simply to the assets actually in the hands of the liquidator. I think it extends to not merely those assets but also to the calls which can be made and which for the purpose of winding up must be considered as having been made and paid upon the holders of all shares not fully paid up. I further think that the words "according to the amount paid up thereon for the time being" mean according to the amount actually paid up or which, having regard to what the liquidator ought to do, must be considered as paid up. In other words, the assets in hand plus the amount of unpaid calls must be divided between all the shareholders in the proportion of £5 to an ordinary shareholder and £1 to the holder of a founders' share, the holders of unpaid shares being debited with the amount of the calls which they have not in fact paid. The conclusion at which I have arrived seems to me to follow from the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Lowenfeld's case (70 L.T., 3), and from the observations of Lord Davey in "Welton v. Saffery" ([1897] A.C., 299), and from the judgments of Mr. Justice Wright in "Re Anglo-Continental Corporation of Western Australia" ([1898] 1 Ch., 327) and in "Re Mutoscope and Biograph Syndicate" ([1899] 1 Ch., 896). I may observe that the liquidator's summons asks, and properly asks, for directions as to the principles upon which, not the moneys now in his hands, but "the surplus assets of the company available for distribution among the shareholders," ought to be distributed. In my opinion those surplus assets must be taken to include the sums payable by shareholders who have not paid up in full. I must therefore make a declaration in accordance with the above opinion. The costs of all parties as between solicitor and client will be paid out of the assets.

Mr. Maughan was for the liquidator ; Mr. Muir Mackenzie for holders of shares fully paid up ; Mr. Younger, Q.C., for holders of shares partly paid up.

THE QUEEN V. THE GOVERNOR OF HER MAJESTY'S PRISON AT HOLLOWAY.*

Criminal Law—Extradition—Germany—Obtaining goods by false pretences—Variation between German and English law.

Extradition should be ordered if the depositions show facts which would support any offence in our law which is extraditable.

In this case cause was shown on behalf of the Crown why a writ of habeas corpus should not issue directed to the Governor of Holloway Prison to bring up Samuel James Kohn, a prisoner, before the Court to be dealt with by the Court as it thought fit. The rule nisi was made last Friday, and a report of the case appeared in The Times of the following Saturday. The prisoner was arrested on January 26 last upon an extradition warrant charging him with obtaining a thing by false pretences within the jurisdiction of the German Empire. On February 15, at Bow-street, he was committed to Holloway Prison, in order that he might be delivered over to the German police. The offence for which he was committed was described in the committal order as "fraud by an agent and larceny by a bailee (Erlangung einer Sache durch falsche Vorspiegelungen)."¹ It appeared from the depositions before the magistrate that the prisoner was either a Prussian or an American subject ; that on January 18 last in Berlin he obtained from a jeweller named Adolph Königsberger, the prosecutor, a brooch set with brilliants valued at 3,900 marks, in order to show it to an American lady, who, as the prisoner represented to the prosecutor, was likely to purchase it ; and that on the same day he left Berlin for Grimsby without having returned the brooch. The prisoner's answer to the charge was that he bought the brooch from the prosecutor on credit with the view of selling it to the American lady at a profit. Finding that the lady had left for England he followed her. By virtue of Article 2 of the Extradition Treaty of 1872, between the British and German Governments, the following, among other, crimes are crimes for which extradition is granted :—"(6) Obtaining money or goods by false pretences (Erlangungen von Geld oder anderen Sachen durch falsche Vorspiegelungen)" ; and "(8) fraud by a bailee. . . . agent. . . . &c."

*Reported by O. G. WILBRAHAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The SOLICITOR-GENERAL (with whom was Mr. H. Sutton) said that an extradition crime must be a crime both in the demanding and in the surrendering country. The offence of obtaining money or goods by false pretences in German law was wider than the offence called by that name in English law, and it included cases where there was no intention to pass the property in the money or goods. The evidence before the magistrate supported the charge of obtaining goods by false pretences in the sense in which the term was used in German law, but it did not support a charge of the offence of the same designation in English law. The magistrate accordingly, in the committal order, described the offence as fraud by an agent and larceny by a bailee, crimes which were within section 8 of article 2 of the Extradition Treaty, and which according to English law were supported by the evidence before him. He was justified in so doing by the decision in "In re Arton" ([1896] 1 Q.B., 509). Referring to the evidence he contended that there was evidence before the magistrate on which he could make a committal order, and that, that being so, there was no power to review his decision, see "The Queen v. Maurer" (10 Q.B.D., 513).

Mr. GUY STEPHENSON (with whom was Mr. J. P. Grain), in support of the rule, contended that the prisoner, having been arrested on a warrant charging him with obtaining goods by false pretences, could not be committed on a charge of fraud by an agent or larceny by a bailee. He also contended that there was no evidence before the magistrate to support either of the charges.

The COURT discharged the rule.

MR. JUSTICE GRANTHAM said that if the case of "In re Arton" had not been decided it would have been necessary to go more fully into the arguments raised in this case. According to German law what the prisoner was said to have done was obtaining goods by false pretences, but it was not so according to English law, but was an offence of another kind. The Act was the same, but it was called by a different name in each country. The prisoner was charged in Germany with obtaining goods by false pretences. The magistrate simply changed the description of the offence charged into the description under which the act alleged was known in English law. If that could not be done Extradition Treaties would be of no value. He was satisfied that there was evidence on which the magistrate could commit the prisoner.

MR. JUSTICE RIDLEY said that he agreed, and that he formed no opinion as to whether the prisoner was guilty or not of the offence with which he was charged.

PONSFORD V. THE "FINANCIAL TIMES" (LIMITED) AND HART.*

Defamation—Libel—Newspaper report of a meeting of shareholders—Law of Libel Amendment Act, 1888 (51 and 52 Vict., c. 64), sec. 4—Matters "not of public concern."

This was an action by Mr. Alexander Ponsford for an alleged libel which appeared in the Financial Times. The defendants pleaded that it was a fair and accurate report of a matter of public concern, and was published for the public benefit without malice.

Mr. F. Dodd was for the plaintiff; Mr. Isaacs, Q.C., and Mr. S. C. Macaskie were for the defendants.

*Reported by J. F. WALKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

MR. JUSTICE MATHEW read the following written judgment:—This action was brought for libellous statements contained in a report of proceedings at a meeting of shareholders of the National Cycle and Motor Car Insurance Company (Limited). The defendants, as proprietors and publishers of the Financial Times newspaper, claimed privilege under 51 and 52 Vict., c. 64, on the grounds that the words complained of were a fair and accurate report of the proceedings of a public meeting, and were published by the defendants in good faith and without malice, and that the matter published was of public concern and its publication was for the public benefit. It appeared that the object of the meeting was to obtain the co-operation of the shareholders to a project for providing further capital. The chairman, a Mr. Tindal, delivered a speech in support of the proposal and explained that losses, which had been incurred in the conduct of the business of the company, made it necessary to raise further capital. He offered the explanation, as it would seem, in exoneration of the directors, that the company's difficulties were due to the misconduct of the plaintiff and others of its officers. The substance of the charge against the plaintiff was that as chief cashier and book-keeper he had conspired with his brother-in-law, the secretary, to defraud the company. It was admitted that this charge was wholly unfounded, and it appeared that the plaintiff had recovered a verdict with substantial damages against Tindal for having procured the publication of his speech in the defendants' newspaper. The report was put in and was admitted to have been inserted in good faith and to be a fair report of the proceedings. It was contended by the defendants that the publication was privileged on the ground that the company was a public company and that the meeting of shareholders was a public meeting for the discussion of a subject of public concern within the meaning of the Act. For this position reliance was placed on "Rickett v. Sharp" (45 Ch.D., 286) and on the last clause of section 4 of the Act. It seems to me that the report of any statement made at the meeting in question, which was strictly confined to a discussion of the company's financial position, would have been privileged. But it does not follow that a report of all that was said in the course of a speech on the affairs of the company would be protected. This seems to be clearly the result of the proviso in section 4, which is in the following terms:—"Provided, further, that nothing in this section contained shall be deemed or construed to limit or abridge any privilege now by law existing, or to protect the publication of any matter not of public concern and the publication of which is not for the public benefit." It was argued for the defendants that full effect would be given to the proviso by holding that it applied only to publications, no part of which could be shown to have been of public concern or to have been of benefit to the public. But the proviso in terms applies to any matter contained in a report, and, therefore, to any part of a report which was of a defamatory character. In this case the chairman, in his reference to the plaintiff, was not discussing the matters in which the public were interested. He was stating his opinion or impression that the plaintiff, who had been dismissed, had been guilty of criminal conduct as a servant of the company. But such a charge ought not to influence any reasonable man, who contemplated either the buying or selling of shares or any other business transaction with the company. It had no other authority than the assertion of the speaker, whose knowledge must have been derived from what he had been told, and who was not unlikely to have been misled by information supplied to him for the purpose of his speech. It was, therefore, not a matter the publication of which was for the public benefit. The charges against the plaintiff were of grave importance to him and to his accuser, but were no more of public concern than any other defamatory statements which might or might not be true. The defendants have failed to show that they are protected by the statute, and I give judgment for the plaintiff for 40s. I understand that an arrangement has been come to as to costs.

A stay of execution was granted with a view to an appeal.

BLUM V. ANSLEY.*

Landlord and Tenant—Lease—Reversionary lease
—Publichouse.

A took a reversionary lease of B's premises which were then occupied as a fully licensed publichouse. Some years before A's tenancy began the licence had been forfeited and no fresh licence was obtained: held, that A could not repudiate the contract.

In this case the plaintiff sued to recover £20 from the defendant, for one quarter's rent, due on June 24, 1899, under an indenture of lease, dated August 10, 1885, whereby a house and premises, No. 142, Cable-street, in the parish of St. George's-in-the-East, were demised by the plaintiff's predecessor in title to E. Hartshorn, of whose estate the defendant is the surviving executor, for a period of 50 years from March 27, 1899, at a yearly rental of £80, paid quarterly.

The defence was that there was an implied condition in the lease that the premises should be maintained as a fully-licensed publichouse, and that the licence having been lost without the default of E. Hartshorn or the defendant, the contract was at an end.

Mr. A. T. Lawrence, Q.C., and Mr. A. J. Ashton appeared for the plaintiff; and Mr. Birrell, Q.C., and Mr. T. E. Scrutton for the defendant.

The facts of the case were as follows:—At the time of the making of the lease of August 10, 1885, the premises in question were occupied by a tenant as a fully-licensed publichouse called The Shovel. The lease which was granted by the plaintiff's predecessor on that date was a reversionary lease for 50 years to take effect on the determination of the tenancy of the then tenant, which event would occur on March 27, 1899. One of the terms of the lease was that the lessee should, during the continuance of the term thereby granted, use the demised premises as and for a fully-licensed publichouse only, so long as the necessary licence could be obtained for that purpose. The licence was forfeited some six years before the date of the commencement of the defendant's lease by the tenant in possession, and no fresh licence had been obtained. In these circumstances the defendant declined to pay rent for the premises, whose value since the loss of the licence was greatly depreciated. On behalf of the plaintiff it was contended that the defendant was liable for the rent, on the ground that there was no implied condition that in the event of the licence of the premises having ceased to exist before March 27, 1899, the contract should be at an end, and also on the ground that there was no implied warranty in the lease that the premises should be suitable for the purpose for which they were taken. In support of this contention the cases of "Tadcaster Tower Brewery Company v. Wilson" ([1897] 1 Ch., 705), and "Gillard

v. Cheshire Lines Committee," (32 W.R., 943) were referred to. For the defendant it was argued that the lease showed that what the parties had in their mind was a lease for a publichouse. The lease reeked of beer, and showed that they intended that when the interesse termini came to an end, and the lease became a lease in possession, the publichouse was to be still a publichouse. No human being, in view of the fact of what the value of the house would be otherwise than as a publichouse, would have agreed to take it for 50 years at £80 a year. The Court had power on the authority of "Taylor v. Caldwell" (3 B. and S., 826) to consider not only the condition of things in 1885, but also in 1899. There must be read into the lease an implied condition that on March 27, 1899, there should be in existence subject-matter for the covenants contained in it—that is, a publichouse; and if the corpus concerning which the contract was made had gone, the defendant was entitled to succeed. The following cases were also cited:—"Appleby v. Myers" (L.R., 2 C.P., 651); "Howell v. Coupland" (1 Q.B.D., 258); "Paradine v. Jane" (Ayleyn, 26).

MR. JUSTICE PHILLIMORE, in giving judgment, said, as he read the lease, if there was a warranty at all, it was a warranty that there was a publichouse at the date of the making of the lease, and he could find nothing in the document like a warranty that there should be a publichouse when the lease came into possession. The rights of the parties were settled when the lease was made. It was quite true that it was a reversionary lease, and it was quite true that until entry it was only an interesse termini, but it granted a proprietary interest which the defendant's predecessor was willing to take on the terms of the lease. Having taken that proprietary interest, he bound himself from the date of the lease, and if a portion of the consideration had been a premium paid at the time of the lease, he (his Lordship) had no doubt that it could not have been recovered. Although appreciating and recognising the decision in "Taylor v. Caldwell," he could not say that this case came within it. No doubt a great deal of what was contracted for had gone, but the land remained and the building remained, and, in his opinion, there must be judgment for the plaintiff, with costs on the High Court scale.

MILNER V. GREAT NORTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY.*

Master and Servant—Master's liability to servant
—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

Employment in a refreshment-room at a railway station is not employment "on, in, or about a railway" within the Act.

This was an appeal by the employers from an award of the Judge of the County Court of Northamptonshire, holden at Peterborough, in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. The applicant for compensation was Eliza Milner, who was in the employment of the Great Northern Railway Company as an assistant barmaid in the refreshment-room at Peterborough Station. On April 5, 1899, while she was dusting a counter in this room in the course of her duty, a framed advertisement fell from the wall, and struck her on the head, and caused her injury. The County Court Judge made an award in her favour for £8 with leave to her to apply for further relief. The question raised in the appeal was whether the employment in which the applicant was engaged was an employment to which the Act applied. By section 7, subsection 1, of the Act, the Act is to apply to employment on or in or about a railway. And, by subsection 2, "railway" means the railway of any railway company to which the Regulation of Railways Act, 1873, applies, and "railway" and "railway company" have the same meaning as in the Act of 1873. By section 3 of the Act of 1873 "railway" includes every station, siding, wharf, or dock of or belonging to such railway and used for the purposes of public traffic. The refreshment-room in question was a larger room in the railway company's station building. It opened from the up arrival platform and was accessible to the public from that platform only. It was contended on the part of the employers in support of the appeal that the applicant was not employed in the business of the company in its capacity as a railway company. The company carried on business as a railway company, and it also carried on the business of purveyors of food and hotel-keepers. Those two businesses ought to be treated as quite distinct, and the Workmen's Compensation Act only applied to that business of the company which was concerned with traffic. On the part of the applicant it was argued that the case came exactly within the words of the Act. She was employed in this refreshment-room, which was part of the station, and the word "railway" included station, and therefore she was employed on a railway. It was not necessary, that each particular part of a station should be shown to be used for the purposes of traffic before it could be brought within the Act.

Mr. Montague Lush and Mr. A. Clutton-Brock appeared for the railway company; Mr. T. H. Walker for the applicant.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that in his opinion a refreshment-room did not come within the meaning of a railway in the Workmen's Compensation Act coupled with the Regulation of Railways Act, 1873. By section 3 of the last-mentioned Act "railway" included every station used for the purposes of public traffic. The question was whether this refreshment-room was used for the purposes of public traffic, for in his opinion the section did not mean every part of the station, but that part of the station which was used for purposes of public traffic. He thought that a bookstall could not be said to be so used, neither could an hotel. The learned County Court Judge had held that a refreshment-room was used for the purposes of public traffic. There seemed, however, to be good authority for saying that this was not correct. In the case of "South-Eastern Railway Company v. Railway Commissioners" (6 Q.B.D., 586) the question was whether the Railway Commissioners had jurisdiction over refreshment-rooms. The Commissioners had assumed such jurisdiction, but the Court of Appeal held that they had been wrong in doing so, on the ground that refreshment-rooms did not come within the meaning of "facilities for the receiving, forwarding, or delivering traffic upon the railway," however desirable they might be for the comfort or convenience of passengers. That showed clearly in which way the point now before the Court ought to be decided. A refreshment-room at a railway station was not used for the purposes of public traffic, but was only for the convenience of passengers. The appeal must therefore be allowed.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS and LORD JUSTICE ROMER delivered judgment to the same effect.

RIXSON V. FRITCHARD AND BENWICK.*

Master and Servant—Master's liability to servant—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897—Building less than 30ft. in height.

The fact that a building less than 30ft. in height communicates with an adjoining building which is over 30ft. in height, does not bring the former within the Act.

This was an appeal by the employers from an award of the Judge of the County Court of Kent, holden at Dartford, in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. In the High-street at Dartford, next to the Bull Inn, which was a building over 30ft. in height, there stood two buildings less than 30ft. in height, which were formerly shops. The wall between the inn and the nearer of the two buildings was a party wall. The two buildings had been acquired by the landlord of the inn, and a communication had been made between the inn and the nearer building, which was called the beerhouse. The landlord had recently determined to demolish the two low buildings for the purpose of extending the main building of the inn. This work was undertaken by the employers, and the applicant, in the course of his employment, was wheeling some rubbish from the houses which were being demolished when he fell and sustained injuries. The sole question in the case was whether the applicant was employed on, in, or about a building which exceeded 30ft. in height and was being demolished within the meaning of section 7, subsection 1, of the Workmen's Compensation Act. The County Court Judge held that because the beerhouse was connected with the inn the case came within the Act, and made an award in favour of the applicant.

Mr. F. Low appeared for the employers in support of the appeal; Mr. Cyril Dodd, Q.C., and Mr. Bassett Hopkins for the applicant.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said the only question the Court had to consider was whether the notes of the evidence taken before the County Court Judge contained any evidence that there was at the time of the accident a building over 30ft. in height which was being demolished. It was clear to him that they did not. The applicant was engaged in pulling down the beerhouse, which was less than 30ft. in height. The only building which was over 30ft. in height was the Bull Inn, and that was not being demolished at all. No part of the building which was being demolished exceeded 30ft. in height. The communication between the beerhouse and the inn did not make the smaller building a part of the larger building.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS and LORD JUSTICE ROMER concurred.

SYMONS V. ANDREW KNOWLES AND SONS (LIMITED).*

Master and Servant—Master's liability to servant—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897—"Average weekly earnings."

A workman who has worked for his employer only two days is not within the Act.

To come within the Act he must have been in his employment not less than two weeks.

*Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was an appeal by the employers from an award of the Judge of the County Court of Lancashire, holden at Salford, in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. The employers were the owners of a colliery near Manchester. The applicant, who was a pitman, went into their employment as a piece worker at wages of 6s. a day on Tuesday, July 18, 1899. He went into the pit and did a day's work. On the next day, Wednesday, there was a holiday at the pit, and the applicant did not go to work. On Thursday he went to do another day's work, and while he was at work he was injured by the fall of a piece of coal. On Friday, July 21, he was paid 6s. for the work which he did on the Tuesday, and on Friday, July 28, he was paid 6s. for the work which he did on the Thursday. The colliery week ended on Tuesday evening. The question was, what was the right way of calculating the applicant's "average weekly earnings" under section 1 (b) of the first schedule to the Workmen's Compensation Act. The County Court Judge thought that, as the applicant had earned 12s. within seven days, his average weekly earnings were that sum, and he made an award for a weekly payment of half that sum—viz., 6s. By section 1 of the schedule "the amount of compensation under this Act shall be (b) where total or partial incapacity for work results from the injury a weekly payment during the incapacity after the second week not exceeding 50 per cent. of his average weekly earnings during the previous 12 months, if he has been so long employed, but if not then for any less period during which he has been in the employment of the same employer, such weekly payment not to exceed £1."

Mr. F. H. MELLOR appeared for the employers in support of the appeal, and argued that the applicant did not come within the Act, on the ground that the Act did not afford any machinery by which compensation could be awarded to him. It was impossible to ascertain the average weekly earnings of a man who had only worked for two days.

Mr. JOSEPH WALTON, Q.C., and Mr. POSTLETHWAITE, for the applicant, argued that the Act was not confined to men who were engaged by the week. The words were a "payment not exceeding 50 per cent. of his average weekly earnings." Section 1 of the Act gave the right to compensation, and these words in the schedule merely fixed a limit. The word "average" only applied where there was anything to average; if there was not, then the maximum sum, which was not to be exceeded, was the sum which the man had actually earned.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said this appeal raised a question of great importance, which was simply this—whether a workman came within the purview of the Workmen's Compensation Act, who, having entered into an employment and gone to work, was injured on the first day of his employment. In this case the workman had worked for two days, but the question was the same whether the man worked on two days or only on one day. The facts were that the applicant went into the masters' employment on Tuesday, July 18, 1899, and did a day's work. On Wednesday the pit was not at work, and the applicant did not go there at all. On Thursday he went into the pit to do a day's work, and while he was at work on that day he was injured. Was he within the Act? It was asked on behalf of the applicant, Why should he not be within the Act? His Lordship could not answer that question; his duty was to consider whether, on the true construction of the words used by the Legislature, the applicant was within the Act. They had already held that upon the words of the statute a painter painting the outside of a house on a ladder was not within the Act, though a builder under the same circumstances would be within it; though why the one was included and the other excluded he could not say. The words which they now had to consider were very important words—viz., the words in Schedule I. which regulated the payment of compensation. His Lordship read subsections (a) and (b), and said the question was whether they embraced the case of a man who had only been at work a day, or whether they contemplated that the man should have been at work for such a time that his weekly earnings might be averaged. Mr. Walton's argument cut the word "average" out of the schedule. In his opinion the Court was driven to say that, in order to come within the Act, a man must have been at the time of the accident in his employment for at least two weeks. If he had not been in employment for two weeks, it was impossible to give any meaning to the words "average weekly earnings."

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS was of the same opinion. It seemed to him to be impossible to give any decision on this Act which should be logical and free from anomalies. The Legislature had not brought every workman within the Act, and they could not speculate on the reasons why certain classes had been left out. He thought that the schedule, reading it in its natural sense, contemplated that the relation of master and servant should have existed for not less than two weeks.

LORD JUSTICE ROMER said he felt great doubt as to this case, but he did not differ from his learned brethren.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL (AT THE RELATION OF THE POWELL DUFFRYN STEAM COAL COMPANY, LIMITED, AND ALL OTHER THE RATEPAYERS OF THE MERTHYR TYDVIL UNION) V. THE GUARDIANS OF THE MERTHYR TYDVIL UNION.*

Poor Law—Relief—Able-bodied persons able to obtain work—Colliers on strike—Power of guardians—43 Eliz., c. 2—4 and 5 Will. IV., c. 76—11 and 12 Vict., c. 91, s. 4.

Guardians have no power to grant relief out of the rates to able-bodied men who are able to work and can obtain work sufficient to maintain themselves and their wives and families. Hence the guardians cannot grant relief to able-bodied colliers on strike, who might, had they chosen, have obtained work. If guardians have made any unlawful payment and it has been disallowed by the auditor, the Local Government Board may, under 11 and 12 Vict., c. 91, s. 4, authorize the allowance of such unlawful expense. The guardians, however, may grant relief to the wives and children of strikers.

Decision of Romer, J. (15 The Times L.R., 303), reversed.

Judgment in this appeal was delivered this morning. The appeal was brought by the relators against a decision of Mr. Justice Romer's, reported in 15 The Times L.R., 303. The arguments on the appeal will be found reported in The Times of February 9, 10, 14. The appeal arose out of the great coal strike of 1898, and it raised a question of importance as to the power of the guardians of the poor to apply the rates in the relief of the men on strike and of their families. The facts were thus summarized by the learned judge in his judgment :—A strike of colliers occurred, whereby many men who were not colliers were thrown out of employ. Many colliers and other workmen in the Merthyr Tydvil Union applied for Poor Law relief. The guardians established labour yards and relief works, and, partly by these yards and works, and partly by gifts of food or money, the necessitous workmen and their families were relieved. So far as the colliers were concerned, work was offered to them in neighbouring collieries, and of this the guardians were aware. The plaintiffs alleged that, at any rate so far as related to the colliers or other able-bodied persons who could get work, the guardians ought not to have relieved them. The plaintiffs contended that the payments made to the colliers or persons in the same position ought to be disallowed, and the guardians be ordered to refund the sums paid. The plaintiffs further asked for an injunction to restrain any further relief being given to such colliers or able-bodied persons. The guardians, to provide for relief in the union, had in the usual way issued orders for contributions to the common fund of the union to the overseers of the parishes comprised therein, and the overseers thereupon levied and collected a rate in their parishes. The plaintiffs said that this rate was higher than it otherwise would have been by reason of the guardians having improperly relieved workmen in the manner above stated. And, accordingly, they asked for an injunction to restrain the guardians from enforcing or receiving payments in respect of such orders. The plaintiffs also asked a declaration "that the establishment and maintenance by the defendants of labour yards or relief works for the purpose of providing outdoor relief for able-bodied persons, to the knowledge of the defendants otherwise able to maintain themselves and their families, and the expenditure by the defendants of parts of the common fund of the union for the purpose of relieving such able-bodied persons and their families constituted a breach of the statutory duties of the defendants" as guardians. Ultimately, at the trial, the plaintiffs asked only for a declaration of this nature. Mr. Justice Romer held that the guardians had not exceeded their powers, and he dismissed the action with costs.

Mr. Neville, Q.C., Mr. Upjohn, Q.C., and Mr. S. G. Lushington were for the appellants; Sir Edward Clarke, Q.C., Mr. Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Mr. Alexander Glen were for the respondents.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said,—Under the Poor Law statutes passed before 1834 the only persons entitled to relief out of the poor-rates were those described in the 43rd Elizabeth, chapter 2, under three heads—namely (1) the children of parents unable to keep and maintain them; (2) such persons who, having no means to maintain themselves, used no ordinary and daily trade of life to get their living by; (3) the lame, impotent, old, blind, and such others as were poor and not able to work. The first two of these classes were to be relieved by being set to work. The third alone were to be relieved without work. Omitting children, and speaking only of adults, the older statutes drew a broad distinction between, first, the impotent poor, that is, poor unable to work and who were to be relieved without work, and, secondly, the able-bodied poor, that is, poor able to work but unable to maintain themselves. These were to be relieved, but only by being set to work. If a poor person able to work, and for whom work was found by the parish authorities, would not work, he became liable to imprisonment under section 2 of the statute of Elizabeth and the subsequent Vagrant Acts; but I can find nothing in the statutes before 1834 which entitled an able-bodied person having the means of supporting himself to obtain relief from the parish authorities by being set to work or otherwise. On the other hand, orders for the relief of poor persons were constantly quashed on the ground that they were not stated to be impotent. A poor person able to work and able to procure work might become chargeable to the parish by refusing to work so long as to become physically unable to work or by reducing his wife and children to such a state as to render them chargeable to the parish. If he did this he would force himself and them on the rates and be punishable under the Vagrant Acts. This is the true explanation of the language used in the Vagrants Act of 5 George IV., chapter 83, section 3. It says, "Every person being able wholly or in part to maintain himself or herself or his or her family by work or by other means and wilfully neglecting or refusing so to do, by which refusal or neglect he or she, or any of his or her family whom he or she may be legally bound to maintain, shall have become chargeable to any parish," shall be deemed to be an idle and disorderly person and be liable to imprisonment. The penalty here inflicted is for a wrong done by the person imprisoned; and the wrong done is by becoming chargeable or by rendering others whom he ought to support chargeable on the rates when he had no justification for so doing. It would be an entire perversion of this statute to construe it as entitling an able-bodied man who could support himself if he would to relief of any kind by the parish authorities. He could demand no relief in food or work from them if he could obtain work and could support himself and his family without their assistance. This conclusion as to the effect of the older Poor Laws is based upon a careful perusal of them, and upon what is to be found in Digests and Treatises, and, in particular, upon the resolutions of the Judges in Lambard's Eirenarcha 8, 9, and 10, which I regard as an extremely valuable exposition of the law by persons thoroughly well acquainted with it and its working in and shortly after the reign of Elizabeth. I have not succeeded in finding any judicial interpretation of the words "Such persons, married or unmarried, having no means to maintain them, as use no ordinary and daily trade of life to get their living by." These are the words used in section 1 of the statute of Elizabeth to describe the class of able-bodied poor able to procure work. It must be borne in mind that the Poor Laws have nothing to do with the regulation of labour. That was provided for by other statutes relating to labourers and artificers. The Poor Laws impose on the comparatively well-to-do the duty of supporting those who by reason of their poverty cannot maintain themselves. This being so, the inability to maintain himself which justifies an able-bodied man in requiring relief from the Poor Law authorities must, I apprehend, be a real actual inability to support himself on any terms which he can in fact comply with, and which, as between him and the ratepayers, do not justify him in refusing to support himself. He cannot, in my opinion, lawfully justify such refusal on the ground that he cannot obtain work except on terms which, as between him and his employer, he does not consider reasonable. What is a reasonable agreement for a man to enter into is one thing; what is a reasonable justification for a man compelling others to support him is quite another thing, but it is the latter alone which the Poor Law authorities ought to consider. This is a matter of the utmost importance in the present case, and, indeed, in all cases in which work can be got on terms which will enable a man to support himself and his family, but which he will not accept because he prefers to stand out in the hope of obtaining better terms than those offered him. The short effect of the Poor Laws before 1834 I understand to have been as follows :—(1) No one who was starving could be lawfully refused relief, whether he was in that state by his own fault or not ; (2) poor persons physically unable to work were entitled to relief out of the rates without being set to work ; (3) poor persons physically able to work, but who could not obtain work, were entitled to relief by having work found for them at the expense of the ratepayers if no other work could be found ; (4) poor persons physically able to work were not entitled to relief in any other way ; (5) but poor persons able to work and able to procure it might, by refusing to work, become so weak as to be no longer able to work, in which case they became entitled to relief out of the rates and at the same time liable to imprisonment. This was an anomaly, for it enabled a person to obtain a legal advantage by his own wrong-doing. The anomaly was justified on grounds of humanity. The penalty for refusing to work was imprisonment, not death by starvation. Under various statutes passed in the reign of George III.—viz., 22 Geo. III., cap. 83, sections 29-35 (Gilbert's Act) ; 36 Geo. III., cap. 23, section 1 ; 55 Geo. III., cap. 137, section 3 ; 59 Geo. III., cap. 12, section 2, outdoor relief was authorized to be given to able-bodied poor who could not support themselves and families. But even when these Acts were in force, and abused as they were, I do not find that they, or any decisions upon them, authorized relief to able-bodied poor who could support themselves and their families if they chose to do so. "The King v. Hyworth" (1 Strange, 10) shows that before these Acts no relief could be lawfully given to such persons, and "The King v. Collett" (2 B. and C., 324), decided in 1823, proceeded on the supposition that the law in this respect remained unaltered, though the mode of relieving able-bodied poor who could not obtain work was left undecided. In 1834 the Poor Law was very greatly improved. Boards of guardians were formed and a Central Poor Law Board was created with very large powers of administration. (See 4 and 5 William IV., cap. 76.) But large as those powers are, I cannot find anything in the Act of 1834 or in any later Act which has enlarged the class of persons entitled to relief under the former statutes. I can find no section which entitles able-bodied persons to support out of the rates if they can obtain work and support themselves and their families, if they choose to do so. Section 54 of the Act of 1834 authorizes overseers to give temporary relief, but not money, in cases of sudden and urgent necessity. The object of this section is to enable overseers to act without reference to the guardians in cases which admit of no delay. The same section authorizes justices to order medical relief in case of sudden and dangerous illness. This section has no immediate bearing on the question which has to be decided on this appeal, and would not require further notice, except for the contention that the case before us was one of urgent necessity. I will examine this contention presently. Having ascertained the classes of persons entitled to relief under the Poor Law statutes, it is necessary to discover whether the Local Government Board can authorize relief to be given to persons not entitled to demand it, and to what extent this power, if it exists, can be exercised. The powers of the Local Government Board (who now represent the Poor Law Commissioners) are very large and must be carefully examined. The enactments which confer special powers upon them relating to this subject are 4 and 5 William IV., chapter 76, sections 15, 42, 52, and 105, and 11 and 12 Vict., chapter 91, section 4, amended by 29 and 30 Vict., chapter 113, section 5. Section 15 of 4 and 5 William IV., chapter 76, clearly confers no power to grant relief to any person not entitled to relief under the Poor Law statutes. It is in express terms confined to the administration of relief according to those statutes, and there is a remarkable provision at the end of the section to guard against the supposition that anything in the Act itself should enable the Commissioners to interfere in any individual case for the purpose of ordering relief. Section 42 of the same Act relates to regulations to be observed in workhouses, and has no direct bearing on this case. This section in no way authorizes relief to be given to persons not entitled to it by law. Section 52 is more important, for it relates to outdoor relief and gives the Commissioners very wide powers. But here, again, they are restricted to making regulations declaring "to what extent and for what period the relief to be given to able-bodied persons or to their families in any particular parish or union may be administered out of the workhouse." This language assumes that the persons referred to are entitled to relief, and enables rules to be made for their relief out of the workhouse, instead of in it. But I cannot read this section as empowering the Commissioners to order relief to be given to persons not entitled to relief at all under the statutes relating to the poor. Section 52, like the others already noticed, gives powers of administering those laws, but no power to alter them. That section enacts that relief given contrary to the regulations shall be deemed unlawful and shall be disallowed in the accounts, but the section contains a proviso enabling the local authorities to depart from the regulations of the Commissioners in cases of emergency and authorizes the Commissioners to approve of such departure, and any relief so given and approved "if otherwise lawful" is not to be deemed unlawful or be disallowed. So that even in cases of emergency no relief can be lawfully given except to persons entitled to it under the Poor Law statutes. The recital at the commencement of section 52 of 4 and 5 William IV., chapter 76, refers to the abuse of the powers to grant outdoor relief conferred by the statutes of George III., to which I have already referred. But, bearing them in mind and attending as we ought to the recital (which, I am sorry to say, is omitted from the last edition of the revised statutes), I cannot arrive at the conclusion that the Commissioners appointed under 4 and 5 William IV., chapter 76, to carry out the improvements made by it are empowered to extend the scope of the Poor Law statutes, and to extend their application to persons not entitled to relief under them. This general conclusion, arrived at from a study of the language of the sections referred to, is strengthened by section 105, which prohibits the removal of illegal rules by a certiorari into any Court except the Queen's Bench. This shows that the Commissioners have no legislative as distinguished from administrative power. If further authority for this proposition is wanted it is to be found in "Waddington v. Guardians of the London Union" (E. B. and E., 370 ; see pp. 399-400), where a retrospective rate, alleged to have been authorized by regulations made by the Commissioners, was held illegal. I pass now to another statute, which goes further than any I have yet referred to ; I mean the 11th and 12th Victoria, chapter 91, section 4, relating to the audit of Poor Law accounts. Under this Act an unlawful expenditure properly disallowed by the auditor may, nevertheless, be allowed by the Commissioners on appeal from his decision. If the Commissioners find the subject-matter of the disallowance was incurred "under such circumstances as to make it fair and equitable that such disallowance shall be remitted" they have the power to remit it—i.e., to authorize the allowance of the unlawful and properly disallowed expense. This is a very large power, which is now entrusted to the Local Government Board, and with the exercise of which, when it arises, this Court cannot interfere. But the remission of the disallowance of an expense unlawfully incurred no more renders lawful the incurring of the expense than a pardon for a crime renders lawful the past criminal conduct of the person pardoned. The power of the Commissioners to allow an unlawful expense does not arise until such expense has been incurred and been disallowed; and if the High Court has jurisdiction to prevent the improper expense, that jurisdiction is not taken away by the power given to the Commissioners to allow the expense if it has been illegally made. So, if the illegal payment is a ground for indictment, its allowance by the Commissioners will afford no legal answer to the indictment. At the same time, the existence of this power ought to make the Court very careful in granting injunctions relating to Poor Law relief. Having now examined all the statutory enactments which have to be considered, I pass to those regulations made by the Commissioners which are applicable to the Merthyr Tydvil Union. They are dated October 1, 1870, and October 29, 1870. As might be expected, they relate to the mode of administering relief to poor persons in the union. They are purely administrative orders; they in no way (inadvertently or otherwise) purport to authorize the granting of relief to persons not entitled to it. Article 1 of the order of October 1, 1870, says that "every able-bodied person requiring relief" shall be relieved wholly in the workhouse, except in certain specified cases, the first of which is "where such persons shall require relief on account of sudden and urgent necessity." The expression "every person requiring relief" in the first article cannot mean every person asking for relief whether entitled to it or not. The regulations relate to the working of the Poor Laws, and the expression in question must in reason be confined to those persons who are entitled to relief under the Poor Laws, and who require such relief. Again, the first exception refers only to such emergencies as require outdoor relief instead of indoor relief. It has reference to the necessities of those entitled to relief. It in no way enlarges the class of persons entitled to relief under the Poor Law statutes. If the workhouse is full, the exception justifies giving outdoor relief to poor persons entitled to relief who cannot be received into the workhouse; and if the workhouse is not full a poor person entitled to relief may need it so urgently as to entitle him to outdoor relief before he can reach the workhouse. But to construe the exception as justifying relief in any shape to persons, few or many, who are not entitled to any relief at all is entirely to mistake the object of the exception and to put upon its language a meaning which it will not bear. The order or regulation of October 29, 1870, is again a merely administrative order directing how outdoor relief is to be given to the poor entitled to it. As I understand the order, outdoor relief is only to be given to the able-bodied poor who are entitled to relief and who will do a certain amount of work. But if they comply with that condition they are entitled to such relief for themselves and their families partly in food, clothing, and articles of necessity and partly in money as stated in the order. I now proceed to consider what has been done in this case. There is no conflict of evidence; all the material facts are admitted. Relief has been given:—

- (1) To wives and children reduced to destitution by the strike;
- (2) to able-bodied men thrown out of work by the strike and unable to obtain work and maintain themselves while it lasted.

Both of these classes of persons were entitled to relief under the statute of Elizabeth, and there has been no unlawful expenditure of the poor-rates in supporting them. It is true that the wives and children of the strikers were not themselves applicants for relief and were relieved indirectly through the strikers, but this only amounts to an impropriety in the mode of relieving them. This impropriety is not a matter for this Court's interference. It is unimportant in considering whether the wives and children were entitled to relief or not. But the colliers who struck work were able-bodied men who might have obtained work and who might have maintained themselves and their families. These men, when relieved, were not so reduced by want as to be unable to keep themselves and their families off the rates, and it was their clear duty to do so if they could. In my opinion these persons had no right to be relieved when they applied for relief and the authorities were not justified either by the Poor Law statutes or by any regulations made under them in affording such relief. The evidence does not show that the colliers were physically too weak and ill to work, nor that any of them were prevented by fear of violence from accepting work within their reach. They are described as destitute, and in one sense they were so; they had neither food nor money. But they were able-bodied men physically well and able to work; and the answer to the fourth interrogatory shows that they might, if they had chosen, have obtained work at wages sufficient to support themselves and families. It was contended that this was only true if they all went to work in a body; and that it was not true of them individually. I cannot read the answer to the fourth interrogatory as open to this construction. No one of the colliers was willing to accept work unless the others did the same; and no one could have worked the colliery without others. But the admissions show in my opinion that each and every collier could, if he had chosen, have kept himself and his family off the rates. I draw no distinction between strikers and other able-bodied men who can support themselves but who will not. There is no difference so far as the Poor Law is concerned either for better or for worse between men on strike and other men who can, but will not, support themselves. To use the rates to support strikers or any other persons able to support themselves is in my opinion illegal; although, rather than let even such persons starve, relief may be given them when physically unable to work. This anomaly I have already alluded to. As I understand Mr. Justice Romer's judgment we do not differ in holding that, speaking generally, it is wrong to grant relief to able-bodied persons who can obtain work and support themselves and families. But he has treated this case as one of urgent necessity and as consequently justifying the guardians in granting relief as they did. Here I am unable to follow him. I have already pointed out that the guardians were justified in relieving the wives and children even of the colliers and in granting relief to non-strikers thrown out of employment by the strike. These persons were all entitled to relief without reference to any question of sudden emergency. The numbers of them might and very likely did create a sudden emergency entitling them to outdoor as distinguished from indoor relief. But that is a comparatively immaterial matter, and one which the Court ought not to concern itself about. But if a poor person physically able to work can obtain work and so support himself and family there is no urgent necessity, nor any necessity at all, for granting him relief. Moreover, numbers do not give a right to relief to persons not individually entitled to relief. The sense in which the colliers were destitute I have explained already. They were not so weak as to be unable to work, and they were not relieved on the ground that they were physically in that condition. They were relieved before they were entitled by law to relief, and, I suppose, from fear of a disturbance and of violence. I quite agree with Mr. Justice Romer that it is not the province of the High Court to administer the Poor Laws, nor to interfere with guardians in the performance of their very difficult duties, the performance of which demands great judgment, sympathy, and discretion. Still less can the High Court interfere with the exercise by the Local Government Board of their powers to make regulations for the relief of persons entitled thereto by the Poor Law Acts. Moreover, the allowance by the board of expenses unlawfully incurred cannot be controlled by the Court. This prevents the Court from ordering the guardians to make good any expense which has been incurred, and which the Local Government Board may, in their judgment, think it right to allow. But this information was filed to restrain the guardians from misapplying the rates by granting relief at a great expense to persons not entitled thereto. Certiorari is no adequate remedy in such a case, nor is there any other. The jurisdiction of the High Court to grant an injunction to restrain an unlawful application of rates cannot be doubted, and the observations in the "Grand Junction Waterworks Company v. The Hampton District Council" ([1898] 2 Ch., 331) are not applicable to such a case as the present. The guardians, taking, in my opinion, an erroneous view of their power and duty to grant relief in such a case as this, contended that it was competent for them, and indeed their duty, to grant relief on the ground of emergency. In my opinion they were wrong so far as the colliers themselves were concerned, and, as the defendants from first to last have maintained that they were in the right throughout, I think the Court ought to make a declaration to show that the information was properly filed and to prevent any misconception as to the illegality of the conduct of the guardians. Such a declaration is not open to the objection against making abstract declarations on matters not within the Court's jurisdiction as in "Barracough v. Brown" ([1897] A.C., 615), and which objection was forcibly pointed out by Lord Davey in that case at page 623. The declarations asked by the information are much too wide and might be misunderstood. Labour yards may well have been wanted for persons entitled to relief, because, although able to work, they were unable to obtain work and could not have been taken into the workhouse. The proper order will be as follows:—Allow the appeal and discharge the judgment appealed from. Declare that the payment by the defendants out of the poor-rates of any money for setting to work or for the relief of able-bodied men, who were at the time able to obtain and perform work at wages sufficient to support themselves (and their wives and families if any), was unlawful and ought to be disallowed by the auditor on auditing the defendants' accounts. But this declaration does not include relief given to or for the wives and children of such men, and the said declaration is without prejudice to and is in no way to affect the power of the Local Government Board to remit such disallowed payments, although unlawfully made, under the Statute 11 and 12 Victoria, chapter 91, section 4, or any other statute enabling them so to do. The defendants must pay the costs of the appeal, but the relief claimed by the information and action was so much too wide that each party must bear his own costs of the information and action itself.

THE ARROYO.*

Practice—Third-party procedure—Indemnity——Charter-party—Captain under order of charterers.

By a charter-party the shipowners were not to be liable for perils of the sea or other accidents of navigation even when occasioned by the negligence, default, or error in judgment of the master, mariners, or other servants of the shipowners. By another clause in the charter-party the captain, although appointed by the owners, was to be under the orders and direction of the charterers as regards employment, agency, or other similar arrangements; bills of lading to be signed at any rate of freight the charterers or their agents might direct without prejudice to the charter; the charterers indemnifying the owners from all consequences or liabilities that might arise from the captain doing so. Corn was shipped under a bill of lading by which the shipowners were not exempted from the same liabilities as under the charter-party. The corn was damaged on the voyage, and the endorsees of the bill of lading sued the shipowners, alleging that the damage was caused by negligent loading. The shipowners served a third-party notice on the charterers claiming indemnity from them under the above clause in the charter-party.

Held, that the shipowners were entitled to serve the third-party notice.

This case came before the Court by way of motion on appeal from a decision of the Judge of the Liverpool County Court, setting aside a third-party notice. It appeared that by a time charter, dated April 19, 1899, the owners of the steamship Arroyo chartered their vessel to F. Leyland and Co. (Limited) for the term of two round voyages to the St. Lawrence, at the rate of 6s. 9d. per gross register ton per calendar month. Under the exceptions contained in the charter-party the owners were not to be liable for, amongst other things, "perils of the sea, . . . and other accidents of navigation even when occasioned by negligence, default, or error in judgment of the pilot, master, mariners, or other servants of the shipowners." The charter-party also contained the following clause:—"The captain, although appointed by the owners, shall be under the orders and direction of the charterers as regards employment, agency, or other similar arrangements. Bills of lading are to be signed at any rate of freight the charterers or their agents may direct, without prejudice to this charter, the captain attending daily at the offices of the charterers, or their agents, to do so: the charterers hereby indemnify the owners from all consequences or liabilities that may arise from the captain doing so." The Arroyo proceeded to the St. Lawrence and there loaded, amongst other cargo, a certain parcel of corn which was shipped under a bill of lading under which the shipowners were not exempted from the same liabilities as under the charter-party. The Arroyo then sailed for Liverpool, and on arrival there it was found that the parcel of corn had sustained sea damage, and the endorsees of the bill of lading thereupon commenced an action in the Liverpool County Court against the shipowners, seeking to recover the amount of such damage, alleging that it was caused by negligent loading of the deck cargo on the Arroyo, whereby the deck was started and rendered leaky, and sea water was enabled to get in among the cargo. The shipowners, the defendants in the action, disputed the negligence, but served a third-party notice upon F. Leyland and Co. (Limited), the charterers, claiming, under the clause of the charter-party set out above, to be indemnified by them in respect of their liability, if any, for the damage. Application was then made by the charterers to the County Court Judge to have the third-party notice set aside, which the learned Judge directed to be done, saying that the contract of indemnity was obscurely worded, but it seemed to him to be confined to any consequences or liabilities that might arise from the captain's signing bills of lading at a rate of freight differing from that in the charter-party, and that it had nothing to do with the damages for breach of duty about the carriage and delivery of goods to which the claim in the action related. The shipowners appealed.

Mr. LESLIE SCOTT, for the appellants, contended that the indemnity extended to cover this liability, if in fact the shipowners were liable.

Mr. JUSTICE GORELL BARNES.—Surely, in any case, there is an implied indemnity, under which the charterers could be brought in by a third-party notice, where the master at the request of the charterers signs bills of lading in excess of his authority from his owners.

Mr. LESLIE SCOTT.—Yes, and that is an argument in support of my construction of the written clause. He then referred to the case of “Milburn v. Jamaica Fruit, &c., Co. (Limited)” (4 Com. Cas., 331). The indemnity clause would be mere surplussage if it only applied to the question of the rate of freight, as to which no liability could be imposed upon the shipowner.

He was stopped by the COURT.

Mr. ASPINALL, Q.C. (Mr. Collingwood Hope with him), for the respondents, the charterers, contended that the third-party notice was premature. The cause of the loss was not yet ascertained, and it might be that no question of indemnity would arise. He did not contend that the limit placed upon the indemnity by the Court below could be upheld.

The COURT allowed the appeal with costs.

The PRESIDENT, in giving judgment, said that the case was abundantly clear. The right to the indemnity was the only point taken in the Court below, and the Court would not now be justified in assuming a different state of facts. The appellants were entitled to an express indemnity under the clause of the charter-party, and the appeal must be allowed with costs.

Mr. JUSTICE GORELL BARNES concurred.

DEBENTURE-HOLDERS' ACTIONS.*

Practice—Chancery Division—Debenture-holders' actions—Inquiry as to creditors—Alteration in common form of judgment—Undertaking given by plaintiff.

HIS LORDSHIP stated that, before the paper was called, he desired to mention a matter which had been considered by all the Judges of the Chancery Division as to debenture-holders' actions. There were two points of everyday practice as to which there had been some diversity of opinion, but all the Judges were now agreed upon them. The first was as to an inquiry which was usually inserted in the common form of judgment in those actions—viz., the inquiry whether there were any creditors who were entitled to priority of payment. It was found in practice that that inquiry did not always reach the proper person—namely, the receiver. It was provided by the Preferential Payments in Bankruptcy Amendment Act, 1897, section 3, that where a receiver is appointed on behalf of the holders of debentures or debenture stock of a company, secured by a floating charge, then, if the company is not at the time in course of being wound up, the debts mentioned in section 1 of the Preferential Payments Act, 1888, shall be paid forthwith out of any assets coming to the hands of the receiver, in priority to any claims for principal or interest in respect of such debentures or debenture stock. It was also found that the inquiry did not quite work in another respect, because it was suggested that payment ought not to take place until the inquiry had been answered. The matter had been considered and all the Judges were now agreed that, in all cases where a receiver is appointed in a debenture-holders' action, a direction is to be inserted that the receiver do forthwith out of any assets coming to his hands pay the debts of the company which have priority over the claims of the debenture-holders under the Preferential Payments in Bankruptcy Amendment Act, 1897; and that the receiver be allowed all such payments in his accounts. Inquiry No. 6 in the common form of judgment in these actions was to be omitted in future, it being considered that the object was sufficiently attained by the direction to the receiver. The other point related to the undertaking given by the plaintiff in a debenture-holders' action on the appointment of a receiver to act at once. The Judges had now agreed that a direction should be given to the Registrars that, in drawing up such orders in future, the undertaking was to be so framed as to extend to all liabilities which would be covered by the security when completed, and not to the receiver's receipts alone.

Revenue—Estate duty—Incidence—Settlement.

By a marriage settlement a testator covenanted for the payment by his executors of £25,000 to the trustees of the settlement “without any deduction”; held, that settlement duty was payable out of the residuary estate, and not out of the £25,000.

Decision of Kekewich, J. ([1899] 2 Ch., 489), reversed.

This appeal against a decision of Mr. Justice Kekewich's ([1899] 2 Ch., 489) raised a question of some importance on the construction of the Finance Act, 1894. By a settlement dated July 23, 1895, made on the marriage of one of his daughters, the late Sir Spencer Maryon-Wilson covenanted with the trustees that his executors should, within six months after his death, pay to the trustees the sum of £25,000, with interest at 3½ per cent. per annum from the day of his death, “without any deduction.” The trustees were to hold the £25,000 upon the trusts of the settlement. By his will, dated August, 1896, Sir Spencer devised some freehold estates to trustees for the term of 2,000 years upon trust to raise (inter alia) the above-mentioned sum of £25,000, and to pay it to the trustees of the settlement, with interest from the testator's death. The testator died on December 31, 1897. A question arose as to how the “settlement estate duty” imposed by the Finance Act in respect of the £25,000 ought ultimately to be borne. It was decided by Mr. Justice Kekewich, and was indeed admitted, that the “estate duty” as regarded the £25,000 must be borne by the testator's general residuary estate. But the learned Judge held that the further duty known as "settlement estate duty" must be borne by the £25,000, and not by the general residuary estate, and that the testator's covenant had been fully performed when the £25,000 had been paid to the trustees of the settlement without any deduction in respect of "estate duty." The trustees of the settlement appealed.

*Reported by G. A. STREETEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

*Reported by W. L. CABELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. Butcher, Q.C., and Mr. Austen-Cartmell were for the appellants; Mr. Warrington, Q.C., and Mr. O. Leigh Clare were for the executors and trustees of the testator's will.

The appeal was heard on February 13 and 16 last, when judgment was reserved.

The MASTER of the ROLLS read the following judgment:—The sections of the Finance Act, 1894, which are important are sections 1, 2, 5, 6 (2), 8 (3) and (4), 9, and 14 (1). The Finance Act, 1896, section 19, is also important. I do not stop to comment on their exact language. The argument for the appellants, so far as it is based on the Finance Acts, is reducible to the following propositions:—(1) That by the Act of 1894, sections 5 and 6 (2), the settlement estate duty is payable by the executors of the testator. (2) That the Finance Act does not say by whom the duty so payable is ultimately to be borne in a case like the present, section 8 (4) not applying. (3) That consequently the duty must be borne by the residuary legatees. The first two of these propositions are correct, but the third is, in my opinion, erroneous, although it was adopted by Mr. Justice North in "In re Webber" ([1896] 1 Ch., 914). The executors pay the settlement estate duty as trustees for somebody, but as trustees for whom? Certainly not as trustees for the residuary legatees, who take no interest whatever in the fund in respect of which the settlement estate duty is payable. The executors pay that duty as trustees for those who are beneficially entitled to that fund, and upon plain principles of equity the executors are entitled to be repaid out of that fund what they have by law to pay in respect of it. In my opinion it lies upon the beneficiaries of that fund to show why this burden which thus falls upon them should be borne by somebody else. The settlement estate duty, although described and imposed as a further estate duty, is imposed, not on the general estate of the deceased, but on specific portions of it, and ought in common fairness to be borne by those who take those portions. To facilitate collection the executors have to pay it, but this I regard as mere machinery. The Legislature has amended the law as expounded by Mr. Justice North (see 59 and 60 Vict., c. 28, section 19), and has declared that the settlement estate duty payable in respect of property settled by a will is to be borne by the settled property. Mr. Justice Kekewich treats this enactment as a recognition by the Legislature of the soundness of the reasoning which led to the decision. I cannot so regard the enactment. It corrected a mistake, and so saved further litigation. If Mr. Justice North's reasoning is adopted and applied to all settlements of money to be paid on death, we shall have this extraordinary anomaly—that if a settlement is made by will the settlement estate duty is to be borne by the settled property, whereas if the settlement is made by deed that duty is not to be borne by that property at all. This is an utterly irrational conclusion, and is not one at which we are compelled to arrive by the language of the statutes themselves. If there were nothing else in the case the settlement estate duty would, in my opinion, have to be borne by the settled fund. But then we have to consider the covenant of the testator. He covenanted to pay his daughter's trustees £25,000 "without any deduction." These words are very important. They show that possible deductions were thought of, and that the settlor clearly intended that his daughter's trustees should be paid £25,000 in full, without any deduction of any sort or kind. It is urged that there is no difference between a covenant to pay £25,000 and a covenant to pay £25,000 without deduction. But, however this may be, the latter form of expression leaves no room for doubt as to the intention of the parties, whilst, if the words "free from deduction" are omitted, the intention is by no means equally clear. The language of the covenant in this case is too plain to be got over. It is agreed on all hands that the daughter's trustees are to receive £25,000 free from estate duty. But it is urged that the "settlement estate duty," although called a "further estate duty," and made payable by the executors of the covenantor in respect of the settled fund, ought not to be treated as a deduction from it, but rather as a charge on it when paid over. I cannot accede to this argument. It may be conceded that the settlement estate duty is a charge on the settled fund, and that, so far as the Finance Acts are concerned, the executors have to pay it simply for facility of collection. But in the present case we have to consider the trustees of the daughter's settlement on the one hand, and the testator's residuary legatees on the other, and, as between them, his covenant is so plainly worded as to preclude any deduction from the £25,000 in favour of the residuary legatees. They are entitled to nothing out of the testator's estate until the £25,000 has been paid without deduction, pursuant to his covenant. The executors have to pay the settlement estate duty not simply because the statute requires them to pay it, but also because their testator has thrown the burden of it on his general estate, in exoneration of the £25,000 which was settled on his daughter. Similar observations apply to the trusts of the term of 2,000 years created by the testator's will to raise and pay the £25,000 in performance of his covenant—that is, without deduction as above explained. As between the daughter's trustees on the one side and the devisees of the estates subject to the term on the other side, the burden of the settlement estate duty falls on the latter and not on the former. In other words, the trustees of the term must, if necessary, raise and pay not only £25,000, but also the settlement estate duty payable in respect of it. The result, therefore, is that the decision appealed from must be reversed, and the duty in question, and the costs of the litigation, must be borne by the testator's general estate.

BURCHELL V. WILDE.*

Decision of Byrne, J. (ante, p. 171), affirmed.

This was an appeal against a decision of Mr. Justice Byrne's, reported in The Times of February 1 last, and ante, p. 171. The plaintiffs applied to the learned Judge for an interim injunction to restrain the defendants from carrying on business as solicitors under the name or style of "Burchell and Co." or under any other name or style of which "Burchell" or "Burchells" should form part. In 1874 J. W. Burchell, one of the two plaintiffs, was admitted a partner in the firm of "Burchells" and in the year

*Reported by W. L. CABELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

1882 a new partnership was constituted. The partners were W. Burchell, the elder, and W. Burchell, the younger, who subsequently ceased to be members of the firm, the defendant W. G. Wilde, and the plaintiffs J. W. Burchell and C. T. D. Burchell. They took the style of "Burchell and Co." By an agreement of June, 1893, the plaintiffs and the defendant W. G. Wilde agreed to continue in partnership as solicitors in continuation of their then partnership under the style of "Burchell and Co." at No. 5, The Sanctuary, Westminster. The defendant W. Wilde is a son of the defendant W. G. Wilde, and there were provisions for his being admitted into the partnership under certain conditions. In the year 1899, differences having arisen, the partnership was dissolved as from December 9, 1899. Under the terms of dissolution the plaintiffs acquired the offices at 5, The Sanctuary. The defendants are carrying on business in partnership at No. 36, Victoria-street, Westminster. When the action was commenced they used the firm name "Burchell and Co." Since the hearing by Mr. Justice Byrne they have adopted the firm name "Burchell, Wilde, and Co." The plaintiffs use the name "Burchells and Co." Mr. Justice Byrne declined to make any order upon the motion. He thought that upon principle it was difficult to see why the rights of any partner upon a dissolution, in circumstances such as those of the present case, in reference to the use of the firm name should be greater than the right of a purchaser who had bought the goodwill of the business. And, having regard to more recent decisions, his Lordship thought that "Banks v. Gibson" (34 Beav., 566) must be read subject to the qualification that the use of the old name must not expose the other partners to any liability. His Lordship was not satisfied that either of the plaintiffs would be under any tangible risk of liability if the defendants were to practise as "Burchell, Wilde, and Co." (as they were willing to do), especially if the plaintiffs were to use a style carrying their initials, or were to take the name of "Burchell and Burchell," or "Burchell, Burchell, and Co." The plaintiffs appealed.

Mr. Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Mr. W. E. Vernon were for the plaintiffs; Mr. Levett, Q.C., and Mr. Norton, Q.C., were for the defendant W. G. Wilde; Mr. Alexander, Q.C., and Mr. T. B. Napier were for the other defendant.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said that under the arrangement made upon the dissolution of partnership the clients' papers were to be divided between the partners. Nothing was said about the use of the firm name. The goodwill of the business was not to be sold for the benefit of the partners, but, so far as it depended upon the possession of the clients' papers, it was to be divided. It was left undetermined what was to be done about the use of the firm name. It followed that each partner was entitled to use the firm name, of which they all had been tenants in common, subject to a limitation which his Lordship would mention presently. This distinguished the present case from "Gray v. Smith" (43 Ch.D., 208) and similar cases. Apart from agreement a man had no right to represent that his late partner was still a partner with him. But were the defendants doing that? They had used the old firm name, and had since altered it to "Burchell, Wilde, and Co." Why did that represent that the plaintiffs in particular were partners with them? The defendants had, in the circulars which they had issued announcing the dissolution, taken pains to state who the partners were. In no business sense were they holding out that the plaintiffs were their partners, and there was no practical or tangible risk to the plaintiffs. Mr. Justice Byrne had decided the case on correct principle, and the appeal must be dismissed. It would, however, be more satisfactory if the defendants would give an undertaking to use the name "Burchell, Wilde, and Co."

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY and LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS concurred.

Mr. LEVETT and Mr. ALEXANDER said that their respective clients were ready to give the undertaking suggested and make an end of the matter if the plaintiffs would give a counter undertaking to use some such name as "Burchell and Burchell."

ELLIS V. ROWBOTHAM.*

Landlord and Tenant—Letting for a year—Rent
:—Payment by instalments.

Where, by an agreement, rent is payable in quarterly instalments in advance, the Apportionment Act does not apply if the tenant makes default and the landlord re-enters in the middle of a quarter.

Decision of Kennedy, J. (15 The Times L.R., 301), affirmed.

This was an appeal by the defendant from the judgment of Mr. Justice Kennedy at the trial of the action without a jury, reported in 15 The Times L.R., 301. The action was brought to recover the sum of £55 18s. 4d. for rent alleged to be due from the defendant to the plaintiff. By an agreement dated June 8, 1898, the plaintiff let the premises called Creek-house at Shepperton to the defendant for a year from June 10, 1898, till June 9, 1899, at the rent of 340 guineas. By the terms of the agreement the rent was to be payable as follows:—£189 5s. on taking possession; £55 18s. 4d., on September 10, 1898; and the same amount of £55 18s. 4d. on December 10, 1898, and on March 10, 1899. The defendant paid £189 5s. on going into possession, and also paid the instalment which became due on September 10, but he made default in payment of the instalment which became due on December 10. By the clause in the agreement as to re-entry, if any rent reserved by the agreement should be in arrear for fourteen days the landlord might, after giving one week's notice in writing, retake possession of the premises. But this was to be without prejudice to any other remedies the landlord might have. The writ in the action was issued on February 7, 1899, but was not served till February 21. The claim was for £55 18s. 4d., the instalment of rent which became due on December 10. On February 24 the plaintiff gave notice in accordance with the clause as to re-entry, and on March 2 he retook possession of the premises. The defendant contended that, by virtue of the Apportionment Act, 1870, rent must now be taken to accrue from day to day, and that the defendant was only liable for rent proportionate to the period during which he had actually occupied the house. The defendant paid into Court the sum of £15 14s. 5d., which he said was sufficient to satisfy the plaintiff's claim. Mr. Justice Kennedy gave judgment for the plaintiff.

Mr. C. A. RUSSELL, Q.C. (Mr. Frank Dodd with him), for the defendant, in support of the appeal said that by the Apportionment Act all rents were to be considered as accruing from day to day, and were to be apportionable in respect of time accordingly. The learned Judge had held that the Act did not apply to an agreement to pay rent in advance in specified sums on specified days. But the Act was express and general in its terms, and the matter could not be affected by the day on which the rent was made payable. [LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH.—Is not the Apportionment Act an Act passed for the benefit of landlords?] There was no reason why it should be so considered. The Act applied to "all rents," which must include rents payable in advance.

Mr. Rawlinson, Q.C., and Mr. Woodfin appeared for the plaintiff.

The COURT, without calling upon counsel for the plaintiff, dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said he was of opinion that the judgment of Mr. Justice Kennedy was right. The defendant relied on the Apportionment Act. By the common law, if a tenant who had agreed to pay rent in respect of each quarter at the end of the quarter went out of possession before the last day, the landlord received no rent for the current quarter. The effect of the Act was that now rent accrued due de die in diem, and the tenant who went out in the middle of a quarter was liable to payment of rent for the time during which he was in occupation. That did not seem to him to apply in any way to the present case. The rent in question accrued due long before the tenant went out of possession. By the agreement the rent fell due in advance as the quarters arrived. The defendant relied on the expression "all rents." But what the Act said was that all rents should be considered as accruing due from day to day. In his opinion that did not apply to a case where rent had already accrued due.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS said he was not free from doubt in this case, for he felt the force of the argument which had been addressed to them by Mr. Russell. But he did not differ from his learned brethren.

LORD JUSTICE ROMER said he thought that the Act only applied to sums accruing, not accrued, due at the time when the apportionment was said to be required, and that it did not apply to any sums duly and properly paid before the happening of the incident which was said to necessitate the apportionment. To hold otherwise would lead to extraordinary results not contemplated by the Legislature, and would put a forced and unsound construction on the Act. He would add, with regard to this particular agreement, that it seemed to him that by it the landlord was entitled to retain the rent reserved and paid in advance, though he subsequently became entitled to re-ent.

FOXWELL AND OTHERS V. VAN GRUTTEN.*

Will—Construction—Devise of real estate—Estate tail—Rule in Shelley's case—Gift over—Purchase.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (15 The Times L.R., 115) affirmed.

This was an appeal from part of an order of the Court of Appeal (Lords Justices A. L. Smith, Rigby, and Collins) dated December 14, 1898, and reported in 14 The Times L.R., 293; 15 ib., 115. This House on July 5, 1897, had ordered a new trial of the original action, and Mr. Justice Bigham on that trial dismissed the action, in which the appellants were plaintiffs and the respondent defendant. This decision was affirmed by the Court of Appeal. The arguments on the appeal to this House were heard on July 18, 20, and 21 last, when their Lordships reserved judgment. The action was brought to recover possession and an account of rents and profits and means profits of certain lands and hereditaments in the county of Cornwall, of which the defendant was in possession. These lands were shortly described as "Rosewarne." The appellants claimed to be entitled to Rosewarne as heirs in coparcenary of one William Harris, who died on December 8, 1815, having by his will, dated October 31, 1804, devised Rosewarne to his only child, Mary Harris, afterwards Mary Hartley, for an estate which has been held by this house to be an estate tail. The will contained a legal devise to trustees in fee, the trusts of the fee being declared in the words following:—"In trust in the first place to have, receive, and take the rents, incomes, issues, and profits of all and singular my said freehold lands and tenements and tyn bounds to and for the use and benefit of such my child or children as shall be living, or wherewith my wife may be ensient at the time of my death, and to pay, apply, and dispose of such rents, incomes, and profits, or such and so much thereof as they my said trustees, or the major part of them, or the survivors and survivor of them, or the heirs of such survivor shall deem right and proper into and about the maintenance and education of such child or children until he, she, or they shall severally and respectively attain the age of 21 years, or be married. And from and after such child or children shall have attained the age of 21 years or be married then in trust to permit and suffer such child or children as they shall severally attain the said age of 21 years or be married to have, receive, and take, if more than one, in equal shares and proportions the said rents, incomes, and profits of all and singular my said freehold lands, tenements, and hereditaments hereby devised to my said trustees to and for her, his, and their own use and benefit for and during the term of her, his, and their natural life and lives. And if I leave only one child and my wife not ensient, or if ensient and such child or children wherewith she may be ensient shall not be born alive or die before he, she, or they shall attain the age of 21 years or be married, then to permit and suffer in like manner such one child to have, receive, and take the said rents and profits of my said freehold lands, tenements, and hereditaments, tyn bounds, and premises to and for her or his sole use and benefit for and during the term of her or his natural life. And from and immediately after the death of such child or children then my will is that my said trustees shall stand seised and be possessed of all, every, and singular my said freehold lands, tenements, hereditaments, tyn bounds, and premises hereinbefore devised to them in trust unto and to the use of the heirs of the body and bodies of such child or children lawfully begotten; if more than one, to be equally divided between them, such freehold lands, tenements, hereditaments, tyn bounds, and premises to be legally conveyed and assured unto such heirs of my child or children in equal shares as they shall severally and respectively attain the age of 21 years or be married, and to their several and respective heirs and assigns for ever." Mary Harris in the year 1819 married one Winchcombe Henry Hartley, by whom she had one child only—namely, William Henry Harris Hartley. Mary Hartley died on October 22, 1868, without having, as the appellants contend, in any way dealt with or purported to deal with her interest under the said will. William Henry Harris Hartley (who was born on January 1, 1823) attained the age of 21 years on January 1, 1844, and died intestate and unmarried on June 27, 1894. Upon the death of William Henry Harris Hartley the respondent, Lucien Stanislaus Leon Van Grutten, who was a stranger in blood to the said William Harris, the testator, took possession of Rosewarne, claiming to be entitled thereto as heir to the said William Henry Harris Hartley through Winchcombe Henry Hartley, his father, who had left issue by a former wife prior to his marriage with the said Mary Harris. At the trial before Mr. Justice Bigham the respondent contended that although it was shown that under the clause above set out in William Harris's will Mary Hartley took an estate tail in Rosewarne which had never been barred, the appellants were not entitled to judgment in the action, for that William Henry Harris Hartley took, by virtue of the said clause, a remainder in fee expectant on the determination of such estate tail, and that such remainder in fee was now vested in the respondent by virtue of his heirship to William Henry Harris Hartley, as set forth above. This view was adopted by the Court of Appeal, and the appellants appealed to this House.

Mr. Crackanthorpe, Q.C., and Mr. Alderson Foote, Q.C., were for the appellants; Mr. Haldane, Q.C., Mr. T. H. Carson, and Mr. Boome for the respondent.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—The will of William Harris, the testator in this case, has in its time given occasion for a vast amount of discussion, profitable and otherwise. But, happily, there is very little room for argument in regard to the question which your Lordships are now called upon to decide. The point is a short one and plain enough, I think, if only you are content to take the testator's words as the guide to his meaning, and suppose it possible that the testator meant what he said. The will contains a devise to trustees (who are vested with the legal estate) of all the testator's lands, tenements, and hereditaments upon trust for the testator's children, if more than one, in equal shares as tenants in common in tail, or, if there should be but one child (as in the event happened), upon trust for that only child as tenant in tail. So far the construction of the will has been settled in this House. After the death of such child or children the trustees are directed to convey and assure the said lands, tenements, and hereditaments in fee simple to the heirs special "as they shall severally and respectively attain the age of 21 years or be married." The real question seems to be whether that direction is part and parcel of the machinery and apparatus employed by the testator in and about the limitation of the estates or estate tail, or whether it is an independent gift to take effect in favour of designated persons in the line of succession. Judicial opinion is divided on the subject. On the original trial, where the question arose indirectly, the latter view was adopted incidentally by all the members of the Court of Appeal, consisting of Lord Halsbury and Lords Justices Lopes and Rigby. In your Lordships' House it found favour with a majority, which included Lord Herschell and Lord Watson. On the rehearing it was supported by Mr. Justice Bigham in a very able and lucid judgment which was approved in the Court of Appeal by Lords Justices A. L. Smith and Rigby. But my noble and learned friend Lord Davey, on the former occasion, was of a different opinion, and on the rehearing Lord Justice Collins expressed "a strong preference" for Lord Davey's view. The learned Lord Justice begins by stating his belief as to what the meaning of the testator really was. He thinks that the testator meant to give a life estate to Mary Harris, who was his only child, and then to give "a remainder in fee simple" to her children. Before it was taken up by the appellants that was once Mr. Haldane's favourite contention. On the former occasion it was put forward as the principal ground of appeal. But then the parties to this litigation seem to me to have acted every now and then just like duellists in a play, dropping and exchanging their weapons, and each in his turn receiving the sharpest thrust from some point which was once his own. I cannot think Mr. Haldane lost very much when this weapon was forced out of his hand. It is difficult to grasp. And certainly there are serious flaws in it. The gift is to "the heirs of the body or bodies" of the testator's child or children—a technical expression which must be understood in its technical sense, unless it can be shown from the will that the expression was used in another sense, and that other sense can be ascertained. Now the majority of the noble and learned lords who heard this case originally were satisfied that there was nothing whatever in the will from first to last inconsistent with the words in question having their proper and technical meaning. There was nothing to be rejected, nothing to be modified. But the odd thing about this view is that when you have changed the expression "heirs of the body" into "children" you are further off than ever from an estate in fee simple. At the date when this will was made a gift of lands, tenements, and hereditaments to a designated person was a gift for life merely, and not a gift in fee. It is difficult to suppose that the person who drew the will was ignorant of an elementary rule of law which at that time was common knowledge with all lawyers, good, bad, and indifferent. The opinion of the Lord Justice as to the testator's real meaning is, I think, the key to his judgment. "What construction," he asks, "is to be placed on the concluding words of the clause directing the trustees to convey the legal estate at a given date to the persons whom he had intended to make the object of his bounty?" So framed the question bears on its face its own answer. But I need hardly remind your Lordships that there is no provision in the will directing the trustees "to convey the legal estate." The expression which the learned Judge attributes to the testator seems to be taken from a passage in one of the judgments in the former case where it was used to explain and enforce a particular view of the testator's meaning ([1897] A.C., p. 687, l. 21). If you restore the testator's own words, the question will then run:—"What construction is to be placed on the concluding words of the clause directing the trustees to convey the testator's lands, tenements, and hereditaments, at a given time to the persons whom he had intended to make the objects of his bounty?" Now, if you assume that the testator was under the impression that he had already given the proposed objects of his bounty an equitable "remainder in fee simple," the direction in question could only be intended, as the Lord Justice says, "to clothe these persons with the legal estate." There would be nothing upon which the direction could operate except the bare legal estate. But it is always dangerous, I think, to speculate on the unexpressed meaning of a testator. And there is much force in Lord Cranworth's observation that "it is not the duty of a Court of justice to search for the testator's meaning otherwise than by fairly interpreting the words he has used." "Abbott v. Middleton" (7 H.L.C., 68). There is one part of the judgment of Lord Justice Collins against which I feel bound to enter a respectful protest. The learned Lord Justice claims that his view has the support of the Lord Chancellor and Lord Justice Lopes, founding himself or rather speculating upon some interlocutory observations thrown out by them in the course of the argument and ignoring altogether the language of their considered judgment. It would, perhaps, be sufficient for the purposes of the present case if I were to content myself with pointing out what really took place during the argument, and what was really said in the judgment. The Lord Chancellor expressed no opinion of his own.

All that the Lord Chancellor did was to put into plain and pointed language a proposition which the learned counsel addressing the Court was aiming at with trope and metaphor. On that Lord Justice Lopes no doubt said something in approval of the proposition. "That is," he said, "exactly how it strikes me. That seems a reasonable way of considering the words." First impressions are always interesting, but sometimes second thoughts are best. In his written judgment Lord Justice Lopes points to "the provision that the trustees are ultimately to convey the fee simple to the beneficiaries," and concludes that they had the legal estate vested in them throughout, "that is," he adds, "until it became their duty to convey it in fee simple to those who were to be absolutely entitled." Now, your Lordships will notice that Lord Justice Lopes gives due effect to the words of limitation in the direction to the trustees. The conveyance, he says, was to be made "in fee simple." But more than that, it was to be made "to those who were to be absolutely entitled." What does that mean? It does not, of course, refer to acquisition of title by a disentailing assurance, for such an assurance would have got rid of the direction to the trustees as well as of the estate tail. It must mean "absolutely entitled" under the provisions of the will. But the only provision in the will under which the heirs special could become absolutely entitled is the gift to be found in the direction to convey. When you bear in mind that Lord Justice Lopes was under the impression (as appears from the shorthand notes) that the gift of the reversion in fee to a tenant in tail would operate to destroy the tenancy in tail and vest in the donee an immediate estate of fee simple in possession, his meaning is perfectly plain. It differs in nothing except in that one mistaken point from the opinion of Lord Herschell and those who agreed with him. Lord Herschell asks:—"What is there inconsistent with the creation of estates tail that the testator should direct his trustees to convey the reversion in fee to the heirs of the tenants in tail at a particular time?" Lord Justice Lopes speaks of the time when it would become "their duty to convey it in fee simple to those who were to be absolutely entitled." The language is all but identical. With the exception to which I have referred the meaning is precisely the same. Lord Justice Rigby expressed himself in very similar language. He observes that the extent of the legal estate vested in the trustees is shown to be nothing less than the fee simple "by the direction that the property is when the trust for maintenance ceases to be legally conveyed in fee simple." And the Lord Chancellor agreed with each of his colleagues. So there can be no doubt as to the opinion of every member of the Court. But to come to a matter of far greater importance than the opinion of individual Judges on a question of construction I must say I rather doubt the expediency of treating a casual remark thrown out in the course of the argument by a Judge, however eminent, as something committing him to an opinion or as being in any way binding upon anybody else. A Judge who interposes in the course of counsel's address does so, I should imagine, either to invite attention to some difficulty which occurs to him at the moment, and which counsel ought to have an opportunity of meeting or else to elicit some information which he thinks, rightly or wrongly, will not come from counsel in due course, or perhaps to direct and shorten the argument, though I know some people fancy that interruptions from the Bench have not the effect of shortening arguments—at least not always. But the very last thing that a Judge means to do when he interrupts counsel is to express an opinion on any matter still open to debate. When the case was before your Lordships on the former occasion I intimated my view on the present question. It was necessary to consider the meaning and effect of the clause. Almost every Judge before whom the case came took it into consideration, though in the result it did not form a ground of the decision of the House. I am not going to repeat what I said then. I am quite prepared to accept the judgment of Mr. Justice Biggam as expressing more fully and more clearly the view which I was led to take. I would only venture to add a very few words. On a critical examination of the will I am inclined to think that the clause now in question did not form part of the instrument as originally prepared. It seems probable that originally the gift to the collateral relations was intended to take effect in every case on the determination of the previous limitations. If this suggestion be well founded it would account for the way in which the direction to the trustees is introduced. It was introduced, I think, by way of amendment, and causes perhaps a little awkwardness in the run of the sentence as amendments so introduced frequently do. However that may be, when once the testator determined that the gift to the collaterals was not to take effect if any one of the tenants in tail married or attained 21, the question must have suggested itself—What is to become of the reversion in fee if that condition is fulfilled? Surely the most obvious and the most natural thing for the testator to do was to give it in that case to his own issue fulfilling the prescribed conditions. The learned counsel who spoke second for the appellants argued, as I understood him, that the reversion expectant on the determination of an estate tail was so shadowy and trumpery a thing that no testator would be likely to concern himself about it at all. I do not think that this is the general opinion among people who have property of that sort to dispose of. Certainly this testator, who evidently bestowed much thought and care on the disposition of his property, did concern himself about this reversion, and that in a very special manner. The learned counsel for the appellant, adopting the argument of Lord Justice Collins, laid much stress on the words "such heirs." The Lord Justice observes that, "the words 'heirs of the body' being once decided to be words of limitation only, the words 'such heirs' following cannot, without undue straining, be interpreted to mean individuals who are to be the objects of a new gift." Now I must say that I cannot follow that observation. No doubt the words "heirs of the body" have been decided to be words of limitation only. What difference could it make if they were words of purchase also? Heirs of the body who take by descent are just as much human beings and just as much individuals as heirs of the body who take by purchase. If a testator chooses to make a gift to heirs of the body taking by descent "as and when they shall attain 21 or be married," I cannot see what difficulty there is in ascertaining the persons intended. If the clause is to be construed as meaning only that the trustees are to convey the legal estate when their active duties have come to an end there is no difficulty about the matter. But the advocates of that construction contend that if it is the reversion in fee which is to be conveyed, and not a bare legal estate, a sort of mist or darkness descends upon the scene, and no one can find the persons to take, though they are the very same persons who on the other construction would take the legal estate, and are described by the very same words. In my opinion the expression "such heirs" creates no difficulty. It refers to the preceding words, and means, of course, "heirs of the body or bodies of the testator's child or children"—the persons forming as they come into existence the whole line of succession capable of inheriting. But, however numerous they may be, the first in the line on attaining 21 or marrying carries off the whole estate or the whole share, as the case may be, and there is nothing left for those who come after. That is, I think, the solution of the suggested difficulty. I had thought at one time that the difference of view which has been expressed in this case might possibly have sprung out of the notion, which prevailed with the Court of Appeal on the former occasion, that the gift of the reversion in fee to a tenant in tail would have the effect of merging or defeating the tenancy in tail. Certainly if the gift of the reversion had such an effect, I should have admitted that the limitations in this will were so unmeaning and whimsical that there would have been some difficulty in construing the words of the testator in their natural and ordinary sense. But after the argument we have heard I rather think that the difference of opinion is due to the very different estimates formed of the capacity of the lawyer who drew this will. It was suggested in argument, and broadly hinted, I think, by the Court of Appeal in the former case, that the lawyer who drew the will was so incompetent that his words were hardly deserving of close and serious attention. On the other hand, there are some who think that the draftsman of this will was a fairly competent lawyer. And I confess I share that opinion. I do not even see any evidence to prove that he did not know or appreciate the rule in Shelley's case as well as it was known and appreciated at the time. The will was drawn in what may be called the dark ages, when Lord Eldon confessed that his mind was "overpowered" by the number and perplexity of the decisions. But I think it is extremely likely that the draftsman of the will was not acquainted with the case of "Harton v. Harton," which was decided only a short time before the date of the will, and, as far as I can make out, not even reported then. Certainly it had not then acquired the authority which, in spite of Lord Eldon's criticism and the qualified approval or disapproval of Vice-Chancellor Wigram, it afterwards acquired. It was the rule laid down in "Harton v. Harton," or rather, I should say, the rule derived from that case, which as it seems to me upset the draftsman's calculations. Another argument addressed to your Lordships was that the direction to the trustees might be rejected altogether on the strength of a well-known line of cases which decide that limitations superadded to a gift to heirs of the body which are inconsistent with the devolution of an estate tail are to be rejected. But why are they rejected? They are rejected because they are repugnant to the gift. But no one can say that a gift of the reversion in fee to a tenant in tail (if that be the true construction of the testator's will) is repugnant to the gift of the tenancy in tail. On the contrary, it is perfectly consistent with it. It seems to me that if you construe the will fairly, giving to technical expressions their technical meaning, and to expressions not technical their ordinary and grammatical signification, you have a sensible construction perfectly natural and quite consistent with the scheme of the will. In my opinion the testator meant exactly what he said, and deliberately provided for the event which actually occurred. If I am told that, after all, that is a matter of opinion on which no certain judgment can be pronounced, I can only take refuge in Lord Thurlow's maxim, that "the good sense of all these cases is to believe that, where persons have expressed themselves right, they knew what they meant" ("Jones v. Morgan," 1 Bro.C.C., 221). I think the Court of Appeal was perfectly right, and therefore I move your Lordships that the appeal be dismissed. Your Lordships have been given to understand that an arrangement has been made between the parties as to the costs of the appeal. It will therefore not be necessary to say anything about costs.

LORD MORRIS and LORD SHAND concurred.

LORD DAVEY.—I have endeavoured to consider the point of construction on this will which has now been fully argued, and is directly brought before us for decision, with an open mind, unprejudiced by anything which was said by me on the former occasion. But I am bound to say that I cannot find any sufficient reason for altering the substance of the opinion I then expressed. It has been said that opinions were expressed by both Lord Herschell and Lord Watson on this point in agreement with that of my noble and learned friend Lord Macnaghten. I need scarcely say that if I found myself at variance with the deliberate judgments of these eminent lawyers as well as that of my noble and learned friend, I would bow to authority and not trouble your Lordships with any observations of my own. But the point was not argued at the bar on the previous occasion, and it was not necessary for the judgment then pronounced, because the present respondents were then insisting on the validity of a disentailing deed which, if established, would have barred all subsequent limitations, including the one in question, if it be a new limitation. I therefore feel myself at liberty shortly to state the grounds upon which I adhere to my previous opinion. It is quite true that I was in error in speaking of the opposite construction as operating a defeasance of the estate tail. I used the expression inadvertently in reference to a suggestion to that effect in the judgment of Lord Justice Rigby. If anything, it is a remainder to take effect on the termination of the estate tail. But that accidental slip does not alter the substance of my opinion that the words in question do not create a new limitation but are merely ancillary to the previous limitation, which we have construed to be an estate tail (in the events which happened) in Mary. The words are, "such freehold lands, &c., to be legally conveyed and assured unto such heirs of my child or children in equal shares as they shall severally and respectively attain the age of 21 years, or be married, and to their several and respective heirs and assigns for ever." The will is obviously drawn by a draftsman who was acquainted with legal phraseology, but not a sufficiently good lawyer to be master of it or know how to use it accurately. A succession of estates is carefully provided for in the will, and in every other instance a new limitation is introduced with the appropriate language for that purpose. The words "to be legally conveyed, &c.," follow immediately after the words "to be equally divided, &c.," which are clearly ancillary to or rather form part of the previous gift to the heirs of the body. So far as the form of the clause goes it appears to me appropriate for expressing a direction annexed to the previous gift and inappropriate for creating a new gift in succession. Then, again, who are referred to as "such heirs"? According to the scheme of the will and the conception of the testator they mean a class of persons whom he describes as heirs of the body of his children, and between whom he desired his estate to be divided on their deaths. According to their legal construction the words used by the testator included all the heirs of the body taking in a course of succession, and, therefore, the rule in Shelley's case applies. But the construction of the clause in question adopted in the Courts below appears to me to confine the description in that clause to the first members of the class who attain 21 or marry, and so to give a meaning to the words different from that which they bear in the previous gift. This testator did not know or forgot the rule in Shelley's case, and in my opinion he has attempted to engraft on words which created an estate tail, a direction to convey to the heirs in tail in fee simple. Such a direction is repugnant and may be disregarded, as has been held in a line of cases beginning with "Goodright v. Pullyn" (2 Lord Raymond, 1,437) and

"Wright v. Pearson" (Amb., 358). I think my noble and learned friend has been too severe in his criticism of the judgment of Lord Justice Collins. The rule in Shelley's case is a rule of law, and not a rule of construction, and in its application frequently overrules the intention plainly expressed on the face of the will where it is one which the law cannot carry into effect. I believe that such is the case on the will before us. It seems to me extravagant to suggest that this testator intended or supposed that his children would take more than a life estate. But the law says otherwise, and must prevail. For the purpose, however, of construing such words as those we have before us, and saying whether they create a new limitation or one to be regarded only as an ancillary provision to the previous limitation, I think it is legitimate to look to the intention expressed in the instrument, although it is not one which can be carried into effect, modo et forma, and this I understand to be the basis of the learned Lord Justice's argument. The Lord Justice was, of course, aware that under the old law a gift to one without words of limitation passed only a life estate unless a contrary intention appeared on the will. But I presume the Lord Justice would have said, if he had been asked, that he found such an intention in the direction to the trustees to convey to the heirs of the body in fee simple. The second point argued by Mr. Crackanthorpe depends on the true construction of the settlement of August 31, 1819, made by Mrs. Hartley on her marriage. It raises questions of some difficulty and nicety. But as I understand that the majority of your Lordships are in favour of the respondents on the principal point argued, in which case these questions do not arise, it is unnecessary for me to express any opinion upon them. As I understand the costs of the appeal have been arranged by the parties themselves, I will not say anything about them.

LORD BRAMPTON read a judgment to the effect that the appeal should be dismissed.

Court of Appeal (A. L. Smith, } 1900.
Collins, and Romer, L.JJ.) } March 9.

THE GUARDIANS OF THE POOR OF THE BRAMLEY UNION
V. THE GUARANTEE SOCIETY.*

Principal and Surety—Guarantee—Fidelity policy—Clerk to guardians—Guarantee as to faithful discharge of duties—Loss, whether within policy.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs from the judgment of Mr. Justice Day at the trial of the action without a jury, reported in The Times of March 17, 1899. The action was brought on a fidelity policy issued to the plaintiffs, the guardians of Bramley, by which the defendant society, to the extent of £300, guaranteed that Alexander Wiley, the clerk to the plaintiffs, would duly and faithfully discharge all and every the duties of his office. Wiley, after having served the plaintiffs as clerk for a number of years, was dismissed for misconduct in 1896. It appeared that down to 1890 annual elections of guardians were held, in respect of which Wiley received certain fees. In 1890 a resolution for triennial elections was passed, and Wiley asked for compensation. Down to 1890 he received £255 per annum and a fee in respect of each election. On June 30, 1890, a resolution was passed by the guardians for an increase of his pay. The resolution was that his salary should thenceforth be £410 per annum, to include salary for general duties and services in connexion with the settlement and removal of the poor, and conducting all future guardians' elections, and the proceedings connected therewith. The salary was under the control of the Local Government Board, as the guardians could only recommend the amount subject to the sanction of the Local Government Board. It was the duty of Wiley to communicate the resolution to the Local Government Board, but instead of sending the whole resolution he suppressed the words "and conducting all future guardians' elections, and the proceedings connected therewith." The Local Government Board approved of the increase, and, before the plaintiffs discovered the misrepresentation which had been made by Wiley, he received from them in excess of his previous salary sums exceeding £300. The plaintiffs brought this action to recover that sum under their policy. They contended that there was a loss covered by the policy, which was caused by Wiley not faithfully discharging his duties; that the amount of the loss was the increase of salary which Wiley had obtained by deliberately suppressing part of the resolution of the guardians and thereby obtaining the approval of the Local Government to the resolution; and that such approval was, in the circumstances, no approval at all, as it was an approval of a resolution which had never been passed, and was therefore invalid; and the plaintiffs could have recovered the extra salary from Wiley as money paid under a mistake of fact. Mr. Justice Day gave judgment for the defendants.

Mr. C. A. Russell, Q.C., and Mr. S. G. Lushington appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. English Harrison, Q.C., and Mr. Boydell Houghton appeared for the defendants.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that the question was whether Wiley, in knowingly sending the resolution of the guardians, with part of it omitted, to the Local Government Board for approval, was duly and faithfully discharging the duties of his office within the meaning of the policy. In his Lordship's opinion he was clearly not. It was not necessary to say whether there was any fraud. He was unable to agree with Mr. Justice Day. There was a good cause of action upon the policy. The guardians were therefore entitled to be recouped the loss caused by Wiley's not having duly and faithfully discharged his duties. With regard to the damages they would be referred to the Official Referee, who would report his findings to this Court, and then judgment would be entered.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS and LORD JUSTICE ROMER concurred.

Upon the application of counsel, it was ordered that, if the parties agreed upon the figures, the damages need not be assessed by the Official Referee, and the case would come back for judgment upon the agreed figures.

BURGE V. ASHLEY AND SMITH (LIMITED).*

Gaming—Stakeholder—Right to recover deposit—Gaming Act, 1892.

Money deposited with a stakeholder to abide the event of a boxing match is not money "paid" under or in respect of a wagering contract within the meaning of the Gaming Act, 1892, and can be recovered from the stakeholder if demanded before payment over to the winner.

"O'Sullivan v. Thomas" ([1895] 1 Q.B., 698) approved and followed.

*Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq. Barrister-at-Law.

This was an appeal by the defendants from the judgment of Mr. Justice Lawrance. The case raised an important question under the Gaming Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict., c. 9). The action was brought to recover £300 deposited with the defendants as stakeholders, to be paid over to the winner of a boxing match. A boxing match was arranged between the plaintiff and a man known as Bobby Dobbs, of New York, for £300 aside and the best purse offered. The plaintiff and Dobbs deposited £300 each with the defendants, who were the proprietors of the Sportsman, as stakeholders. The match was fought at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, and Dobbs was declared the winner. Subsequently, but before the stakes were paid over by the defendants to the winner, the plaintiff gave the defendants notice not to pay the £300 which he had deposited with them to Dobbs, but to pay it back to him. The defendants, notwithstanding the notice, paid the sums to the winner. The plaintiff thereupon brought this action, and the defendants contended that no action would lie by reason of section 1 of the Gaming Act, 1892. That section provides that "any promise, express or implied, to pay any person any sum of money paid by him under or in respect of any contract or agreement rendered null and void by the Act of the eighth and ninth of Victoria, chapter one hundred and nine, or to pay any sum of money by way of commission, fee, reward, or otherwise in respect of any such contract, or of any services in relation thereto or in connexion therewith, shall be null and void, and no action shall be brought or maintained to recover any such sum of money." The plaintiff contended that the old law prior to that Act was not altered, under which a sum of money which had been deposited with a stakeholder could be recovered from the stakeholder if claimed from him before he had paid it over to the winner (see "Diggle v. Higgs," 2 Ex. D., 422); and that the Divisional Court, consisting of Mr. Justice Wills and Mr. Justice Wright, in "O'Sullivan v. Thomas" ([1895] 1 Q.B., 698), had so held. Mr. Justice Lawrance held, upon the authority of this last case, that the plaintiff was entitled to recover, and he gave judgment accordingly.

Mr. DUKE, Q.C., and Mr. W. ELLIS HILL, for the defendants, contended that the decision in "O'Sullivan v. Thomas" ([1895] 1 Q.B., 698) was wrong, and ought to be overruled. Before the Gaming Act, 1892, the plaintiff could have recovered the deposit if he claimed it before the defendants had paid it over to the winner. But the law had been altered by section 1 of the Gaming Act, 1892, and the present case came within the very words of that Act, because the £300 was a sum "paid" by the plaintiff to the stakeholder under or in respect of a contract made void by the Gaming Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict., c. 109), section 18, and the action was based upon an implied promise by the defendants to pay back this sum. The intention of the Act was to sweep away any implied promise to pay a sum of money under or in respect of a contract rendered null and void by 8 and 9 Vict., c. 109. Clearly the contract in the present case was a gaming contract and was rendered null and void by section 18 of 8 and 9 Vict., c. 109, and therefore the implied promise to pay a sum of money in respect of such contract was itself rendered null and void. The obligation of the defendants was based upon an implied contract to repay the amount of the deposit to the plaintiff if it was claimed before payment over to the person entitled. The Act of 1892 did away with that implied promise. The word "paid" in the Act covered a deposit with a stakeholder. The decision of the Court of Appeal in "Carney v. Plimmer" ([1897] 1 Q.B., 634) was in favour of the defendants, especially the judgment delivered by Lord Justice Chitty (at p. 637). They also referred to "Shoolbred v. Roberts" ([1899] 2 Q.B., 560), "Read v. Anderson" (13 Q.B.D., 779).

Mr. Ashworth Harrison (Mr. Marshall Hall, Q.C., with him), for the plaintiff, was not called upon.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that the question was whether the case of "O'Sullivan v. Thomas" was or was not rightly decided. It must be taken that each party had deposited the sum of £300 with the defendants, and that the plaintiff gave notice to the defendants, before the sums had been paid to the winner, not to pay the £300 deposited by him to the winner of the match. The question was whether the Gaming Act, 1892, prevented the plaintiff from recovering the sum so deposited by him. That depended upon whether it was a sum of money "paid" by him within the meaning of section 1 of that Act. He did not think that a person who deposited a sum of money with a stakeholder would say that he had paid it to the stakeholder. In "Strachan v. Universal Stock Exchange" ([1895] 2 Q.B., 697) the decisions on the Act of 8 and 9 Vict., c. 109, were discussed, and he (the Lord Justice) said that "it is manifest that no action can be brought by the one against the other to enforce any contract so declared to be void; but it has been held by authorities, which it is far too late now to question, that as soon as one party to a gaming contract receives notice from the other party that the former declines to abide any longer by the wagering contract money deposited by him thereupon ceases to be money deposited in the hands of the latter 'to abide the event upon which any wager shall have been made'; and any money still in the latter's hands unappropriated by him becomes money of the former, without any good reason for the latter detaining it; and in such circumstances an action for money had and received to the plaintiff's use will lie." That was a summary of the opinion of the learned Judges in the prior decisions. In his opinion the defendants could not bring themselves within the first branch of section 1 of the Act of 1892. Nor, for the same reason, could they bring themselves within the second branch of that section. A deposit with a stakeholder was not a sum "paid" to him within the meaning of the Act. It was now attempted to stretch the Act so as to include a deposit of a sum of money with a stakeholder. No such words were in the Act. It would be passing strange that, if such were intended, proper words to cover such a common and well-known case had not been inserted in the Act. With regard to the authorities, "O'Sullivan v. Thomas" was exactly in point. In that case the Divisional Court held that the Act of 1892 applied to a payment out and out, and did not apply to a deposit with a stakeholder. In his opinion that case was rightly decided. The case of "Carney v. Plimmer" was quite a different case, though a dictum of Lord Justice Chitty was relied upon by the defendants. But that learned Judge was not thinking of such a case as the present, and it was to be noted that, though "O'Sullivan v. Thomas" was referred to in the argument, it was never mentioned in the judgment. In his opinion the judgment of Mr. Justice Lawrance was right, and must be affirmed.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS concurred. The case was virtually an appeal from the decision of the Divisional Court in "O'Sullivan v. Thomas." The question was whether the Gaming Act, 1892, had substituted a new law for that existing under the Gaming Act, 1845. Under the earlier Act it was well settled that a person who deposited money with a stakeholder could recover it back if he claimed it from the stakeholder before it was paid over by the latter. Then came the Gaming Act, 1892. It was suggested that the true reading of that Act was that it was no longer possible for the person depositing the money to recover it from the stakeholder. It was said that the money deposited was money "paid" by the depositor to the stakeholder within the meaning of the Act, and that, as it was paid under a wagering contract, that was a contract rendered null and void by the Gaming Act, 1845, there was an implied promise to repay it, and that implied promise was rendered null and void by the Act of 1892. The words of the Act seemed capable of covering such a case. But the Court must look further. The Act of 1892 was passed after a long current of authorities, and if it was intended to overrule them, he would expect to find apt words in the Act to carry out that intention. There were no such apt words in the Act. Further, one could not shut one's eyes to the fact that the Act was passed after the decision in "Read v. Anderson," and it was intended to deal with that decision. The Act was passed with the intention of dealing with cases where money was paid in the full sense of the term. He could not escape the conclusion that the Act was "passed alio intuitu so far as this case was concerned. In his opinion the word "paid," though it was possible to construe it as covering the case of money deposited with a stakeholder, yet coming where it did and at the crisis when it did, did not, upon its true construction in this section, cover the deposit of a sum with a stakeholder. Such a sum was merely handed to a stakeholder with a mandate to pay it in a certain event to a particular person.

LORD JUSTICE ROMER delivered judgment to the same effect.

Court of Appeal (A. L. Smith, } 1900.
Collins, and Romer, L.JJ.) } March 10.
FENN V. MILLER.*

Master and Servant—Master's liability to servant—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897—Employment "on, in, or about a factory"—Accident occurring at a distance from factory—"About," meaning of.

This was an appeal from the award of Judge French, Q.C., sitting at Bow County Court, under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. The appellant, the employer, was a builder, and was building houses upon a building estate which was being developed at Chingford, in Essex. At the time of the accident the houses were between 5ft. and 6ft. in height. There were two steam engines in sheds on different parts of the building estate used for working two mortar mills for the purpose of making mortar for the buildings. The respondent on the appeal, who claimed compensation under the Act, was a builder's labourer in the employment of the appellant, and his duty was to drive or conduct a water-cart and horse along a public road to Ching Brook to fetch water for the engines and the mortar mills. On March 13, 1899, the respondent had gone with the cart to the brook, and on his way back to the mortar mill the horse ran away and knocked the respondent down and the cart went over him. For the injuries thus caused he claimed compensation. The spot where the accident happened was about 110 yards to 160 yards distant from the nearest engine. The County Court Judge held that the respondent was at the time of the accident employed "about" the engine shed, and therefore about a factory within section 7 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, and he made an award in his favour for 15s. a week.

Mr. RAWLINSON, Q.C. (Mr. P. Rose-Innes with him), for the appellant, contended that the question was whether the respondent was employed "on or in or about a factory" within the meaning of section 7 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. The steam engines working the mortar mills were "factories" within the Act, as decided in "McNicholas v. Dawson" ([1899] 1 Q.B., 773). But the respondent was not employed "about" the factory within the meaning of the Act. "About" meant in close propinquity or in physical contiguity to the factory—"Powell v. Brown" ([1899] 1 Q.B., 157); "Lowth v. Ibbotson" ([1899] 1 Q.B., 1,003). There was no evidence that the respondent was employed about the factory when the accident happened. A man might be employed about the business of the factory, and yet not employed about the factory. The County Court Judge was therefore wrong. He also referred to "Holness v. Mackay" ([1899] 2 Q.B., 319).

Mr. RUEGG, Q.C., and Mr. W. M. THOMPSON, for the respondent, contended that, this being a building estate with buildings being erected on it, and there being on the estate a steam engine, which was a factory within the Act, and which was used in connexion with the building of the houses, the estate might be considered as in the position of a factory yard. It was a question of fact in each case for the County Court Judge whether the workman was at the time of the accident employed "about" a factory. It was not a question of law. Where could the Court draw the line? Would 100 yards away from the factory, or 50 yards, or ten yards, be the limit? The Court had never yet in such a case interfered with the finding of the County Court Judge. "Chambers v. Whitehaven Commissioners" ([1899] 2 Q.B., 132) was referred to.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that, in his opinion, the facts in the present case showed that the finding of the County Court Judge was wrong. But he felt a difficulty in the case, which he would state presently. There were two mortar mills worked by steam engines, and the respondent was employed to take a water-cart to a brook in order to fill it with water, and then to return with it to the mills. While returning from the brook to the mill along a public road the horse ran away and knocked the respondent down and injured him. The place where the accident happened was from 110 yards to 160 yards distant from the nearest engine. It was quite clear from the decision in "McNicholas v. Dawson" that the engine was a "factory" within the meaning of section 7 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. Therefore the question was whether the respondent was employed "on or in or about a factory" within the meaning of section 7. It he (the Lord Justice) had been the judge of fact in the case he would not have found that the employment was "about" the factory. The County Court Judge considered that the word "about" was an elastic word, and that he was entitled to say that 110 yards away from the factory was "about" the factory, that was, in close propinquity thereto, as he (the Lord Justice) had expressed its meaning in "Powell v. Brown," or in physical contiguity thereto, as Lord Justice Collins had expressed it in the same case. The difficulty he (the Lord Justice) had was in saying that there was no evidence upon which the County Court Judge could so find. In "Powell v. Brown" a cart belonging to the owners of a factory was standing in a street close to the entrance of the factory yard where timber was usually loaded from the factory on to carts. The workman was employed in loading the cart, and in doing so was injured. The question was whether he was employed "about" the factory. This Court undoubtedly held that the word "about," following the words "on or in," was an enlarging word, intended to cover more than was included in the preceding words. He (the Lord Justice) said it meant in close propinquity;

*Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Lord Justice Collins used the words physically contiguous. In "Chambers v. Whitehaven Commissioners" the Court held that the word "about" indicated locality, and he had said that the locality of the accident must be within the purview of the section, and that the employment must be on, in, or about the named locality at the time of the accident. In "Lowth v. Ibbotson" a workman met with an accident a mile and a half away from the factory, and the County Court Judge held that he was not at the time of the accident employed "about" the factory. This Court held that the Judge was right. In those cases he had said, and he thought that the other Judges also said, that the question whether the employment was about a factory was a question of fact for the County Court Judge to decide. He saw no reason to withdraw from what he had then said. In the present case the workman was conducting a cart along a public highway when he was injured, the accident happening not less than 110 yards from the factory. If he (the Lord Justice) had to determine whether the workman at the time of the accident was employed about the factory he would say no. But the difficulty he felt was in saying that there was no evidence upon which the County Court Judge could say that the employment was about the factory. However, though he felt great difficulty in saying that there was no evidence, inasmuch as his brethren were of opinion that there was no evidence to justify the finding of the County Court Judge, he would not differ from the conclusion at which they had arrived.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS said that he agreed that in each case it was a question of fact for the County Court Judge, and that this Court could not interfere with the finding of the Judge on a question of fact where there was evidence to support his finding. But a County Court Judge could not under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, any more than under any other Act, exercise that jurisdiction without any evidence to support his finding or without a proper direction to himself. If the case were one that could be tried with a jury the County Court Judge would have to give the jury a direction as to what constituted employment "about" a factory. He could not simply tell them that it was a question of fact for them whether the employment was about a factory when the accident happened and then leave it to them without any further direction to say whether in fact the employment was about a factory. He would have to give them some direction upon the word "about." Under the Act of 1897 the Judge must direct himself. It was not easy to define what constituted employment "about" a factory. Still he thought that a Judge could give some assistance to a jury by giving illustrations of cases which would or would not be employment about a factory, or by giving extreme cases which would obviously fall on one side or the other of a line which had to be drawn. Here it was quite possible to point out extreme limits on the one side and on the other, limits which were to be observed and avoided. In his opinion the word "about" was a geographical expression, and denoted physical contiguity. It was not enough to establish that the workman was about the business of his master. There was that broad distinction. A factory presumably involved the carrying on of some business. Take the case of a factory where some article of commerce was produced. The article had to be manufactured and distributed over the country. In all probability coals would be required for the factory, and he should say that the carter who fetched the coals for the factory would be employed about the business of, but not in physical contiguity to, the factory. The jury would have to disabuse their minds of the idea that, because a man was employed about the business, he was therefore employed about the factory. What, then, was employment "about" a factory? A case obviously within the line was where a factory involved the use of an area of land outside the physical factory itself. In such a case he would say that the piece of land was about the factory. It was easy to give illustrations. In "Powell v. Brown" the cart upon which the man was working was outside the physical limits of the factory, but was receiving timber from the factory at the usual and accustomed place of loading. There the Court held that the employment was about the factory. It was easy to put cases which fell inside and outside the line, and it would be for the jury, if that were the proper tribunal, to say whether the particular case before them fell inside or outside the line. He drew a clear distinction between employment about the business, involving no physical contiguity with the factory, and such a physical contiguity with the factory as a jury might say was necessary for the purposes of the business. Applying the above considerations to the present case, he did not think that the facts brought the case within the rule above mentioned as to physical contiguity. It might therefore well be said that there was no evidence upon which a jury could reasonably find that the employment here at the time of the accident was "about" the factory. That being so, there was no evidence upon which the County Court Judge could so find. His decision must therefore be reversed.

LORD JUSTICE ROMER was of the same opinion. It was clear that when the Act spoke of "on, or in, or about" a factory it was speaking of a place. It was not necessary or advisable to attempt to lay down general rules and propositions as to when a man could or could not be properly said to be on, or in, or about a factory or a building. He would not attempt to do so. He would, however, go as far as this. A man who, at the time when the accident occurred, was only employed in driving or conducting a cart containing materials necessary for the business of the factory to or from the factory, and was not in obvious proximity to the factory, was not employed on, or in, or about the factory. The facts in the present case clearly showed that at the time of the accident the workman was in no true sense employed on, or in, or about his master's factory. He agreed with Lord Justice Collins that there was no evidence that the workman was so employed. If this case had been tried with a jury, assuming, of course, such a mode of trial were possible, he thought that the Judge should have ruled that there was no evidence to go to them that the workman was so employed.

Court of Appeal (A. L. Smith, } 1900.

COOPER V. DAVENPORT—WINSTANLEY, THIRD PARTY.*
Master and Servant—Master's liability to servant—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897—Sub-contractors—Indemnity—"Undertakers," who are.

This was an appeal from the award of the Warrington County Court Judge under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. The applicant for compensation was the widow of a deceased workman who had been in the employment of the appellant, William Winstanley. The respondent, Charles William Davenport, was a builder, and he had entered into a contract with the Warrington guardians to build a workhouse infirmary. Davenport sublet the plumbing work of the building to Winstanley.

*Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The deceased man Cooper was employed by Winstanley, and on September 28, 1899, he was at work on a scaffolding on some of the plumbing work—namely, fixing the piping to the exterior of the building—when the scaffolding gave way, and he fell and was killed. The building exceeded 30ft. in height, and was being constructed by means of a scaffolding. The deceased man's widow claimed compensation under the Act against Davenport, and Davenport thereupon claimed to be indemnified by Winstanley, under section 4 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. The County Court Judge made an award in favour of the widow for £260 as against Davenport, and ordered Winstanley to indemnify Davenport in respect of that amount. Winstanley appealed.

Mr. RUSSELL, Q.C. (Mr. Hartley with him), for the appellant, contended that, as the Court had already decided that a sub-contractor was not an "undertaker" within the Act, and was therefore not liable to pay compensation—"Cass v. Butler" (ante, p. 227)—the appellant was not liable to pay compensation, and, that being so, he was not liable under section 4 to indemnify the contractor Davenport, who was the undertaker, and therefore liable. Section 4 only provided that the undertakers should be entitled to be indemnified by any other person who would have been liable independently of that section. That did not apply to a sub-contractor, who was not made liable by the Act at all. The undertakers could only claim indemnity from a person who was himself liable to pay compensation under the Act.

Mr. C. A. RUSSELL, Q.C. (Mr. E. Acton with him), for the respondent, Davenport, contended that the decision in "Cass v. Butler" did not touch the present case, though some of the reasons given by the Court were not favourable to the respondent's contention. In order to see who was liable to indemnify, section 4 must be considered as cut out of the Act. That section said, "who would have been liable independently of this section." Independently of section 4, a sub-contractor was an "undertaker," and would be liable as such. Therefore a sub-contractor was bound to indemnify under section 4. [LORD JUSTICE ROMER.—That argument is dead in the teeth of "Cass v. Butler." It was the argument addressed to us in that case, which we rejected.] The decision in that case did not touch the present point. If section 4 were out of the Act, a sub-contractor would be an undertaker within the meaning of sections 1 and 7.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that the point which had been taken by the respondent was not open. It had been decided in "Cass v. Butler" that a sub-contractor was not an undertaker within the Act. He saw no ground for quarrelling with the reasons which were given for that decision. A person could only be liable to pay compensation under the Act if he was an undertaker. A sub-contractor was not an undertaker, and was therefore not liable to pay compensation under the Act. He was not therefore liable to indemnify another person liable under section 4.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS concurred. The meaning of the word undertakers was given in section 7 of the Act. Any reference in section 4 to that point would merely be corroboration of the meaning of the word in the Act. Section 4 might be of assistance in helping the Court to construe the word, but the meaning was given in the definition clause.

LORD JUSTICE ROMER agreed.

FRID V. FENTON.*

Master and Servant—Master's liability to servant—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897—Building being "constructed."

A building is in course of construction within the Act until the scaffolding has been taken down.

This was an appeal from the award of Sir W. L. Selfe, the Judge of the Rochester County Court, under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. The respondent on the appeal was in the employment of the appellant, who was constructing a shaft at the cement works of Messrs. Francis and Co., at Cliffe. The respondent was employed as a bricklayer on the work. The shaft was a brickwork erection 100ft. high, resting upon cement foundations. The shaft was built at the top of a perpendicular bank or precipice about 20ft. high. For the purpose of doing the work it was necessary to erect a staging from the lower level to the top of the foundations. This staging was about 20ft. in height from the lower level to the top of the cement foundations, and was constructed in the manner in which a scaffolding was usually constructed—namely, by poles, ledgers, and putlogs. At the top of the staging, on a level with the top of the cement foundations, boards were laid to form a flooring. The only access to the work was by means of the staging and from it through an opening left at the bottom of the brickwork of the shaft. The materials used in the construction of the shaft were brought in at the bottom of the shaft through the staging and were hauled up the shaft by means of a winch on the lower level and a pulley with a rope running through the pulley on the top of the shaft. The construction of the brickwork of the shaft was done by means of scaffolding erected upon putlogs inside the shaft, the putlogs being supported by being placed through apertures left in the brickwork, and this scaffolding and the putlogs on which it rested were raised from time to time, as the building rose, at intervals of 5ft. On June 8, 1899, the day before the accident, the construction of the brickwork of the shaft had been completed, and the scaffolding inside the brickwork and the gear used in the construction had been removed and brought down to the staging; the opening at the bottom of the shaft, which had been used for access to the shaft and for taking in the materials, was bricked up; and the shaft was in working order and in actual use, with the exception that a lightning conductor, which had been run from the top of the shaft, required a copper plate to be fixed on the end of it and buried in the ground at the lower level. On June 9 the respondent was engaged in removing gear, which had been used in the construction of the shaft, from the staging erected outside the shaft when he stepped upon a plank which tipped up, and in consequence he fell about 20ft. and was injured. The County Court Judge held that the shaft was a "building" within section 7 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, and that it was, at the time of the accident, being constructed by means of a scaffolding—namely, the staging erected from the lower level to the top of the foundations of the shaft. In his opinion the staging, which was erected for the purpose of giving access to the shaft and bringing up materials for its construction, was a "scaffolding" within the Act, and the building was at the time of the accident being "constructed," because the building could not be said to be completed until the scaffolding was removed, the removal of the scaffolding being part of the work of construction. He accordingly made an award in favour of the respondent for 10s. 7d. a week.

Mr. A. POWELL, for the appellant, contended that the shaft was not being "constructed" at the time when the accident happened. It had been completely finished, and was in actual use. It was not like a house with a scaffolding round it, when it might well be said that the house was not constructed until the scaffolding was removed. There was no construction going on here. This scaffolding was below the shaft, used merely for the purpose of bringing up materials to the upper level for the construction of the shaft. It might have remained where it was for other purposes long after the shaft was finished and in use. The County Court Judge was therefore wrong.

Mr. A. J. Tassell, for the respondent, was not called upon.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that, in his opinion, the learned County Court Judge was right. In order to build the shaft it was necessary to go down to a lower level than that on which the shaft was to stand, and to erect a scaffolding on the lower level up to the foundations of the shaft for the purpose of bringing up materials for the construction of the shaft. It was necessary afterwards to get down the scaffolding outside as well as inside the shaft. It was said that the accident did not arise in the course of employment on a building exceeding 30ft. in height which was being "constructed" by means of a scaffolding. In his opinion the job had not been finished. The "construction" was not finished until the scaffolding was taken down. If a builder agreed to build a house, could it be said that the construction of the house was finished before the scaffolding was taken down? Clearly not. The Judge was therefore right.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS and LORD JUSTICE ROMER agreed.

NASH V. DE FREVILLE.*

Bill of Exchange—Promissory note—Fraud—Holder in due course—Overdue note—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, secs. 29 and 61.

Decision of Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J. (15 The Times L.R., 264), reversed.

This was an appeal from the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice at the trial of an action without a jury, reported in 15 The Times L.R., 264. The action was brought on five promissory notes amounting to £5,300. The plaintiffs were tailors carrying on business in Savile-row, London. The defendant was Major Edward Henry G. de Freville, a gentleman residing in Gloucestershire, formerly in the 11th Hussars, and now the master of the Cotswold hounds. In 1885 the defendant came into some property which was settled on him for life with remainder to his sons in tail. He employed as his solicitor Mr. William Peed, of Cambridge, who subsequently negotiated loans and made advances to him. At Peed's request the defendant from time to time gave him promissory notes to cover these advances. On January 14, 1895, the defendant gave Peed a promissory note for £800 with the express stipulation that he should not negotiate or part with it.
